All the charm said to attach to the relics of saints and to objects blest by ecclesiastical dignitaries, all the charms said to attach to certain holy places, holy wells for instance, answered very well as an evidence of supernaturalism to those closely wedded to the theological beliefs of the mediæval centuries; and until public school education was offered to every child in this republic, until people demanded the why and wherefore of everything, until miracles were challenged and the realm of the supernatural was fearlessly invaded by the scientists of this generation, a weird and fantastic garment of mystery was naturally woven around all cures that were performed without the aid of ordinary material assistance. But now that all these facts, gathered up from the East and West, the North and South, from recent times and from remote ages, are brought to bear upon the great law of the universe, and people ask, "What is the reason for this?" we know there cannot be an effect without a cause, there must be a way of reducing all these facts to a science, there must be a law that lies behind them all. People no longer credulous as they formerly were, no longer blind believers in the church as they have been until recently, no longer prepared to believe that God acts spasmodically and intermittently, as though the universe were run by machinery which God put into it at first, and wound up, and with which he occasionally interferes; no longer ready to believe there is a peculiar sanctity attached to certain externals: the world today says it must know the law which governs all these phenomena, the intelligence of today says there must be a reason for this, and there is just as truly a law governing spiritual or mental action which operates in answer to prayer, resulting in a faith cure, or in a cure which is the result of drinking the water of a holy well or touching a cup that has been blessed either by the Pope or any other ecclesiastical dignitary, as there is a law which causes an unsupported body to fall to the ground.

It is today admitted in the scientific world that prayers are answered; that there is a result following upon earnest faith; but as yet physical science has been the only science taught in the Academies, while theology, instead of being a divine science, as the word signifies, has been relegated to the realm of the unknowable, the mysterious, the mythological and supernatural.

We believe in prayers and we know they are answered; but God answers prayer as much in harmony with his divine and immutable law, as He causes the grass to spring up and the fields to be covered with ripened grain in obedience to an immutable law. We know there is a result which follows earnest faith, as much in harmony with the constitution of the universe and in accordance with fixed laws of being, as the phenomenon of sunrise or of sunset. We know those events take place. The mind has in all ages asserted its sovereignty over sense, but naturally rather than supernaturally.

We are now beginning as a people to see that there must be a reason why for everything, that God is not an occasional interferer with the regular course of natural events, but is the very life, inspiration and soul of all law and of all universal government. True spiritual or mental science (science meaning knowledge upon this subject of the power of the mind over matter) will lead in years to come to the practical understanding, not of physics, but of metaphysics, to the erection of colleges in which spiritual science will be taught, and the relation of the soul to the body explained, as today you are taught the relation of one part of the physical organism to another in anatomical and physiological classes. The time is coming when mental and spiritual science will be taught everywhere, when physical research committees will be composed of men and women whose qualifications have made them peculiarly adapted for the Psychological Professor's Chair. There will be Psychological chairs in all the world's universities ere long; professors of Psychology, which means the science of the soul or spirit of man, will become as common in every hall of learning, as a professor of chemistry is now well nigh universal.

If any one imagines that this mental cure movement, vague and chaotic though it may be as yet, is going to die out as the blue glass movement did, referring again to Dr. Stebbins's similes, we tell them there is no analogy between Blue Glass and mental science, as true Mind Cure acknowledges the whole of the mind of man, not merely one-third of it. If you are going to advocate a light and color system of cure, you certainly cannot see it perfected if you believe in blue glass only; you must have red glass and yellow glass as well as blue, for one primary color is not likely to do all the good which can be accomplished by the three primary colors acting in concert. We may have a light and color cure, such as Dr. Babbitt so learnedly elucidates in his "Principles of Light and Color," a most interesting illustrative work, but to attain it we must employ all the colors when we apply color to healing of disease. If we employ music, as some French scientists have done with considerable success, we should never consider we were justified in applying one-third of the octave and leaving two-thirds of the scale entirely out of our calculations.

The Blue Glass movement may be called a "craze," because it recognized one of the primal colors and ignored the other two; and while blue no doubt has a quieting effect upon the nerves, and blue, being the color of the sky above you is symbolical of constancy and truth, and is most eloquent in the language of colors, whether it be the blue of the turquoise, which has always symbolized fidelity, or the blue of the forget-me-not in the floral kingdom, which has always been regarded as a token of constancy to one's friends, blue cannot and does not meet more than one-third of the necessities of human nature. Thus the "blue glass cure," passed away; it was not possible for it to act alone without its comrades of the prism.

If pure white light is administered, and is allowed to flow through all channels of communication with the mind; if the influence of all colors and all sounds upon the human mind and nervous system is understood — and we all know that both sounds and colors have immense effect upon both men and animals, and even upon the growth of plants — we have no hesitancy in saying that a scientific system can be built upon a recognition of the curative and sanative influences of light, sound and color. But to take one portion of sound or one portion of color and say that fragment will cure everything, is to be a crank and ride a hobby, for every one is a crank and rides a hobby who believes that what he chooses to take up with will do all the work of healing, while he leaves more agencies untouched and disregarded than he acknowledges or advocates.

In Mind Cure as well as in physical science we must learn to be in-clusive rather than ex-clusive. Bigotry and narrow-mindedness will never succeed in doing more than making ripples upon the surface of human thought; but those who go deeply into spiritual science will find at length the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life, which the Rosicrucians and other mystics in Europe were so eagerly hunting for in the seventeenth century. It will never be found in the mineral world, nor yet in the vegetable or animal kingdom; but humanity will discover it in the spiritual nature of man; they will find it cradled deep in the soul which is immortal. When you are told in the first book of the Pentateuch that God said unto the human beings whom he had formed in his own image: "Subdue the earth; I have given every green thing and every living creature into your charge," does not the author of the narrative really put this sentence into the mouth of the Eternal: "I have given you a body which contains all there is in the three kingdoms of nature; I have given you a complex organism to control, and if you can control that perfectly, you will be the acknowledged lord and sovereign of nature in the physical domain."

And so in every age it has been found that those who have had power over wild beasts, who have charmed the deadly serpent, have been those in whom the lower nature was held in abject submission to the higher; but the moment a man loses control over himself, immediately he lets the lower passions rule, then the lion can devour him and the serpent can sting him to death. There is no safety for man, no immunity in the midst of danger, until he arrives at that point where he is able to command and control everything beneath what is divine in himself by his own divine strength. Such is an epitome of the teaching of all sages.

So we say perfect health and perfect happiness are always results of spiritual culture, and that as the spirit rises superior to the flesh, as the divine nature in man asserts its sovereignty over the animal propensities, as man says in his higher nature to the brute within him, "Lie down and obey me," as he compels every mortal passion to yield to the supremacy of mind, to that extent and no farther will he be exempt from all danger and from all suffering.

You are told in the olden days that Elijah raised to life one who was apparently dead; that when he stretched himself upon the widow's son, who appeared dead, and looked up earnestly to heaven, calling upon the Eternal Being, the spirit came back into the body of the child, and he restored the boy to his mother. There is, perhaps, no adequate reason for believing the boy to have been really dead; the final link which bound the spirit to the flesh may not have been snapped; the probabilities are that the boy was in a deep trance and past all ordinary methods of restoration; those who gathered round him, including his poor, heart-broken mother, believed him to be really dead, and he would soon have been dead in reality if it had not been for the prophet's touch and divine power. Elijah was a man of like passions with humanity indeed, but one who controlled those passions; a man who could stand alone on the top of Mount Carmel challenging eight hundred and fifty prophets of Baal and of the Groves, and compel them to behold the sovereignty of divine truth in the midst of an idolatrous and licentious company. If he was thus able to stand alone in the interests of eternal truth, daunted by no superstition and no danger, such a man could surely perform a wonder others were unable to attempt.

When we are told of the self-denying life of Jesus, of his long fasting in the wilderness, of his encountering and overcoming temptations in their most subtle and attractive form; putting every carnal appetite under his feet, together with all vain-glorious desires and selfish ambitions, refusing to use magical power to minister to sense, refusing to make a spectacle of himself by performing an ostentatious miracle, refusing to make compromises with the powers of darkness and thereby try to serve God with only half his heart, and the world, the flesh and the devil with the other half—it is no wonder to us that, having reached those spiritual heights on the summit of which he declared that his kingdom was not of this world, refusing all solicitations to head an army and figure in the rôle of a personal, warlike Messiah, that he not only spoke about putting all lower things beneath his feet and standing erect in true, spiritual manhood, but proved that he had gained a complete victory over himself and thoroughly tamed his own passions by controlling those of others. It takes a greater than an Alexander or a Cæsar to bid temptation and disease depart, and even to raise to life again those who are apparently dead. So when the disciples of Jesus, unable to come up to his standard in the performance of noble works, asked their Master, "Why cannot we do what you have done and what you have told us we also can accomplish?" He rebukes them not only for want of faith, but tells them of the necessity of prayer and fasting, i.e., of continual aspiration toward heaven and perpetual reining in of the lower instincts as necessary prerequisites to the exercise of such highly spiritual powers.

If we take notice we shall observe that all through the New Testament record those who could perform such wonderful works were men who would dare everything in the interests of a righteous cause. It was no light thing to be followers of the persecuted Jesus in the first century; it was no fashionable and conventional move to join one's self to a Christian society then; it rendered one liable to be persecuted on all hands, to be relentlessly pursued by foes even to the death; the primitive Christians would fight for their religion and for their conscience at any sacrifice, and by the spiritual victory which they gained over pride, self-interest and worldly ambition, they developed the power which made them in a special degree healers and teachers of mankind.

There is no other road to equalling the wonders of past ages except by treading in the pathway of self-sacrifice in which the prophets, Jesus and the disciples trod.

When the quetions is asked, What then are the qualifications for real work in a metaphysical direction, what are the qualifications for real healing? we answer: You must heal yourself of pride, of selfishness, of carnality, put all Mammon worship beneath your feet, in place of the death of sin rise to a life of righteousness; overcome all desire for personal aggrandizement, and cultivate a supreme wish to benefit all mankind. Before you can be truly a healer in the highest sense of the word, the understanding of truth and the living a life in harmony with it, knowledge of truth and the love of it are both necessary. The true metaphysician, whose works follow him and prove the divinity of the science which he professes, is one who has first healed himself of all inordinate love of self, for then only can he go forward and heal his brethren.

The power to teach is the result of the understanding of truth; the power to heal is the result of the fervent love of truth coupled with love to all humanity. You may teach others, and yet yourself be a castaway, as Paul expresses it; you may address the intellect, you may expound spiritual verities and may help others to understand truth, but you will never be a successful healer until you are a spiritually-minded person.

So long as people go into the work of healing for the sole object of making money, so long as they desire the gift merely as a means of livelihood, so long as there are any who take up mental healing simply for the sake of tiding over a difficult crisis in their financial career, but would willingly lay down the work as soon as they have piled up money enough to live without trying to help their fellow-creatures, there will always be some who make metaphysical healing appear ludicrous, as such persons will be noted for their failures rather than for their successes. But all persons who go into the work with a sincere and honest desire to bless mankind, and while they do not refuse to be compensated for their time and services by people who are well able to pay, would never turn a poor patient from their doors because he had not the fee in his hand to pay for a treatment, must succeed. A true healer never refuses to give instructions gratuitously to those who are unable to pay, for true spiritual workers, while they acknowledge that the laborer is worthy of his hire, whenever they confer blessings upon others only allow themselves to be compensated by people who can afford to pay, and then only for the purpose of meeting necessary expenses. All true workers would go on working and working quite as fervently if they came into the possession of immense wealth, as those who love their work, however they may be circumstanced financially, do it for the love of it; willing workers, and these only, are true mental healers or true spiritual scientists in this or any age, in this or any country.

We hear it continually said that mental healers are mercenary, that people go into the work only to make dollars and cents. Now, while a great deal is exaggerated and a great deal is only unkind comment on the part of those who are more mercenary themselves than the mental healers whom they accuse, still there is no question that the very large prices charged for teaching and the very heavy fees exacted for treatment, and the attitude which many have taken toward the poor and needy, has brought an immense amount of reproach, some of it merited, upon what has been termed mental science, mind cure or metaphysical healing; but mental

The use of the term Christian Science by Mrs. Eddy and her followers has naturally led people to suppose that the power to heal is a secret confided to some woman who gives particular interpretations of Christianity — a secret, moreover, to be obtained by payment of three hundred dollars for an ordinary course of instructions, and two hundred dollars more for a supplementary course, before people can exercise genuine healing power. Mrs. Eddy styles herself the discoverer of metaphysical healing. She is in truth no more so than is any person who has discovered metaphysical healing, which is only the discovery that mind is sovereign, and that the body can be made completely subservient to it. Mrs. Eddy no doubt was cured in the way she states in her book. She no doubt did find that all the methods of material science were unavailing in her case, and then a spiritual revelation came to her, and Divine power healed her as she was reading her Bible. She no doubt has received spiritual illuminations which have opened her understanding to see the nothingness of the vain show of matter, and the exclusive reality of spirit. But for any persons to imagine that they must make pilgrimages to Boston and sit at the feet of Mrs. Eddy in order to understand spiritual healing, is to be lamentably deluded. Any person who imagines there is any Mecca or Jerusalem upon the earth, or any one teacher who has in her keeping a special secret from God which she can sell at a large figure to those to whom she chooses to impart it, is the victim of a pernicious form of superstition.

When you are sitting in your own private room, waiting for the spirit, the spirit can come to your attic or to your cellar as well as into Mrs. Eddy's class-room, though if you feel you are not so intuitive as to be able to receive the truth direct from the source of all life, that your relations with the spirit world from various causes are not so intimate as the relations of some others, then as it is God's will that we should help each other, by joining classes and sitting at the feet of teachers and holding communion with those in the higher life who have graduated beyond this earthly school, you can obtain very great assistance and help both from those who have cast off the material form and those who are yet subject to earthly limitations. It is an absolute fact that those whose clairvoyance is undoubted, and who have given the most satisfactory tests of their power, have seen spiritual helpers by the side of those who were engaged in a work of benevolence. Your "departed friends" do assist you, whatever may be said to the contrary. We do not say that all who derive assistance from their spirit friends know it; but when some who do know it hide a truth simply for the sake of satisfying the demands of what they think to be the influential part of society, the really influential, whether in the Christian church or anywhere else, will never approve of cowardice or hypocrisy. If you believe in Spiritualism and pretend you do not, there is not an honorable member of any Christian church who will respect you when he finds it out; but if you go before the world and state your convictions and say frankly, "I believe this, I feel so and so," letting the public know that you have the courage of your convictions, there may be people who will say, "I do not agree with the opinion of such and such persons," but all honest persons will add, "I respect their honesty and admire their straightforwardness." We would far rather have our opinions contested and be considered in the wrong theoretically than be considered either cowardly or dishonest, as we must be if we cloak honest convictions. In the present state of the world's attitude toward all psychological subjects, to draw a veil of mystery over any work in which you may engage, to hold back facts with which you may be acquainted, may answer very well for those who seek only to sway the uneducated, but it will never take with enlightened people who have as much intellect as yourselves and as much power to understand and appreciate spiritual truths as you have.

Wherever metaphysicians endeavor to hold themselves aloof from others, organizing themselves into sects, and try to make out that all the power they have is locked up in some little narrow combination, they will find that truth will be like the wind, to which Jesus likened the Holy Spirit, when he said, the wind bloweth wherever it listeth, and you cannot tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth, so is every one who is born of the Spirit.

We do not use the term Christian Science ourselves. Why? Because there are many of our Jewish friends who have not the slightest intention of giving up the grand old religion of Israel, who are today performing cures metaphysically, and doing fully as much good as anybody who has taken a course in Christian Science either from Mrs. Eddy or any one else. Many of our friends, who have been in our meetings regularly, are Jews, and intend to remain so, and these have found nothing whatever in metaphysics which has shaken their faith in the religion of Israel. There are also many who are members of Christian churches, and who intend to keep up all their church associations, who have found nothing whatever in metaphysics out of harmony with the teachings of Jesus and his apostles. If we use such expressions as spiritual science, spiritual knowledge, mental science, mental knowledge, we shall express the true idea, viz., that the unfoldment of spiritual and mental powers, not the learning of a form, not the ability to repeat off in a parrot-like manner a number of formulas, constitutes ability to heal, which is a result of one's spiritual and mental culture, allying one with the higher powers of the spiritual universe. We need to know that the true metaphysician is one whose own mind, whose own spiritual and intellectual nature is in the ascendant, for we have power to help others into the higher chambers of being only when we ourselves have risen. Spiritual and mental science means nothing more than spiritual and mental culture. People calling themselves Christian Scientists, declaring that it is almost a sacrilegious act, almost idolatrous, to advocate even fresh air and proper attention to dietary laws, are simply absurd. Jesus said to several whom he healed, "Go wash and be clean;" and while the spiritual significance of those words is undoubtedly far deeper than the letter, and referred to the washing of all impurity from the mind, not merely to taking a bath, yet we all know the cleanliness enjoyed by the Mosaic law contributed very largely to the health of the Israelites, in the midst of nations suffering from dreadful diseases, and such is always the case where sanitary laws are observed. But we must always remember that results on the external plane are the natural outcome of our mental and spiritual state; that as we become more and more allied to spiritual realities, more and more mental, moral conquerors over sense, we become more and more scrupulous in all that appertains to health, even on the material plane. Instead of the body being neglected, and mental science meaning that you should ignore the body and all demands of the body, what is meant by pure metaphysics is that mind should be assigned its rightful place over sense; mind must be supreme and matter its servant; the body is the instrument of the soul, but the soul must be the exclusive performer upon the instrument.

We have nothing to say in reply to Dr. Stebbins' lecture, only that to our way of thinking he did not go far enough into the science and philosophy of the subject; he does not appear to have thoroughly grasped the great spiritual principle which underlies Mind Cure, and we do not wonder if he and many others have not, for it is very rarely that mental healing is so presented to the world that it can gain acceptance at the hands of the thousands who have been educated in the prevailing materialistic (even though religious) modes of thought.

When the New Testament is interpreted in harmony with reason and the higher intuitions of man we shall regard perfect health as the reward of perfect purity; and when we thoroughly understand metaphysical healing we shall know that we must pay close attention to our every thought, and that only by moral purity can we advance to the perfection of external blessedness; we shall know that we must cure the mind of jealousy, pride and carnality, finding an outlet for error and an inlet for truth. To get people into such a way of thinking and acting that they think more of the welfare of their fellow-beings than they do of their own private interests, will be to bring nearer the glorious time when health, happiness and virtue will be forever united upon the earth.

True metaphysical science is the basis of all reform. The true metaphysician is found in the Kindergarten and in the Moral Educational Society; the true metaphysician is found attending to the culture of good habits in those whom he treats and educates; but instead of whitewashing the sepulchre or making clean the outside of the cup and platter, patching up the body while the mind is yet in error and the morals are yet debased, the true mental healer affirms the spiritual to be the realm of causation, the realm whence all words and actions spring: "as man thinketh, so he is." As long as we entertain pride, vain-gloriousness, selfishness and sensuality, so long shall we be the victims of suffering and death; but so soon as we think only of righteous and humane thoughts, and get ourselves into true and loving relation with God, the Infinite Being, shall we rise superior to all lower things, ride safely over the tempestuous billows of the outer world into those calm havens of perpetual peace and rest, where beatified spirits, their earthly pilgrimage safely ended, work in the enjoyment of a rest that is forever active, in a state of being where there is no fatigue, no sickness, no decay and no death, throughout the boundless ages of eternity.

LECTURE II.

WHAT IS METAPHYSICS, AND WHAT IS MEANT BY METAPHYSICAL HEALING?

THE public is frequently told by professors of metaphysical healing that it is necessary for students to join private classes for instruction in the science; and to the end of supplying such instruction many teachers are constantly forming classes, admission to which can be obtained usually on payment of a fee ranging from a few to a few hundred dollars. Mrs. Eddy, the well-known leader of the Christian Science Movement, president of the Metaphysical College in this city and pastor of a religious society, claims to have discovered metaphysical healing, and consequently many persons suppose it necessary to go to her or one of her certificated students to obtain the needful instruction in the event of their desiring to become conversant with the theory and practice of the science. In Science and Health, a large volume written by Mrs. Eddy, and in the Journal of Christian Science, a monthly magazine enjoying a considerable circulation, the ground is taken that this particular lady is the originator of the metaphysical movement in this country, and the almost, if not altogether infallible exponent of metaphysical science. This position is, of course, fiercely antagonized by many who claim to possess fully as much power as Mrs. Eddy or any of her students in the direction indicated, and who have not taken a lesson of her or any of her students, or read a line in her book, or seen a copy of the official organ of the college over which she presides. As we are continually besieged with questions as to our position with regard to Christian Science, not being ready to adopt the title Christian Scientists ourselves, we deem it advisable in this preliminary or introductory lecture to give once for all our plain, unvarnished views and state clearly our position in this matter. Your present speaker, in common with many another naturally sensitive and impressible individual, has from earliest childhood been the subject of intuitive guidance, and when at the tender age of five years he became conscious of realities not discernible by external sense, a revelation came to him instinctively that ailments of every kind were aggravated by dwelling upon them, and were in most instances speedily overcome by forgetting their existence, and directing thought elsewhere. At that early age, then, a child grasped the first principle of metaphysical healing, and that without books, teachers, or the slightest assistance from the conversation or opinions of the persons with whom he lived, all of whom were destitute of any such perceptions or beliefs. Mrs. Eddy says a light broke in upon her mind after a very severe illness, while she was yet almost at death's door, and that the New Testament narrative was the source whence her mind received its first bent in the direction of Christian Science. This we can readily believe, and can also easily understand how peculiarly susceptible a religiously disposed mind is to receive as literally true the New Testament anecdotes at a time when ordinary physical means have been tried and found utterly wanting in a time of direst need. So far we go heart and soul with Mrs. Eddy; but our proposition is to dilate upon the universality of experiences and powers similar to hers. We propose therefore to take a leaf from her bound book of counsels and acknowledge principle rather than person in all that appertains to true spiritual science. Mrs. Eddy is one out of many who have been blessed with remarkable spiritual experiences, but it is not to her or to any other individual who now lives on earth or who ever has dwelt on this planet that we must turn for infallible light and guidance. Men and women are but windows, through which the light of immortal spirit shines, and the less restrictive our opinions are concerning that part played by single individuals in the accomplishment of human happiness and welfare the nearer we grow to spiritual truth and mental liberty. Having said thus much on the score of the source from which metaphysical science is derived, let us now proceed to give our reasons for publishing this present series of discourses. We have already alluded to the prevalent statement of teachers that they must organize private classes for instruction. We will add that we do so ourselves, and for the following reasons.

On the public platform and through the agency of the printing press we can give a fair general outline of what we teach in private; but the special advantage of private classes is that they afford opportunities for elaborate discussion of the views advanced by means of questions and answers. These cannot be embodied satisfactorily in a printed address, because no two minds need exactly the same explanations, and therefore in the classes no two persons ask precisely the same questions. The subject is infinite, and touches upon every conceivable topic of interest to mankind; and were the readers of these pages present in a private class composed of smart, intelligent, inquiring minds, they could not fail to be impressed with the great advantages to be gained in the class-room, almost unprocurable outside of its precincts: for the class instructs itself; one member enlightens another, and there can be no true class unless it be made up of men and women, yea, and children also (for children are the aptest scholars), who come together not simply to listen to a lecture, but for mutual edification. The lecture-hall and the class-room are not rivals, and one can never do the work of the other. The lecture-hall is for the multitude, the class-room for the few, i.e., for the few at a given time, though for all at some time; as the science of being, ontology, as it is sometimes termed, is a science for all mankind, it is a gospel, good news for all people. The term Metaphysics is very old, and has been much used by scholars to define a system of reasoning prevalent among the ablest German thinkers, and powerfully proclaimed by the renowned Bishop Berkeley, an Englishman in the last century.

Though much mystery has been attached to the word by controversialists, it is itself a very simple and innocent expression, literally signifying mind over matter; and just here now that we have arrived at a lucid definition of the word, let us proceed to our task of further explanation by considering frankly and fairly the relative positions of the two great schools of thinkers into which the world which really thinks at all is divided. There are really only two prominent and distinctive schools of philosophy extant, the metaphysical and the physical, the materialistic and the spiritualistic. The metaphysical school properly includes all who believe spirit to be the dominant force in the universe, all who believe in the sovereignty of mind and the subserviency of matter; thus all consistent Theists are metaphysicians, in that they attribute all material effects to spiritual causes. Swedenborg states the metaphysical position tersely and accurately when he declares that the world of spirit is the realm of causation and the material world the region of effects. The great question of the day among students is whether does matter evolve or generate spirit, or mind beget matter. There may be many great and almost insuperable difficulties attendant upon such an inquiry; we do not propose in this address to bewilder our hearers or readers with an incomprehensible succession of arguments and counter arguments on this knotty point; we will content ourselves with calling your attention to a few prominent facts which throw light upon the inquiry and tend to simplify the elucidation of the vexed problem. Let us begin with the old adage or axiom, "Out of nothing, nothing comes." We do not wonder at the contempt and ridicule poured upon certain assumptions of narrow-minded theologians by modern skeptics, for theology has been so debased in many quarters as to give utterance to the absurd statement that the world and all that is in it was made of nothing. To say the world was created by God is not ridiculous, for by God is meant Infinite Spirit, Eternal Mind, Supreme Intelligence; but to say God made it out of nothing is to speak so foolishly as to bring Theism into ridicule and contempt. Were theologians consistently to affirm that God made all worlds out of his own idea, and thus return to the wisdom religion of antiquity from which the doctrine of emanation sprang, theological utterances would be intelligent and credible, and happily a move is now being made in that direction, especially by the liberal clergy of all denominations. The homogeneity of the substance of the universe is a doctrine very generally proclaimed by science; the atomic theory, now put forward with much vigor by some of the most brilliant intellects on the planet, leads to the conclusion that there must be a condition of being absolutely homogeneous; all heterogeneity is therefore simply phenomenal and transitory, while the true essential substance of being is self-existent, eternal, immutable. The theory of atoms is very well so far as it goes and may commend itself forcibly to the intellect; but we beg of you to ponder well this startling truth in connection with it, viz., that the existence of atoms is purely hypothetical and conjectural; they are reached only through mental processes of inference and deduction; as they make no appeal to any one of man's five bodily senses, no believer in their existence ever professing to have encountered one in any of his physical researches, they are mentally apprehended, certainly not physically comprehended; they have no relation to sight, hearing, touch, taste or smell; they exist therefore in the minds of professors, and so far as the schools have any knowledge — nowhere else.

This consideration leads us to make the following declaration as a basis for our metaphysical temple: Atoms are known only to mind; therefore they are mind and in mind, and being mind they have become known to mind, mind taking cognizance of mental entities which the physical senses fail to perceive. Let us see where this proposition lands us. Atoms are conscious, intelligent; they think, feel, love; they are, in a word spiritual ideas, living, moving thoughts; and being such, when their motions are witnessed through their subordinates the oft-mentioned molecules, they display powers of choice, preference, selection, etc. Let the proposition be once admitted that behind the moving, shifting scenes of matter mind is operative, acknowledge mind as primal and causal, and you will no longer be bewildered as you watch the evident intelligence and sagacity displayed by the individual monads as they evince selective appreciation and in their marvelous movements show attractions and antipathies similar to the emotions which sway humanity.

Let us try to think of God as the Eternal Infinite, the grand and glorious sum of all life and intelligence, the infinite ocean of uncreated Being in which we live and move and have our being. A personal or anthropomorphic idea of Deity is foreign to metaphysics and also foreign to pure Theism, unless the personal idea have reference to the microcosmic revelation to the human mind of the macrocosmic infinitude of Being.

We, as individual souls, live in the Infinite Soul; we are within the embrace of infinitude. God's life embraces, encircles us; it is the only life there is, and our life is included in the infinite whole. We are then in the Eternal, and can never get outside the Infinite; there is no time outside of eternity; there is no space outside of universal substance. Infinite substance, infinite being, not infinite space, is the metaphysical idea; for what is space but the imaginary distance between two points, two objects or two ideas? The idea of space is itself a conception born of impotence and ignorance; for there is no space, there is neither void nor vacuum, anywhere. Spirit is omnipresent, and where the senses fail to discern anything, and the human intellect fails to realize anything, the nothingness supposed to exist in the universe is the measure and limit of man's mortal and finite thought of being.

How ridiculous it is when we think of it to try and conceive of empty space, unoccupied distance. How far more rational to dwell upon the omnipresence of spiritual reality. You will doubtless have observed ere this that in speaking of Deity and the soul we have used the word "being," but not "existence;" the two words to us convey totally different meanings: to be is greater than to exist; that which is, is greater than what exists, for to exist is to stand out apart, away from something else. Being is spiritual, existence is eternal; being can never be destroyed or lessened, existences come and go; they are here today and gone tomorrow; therefore there is a subtle means of reconciling creation out of nothing with metaphysical truth, but in order to do so you must make two words out of one, and nothing must stand no thing. Things may be brought into existence out of what is superior to all things, if by things you mean objective existences palpable to external sense. A thing is generally considered neuter; chairs and tables are things, but it would be an insult to call a human being a thing, as a human being is infinitely superior to a thing, and it is always an insult to compare an individual to what is inferior to him or herself; using the word "thing" then for an inanimate, outward, perishable object, a something modeled from mind, but only mind's expression on the lowest plane of its operations; things are produced out of no things but out of a power, force, energy, impulse, will, which can create and destroy things by remodeling as it pleases the something which for want of a better term is commonly called the force of nature. That something is self-existent is an axiom; the puerile inquiry, if God made everything, who made God, is unanswerable; for the word "God," meaning Infinite Goodness, the Good One, stands in the English language for eternal and self-existent Spirit. Power is Eternal and Infinite, and Power in its last analysis is Deity.

Now let us proceed to a definition of the individual human spirit. Every human soul is a manifestation of Deity, a living thought of God, a divine idea; the divine soul or essential ego called by Oriental mystics the atma, is the divine of man, the immortal entity which never changes, and can never lose its individuality. This divine spark of the infinite fire of life is all there is of man in the image of God. The divine soul is the center round which all else revolves, and thus we are justified in speaking of the absolute deathlessness or immortality of the soul only as we regard each separate spiritual unit or essential atom of life distinct from its external relations and environments. Immortal mind is the consciousness of the soul, its understanding of itself and of its relation to eternity. Mortal mind is an anachronism, as all mind is immortal; it is, however, employed by some as a convenient figure of speech; to be more definite and explanatory it is necessary to use an ampler phrase, such as mortal state or condition of mind.

You often speak of changing your mind, and by so doing you only change your opinion of your method of thought. This is changeable and changes constantly, while the mind or seat of thought lives forever. In the use of language we cannot be too careful, as careless speaking creates more ill-feeling and entanglement than all besides; but a difficulty unfortunately, and we may add improperly, inheres in words themselves, scarcely two lexicographers agreeing perfectly as to their exact meaning, and all dictionary-makers giving several often diverse interpretations of the same word. From this source alone innumerable misunderstandings have arisen among professed metaphysicians as well as with the outside public; almost all metaphysical treatises need to be supplemented by a glossary, and as glossaries differ, obscurity to the mind of the general reader is almost inevitable.

In this series of lectures we shall endeavor as far as possible to simplify and popularize metaphysical terminology, not so much by the almost futile attempt made by some to exclude all unusual and difficult words as by an endeavor to trace their derivations and explain them, so as to make them familiar and self-evidently expressive throughout this course of instruction at least; whether others will be ready to adopt our interpretations or not remains to be seen. Our principal object is to make our own utterances plain enough to give those hearers and readers who may have hitherto been unfamiliar to a large degree with metaphysical phraseology a practical introduction to the many words constantly in use, and yet vaguely misunderstood by a large percentage of students of metaphysics. Let us say once and finally we are no one's followers. We commit ourselves to indorse no one's theories, and we do not even pause to inquire whether we agree with Mrs. Eddy, Dr. Evans, or any other accepted authority on matters metaphysical. We are uncompromising advocates of free speech and a free press, and pity the wretched sycophancy, we might almost say idolatry, of those who make worshipful heroes, almost divinities, of certain men and women whose conspicuous position before the public, while it naturally and justly brings them celebrity, is no guarantee whatever that they are in any special manner divinely illuminated or inspired. The first step to be taken by all students of spiritual or mental science is to achieve mental or spiritual independence. Thus the oft-repeated cry of metaphysicians, "Let go of all earthly props and lean only on God," is never too loudly shouted. The question, of course, naturally arises, how can we lean on God? The first commandment of the decalogue, Thou shalt have no God beside the Eternal One, is susceptible of a variety of interpretations. Consequently, while the mass of Christians as well as Jews the world over are willing to join in the fervent ejaculation of Israel scattered all over the earth, "Hear, O Israel! the Lord our God is one Lord!" and, while they are willing to unite further in the sublime words of the Old and New Testaments, "And thou shalt love the Lord with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength," the question of the manner in which divine revelations reach mankind is always a matter of dispute.

Conservatism alleges that God miraculously, supernaturally, revealed himself to patriarchs and prophets who lived several thousand years ago; and Christianity sums up all ancient revelations by affirming that in the historical Jesus of nearly two thousand years ago divine revelation was finally completed. Liberal thought, on the other hand, is never tired of affirming that God's revelation is incessant, uninterrmittent, that God speaks as well as spoke, writes as well as wrote, and reveals as well as revealed his will to mankind. The translation of the idea of revelation out of the past into the present tense is the great triumph of true liberalism over conservatism. This liberal view of revelation is the corner-stone of metaphysical healing, as the true metaphysician depends solely upon divine, omnipresent help in all times of trouble, and relies exclusively upon divine strength, not as doled out professedly by narrow and exclusive schools of theology and medicine, but as imparted by way of celestial influx lighting up the entire nature of man and teaching him to consider himself as in daily and hourly communion with the Infinite Parent of all spirits. This idea does not, as some suppose, and that most erroneously, do away with the intervention of kindly human beings; it does not separate us one from the other as regards our existence on earth or in any other part of the universe, but it teaches us to bow before the shrine of truth only, and it makes individual conviction of right the standard for each human being. It recognizes no infallible or semi-infallible book, church, creed, or man; the essential ego, the atma within, is the final court of appeal: so every man becomes his own king and priest, as the chart whereby he must steer his vessel safely into the port of endless felicity is not an ancient parchment scroll, neither is it the fleshly tablet of the heart; it is the spiritual table of stone, or rock of ages, the divine nature in man, which lies at the very root of man's being and will forever constitute him a self-reliant entity and yet a continual pensioner on the divine bounty; as Swedenborg says, "All life is an influx from the Divine Mind." In that sense all are dependents and recipients, and none of us have anything which we have not received, though in another sense we are self-dependent, as we do not need that any finite being should stand between us and the Infinite Fountain of all life. Metaphysical healing, which is healing by the power of mind over matter, acknowledges the Infinite Mind as not only very near to but positively the essential life of every finite intelligence, and it is to arouse that thought and feeling within the human mind, to enable it to lay hold of this great truth, that constitutes the true art of healing.

No one can have read the New Testament narratives without being forcibly struck with the constant allusions therein to a power resident in the patients themselves, called faith. This faith must have been vastly more than simple belief in a man or a doctrine, or it could never have been the instrument whereby they were made whole. Faith literally means fidelity; its Latin equivalent is fides, from which the English word fidelity springs; now fidelity or faithfulness means honor displayed in conduct, or honorable motive. Acting with an honorable motive is necessary to faithful work. Now, if faith makes whole, faith must be equivalent to spiritual health, wholeness or soundness; faith has no fraternity with hypocrisy or simulation. Faith is honor, integrity, pure and simple. It shrinks not from persecution or opposition; though it does not hazardously court oppression, it has no fear of man-made law; it scorns Mrs. Grundy, and is ready to take its stand on the simple rock of conviction, smiling at the angry breakers as they dash in blind fury and impotent rage against the solid terra firma on which the spirit conscious of rectitude takes its stand. This is, in brief, saving faith; it is loyalty, and loyalty must ever be assigned the highest place in morals.

We have no intention whatever in this course of lectures of indulging in historical controversy on the New Testament; that is not our aim and object, but as this book will doubtless fall into the hands of a large number who have been brought up in the Christian faith, and who still revere the New Testament as a heaven-inspired volume, we will leave it to theologians and historians to settle the external points of controversy always raging and address ourselves to the spiritual teaching beneath the cover of the letter. Divine laws and methods never change. It is a matter of utter indifference to us whether names, dates and localities can be depended upon or not. We have a record in existence highly prized by millions of civilized men and women, which is literally crowded with cases of the marvelous restoration to health by unusual means, means not endorsed by the conservative medical colleges, at least, when every device of medicine was useless, and had been abandoned in despair, and what lends added emphasis to the New Testament story is that it is not altogether unique. Other histories perhaps more venerable still are replete with similar narratives. Egyptian aud Hindoo priests in the long, long ago healed men and women in ways so similar to the methods of Jesus and his disciples that one may be easily pardoned for thinking that possibly the Christian scriptures were in large measure transcripts of older Bibles. Be this as it may, the greater the antiquity and the more numerous the instances of such kinds of healing, the more testimony in its favor. If spiritual healing were something new, born in this century of novelties and sensations, it might be a craze, a nine days' wonder, a bubble on the surface of thought, here today and gone tomorrow; but as it has stood the test of thousands of years, and constituted the great secret of Oriental theosophy long before A. D. 1, there can be no chance of its exploding now; it has lived too long and conquered too many obstacles to be silenced by persecution or ridicule, but like the hardy forest oak of centuries' growth, it grows hardier with every storm, and promises ere long to become the supreme, masterful giant among the trees, in comparison with which all other forest growths will fade into impressive insignificance. Idiosyncrasies like parasites will come and go; for a time they may so cover the stately trunk of the tree round which they wind their poisonous arms that they are by superficial observers mistaken for the tree itself; but one by one they perish and are looped away, while the tree whose life they threatened, being a tree of life immortal, shows its vigor in no way so powerfully as by its repeated victories over what may be termed the enemies in its own household.

Metaphysical healing, or more explicitly, healing by spiritual power is the only absolute method of healing. Spiritual science like mathematics is absolutely exact, while all beneath it is valuable just in so far as it is related to it and no further.

We do not, in our teachings, deny that cures are performed apparently by outward remedies. We do not deny that many reputed cures through the agency of faith and prayer are unreal, and are followed quickly by relapses; we shall not strive to evade an issue or shirk a difficulty arising from such, to many most unwelcome facts; we shall, however, make a sincere and earnest effort to help all who study with us to meet these difficulties bravely, until at length we hope they completely overcome them. All we can do either in lectures or classes and all healers can do in their practice is to help all whom we and they come in contact with to rise to such heights of spiritual attainment that, like climbers to the summit of some lofty mountain they find themselves above the tempest, while the dwellers in the valleys are drenched with rain and alarmed with sonorous peals of thunder and flashes of blinding lightning. Those who have made the steep and toilsome ascent of a great elevation, standing at its top can look up only to clear blue skies and shining sunbeams, beneath their feet the clouds and tempests hold their carnival. In brief, metaphysical studies are intended to help you all to ascend the mountain of health, on the summit of which you are free from, because above the reach of, drenching rains, furious storms and sombre clouds which hide all heavenly landscapes.

To qualify one's self for healing others needs that all the work of self-healing through spiritual growth be accomplished first, and before you can yourselves be free from disease and suffering you must be free from that dwelling-in-the-valley condition of mind which, in spite of all the boasted culture of these closing years of the nineteenth century, is unhappily the average state of the average member of polite society. Let no one imagine there is a royal road to health other than the king's highway of constant and soulful effort to attain what lies before and on high; none can dispense with the initiatory work of spiritual culture, which is not always easy at first, but is on the contrary like the little book said in an ancient allegory to have been eaten by a prophet, bitter to the taste, difficult to swallow, but sweet as honey when once it had passed the alimentary canal. To correct a vulgar misapprehension in the minds of many, it is a duty we owe ourselves as well as the public, to say that simple denial of the existence of disease will never effect radical cure in difficult cases, however much it may charm away the minor hysterical difficulties of hyper-sensitive people. The utter disregard of all so-called laws of health advocated by extremists is to a large extent a fallacy based upon sciolistic assumption, and certainly not upon a spiritual understanding of the true science of being. "Say it's not there, and it's not there," is not a formula which will be found to answer in serious cases of derangement; magic may be very attractive to the marvel-loving and the superstitious, and it is impossible to affix limits to the power of human imagination; but stumbling along in the dark of nescience is not walking in the light of science, and if we are to teach a science and expound a philosophy we are surely called upon to insist that a race must be run and a battle fought by every separate student before a prize is secured or a crown is won. To indicate the line of march to be followed by every soldier in the regiment is the work of the teacher, and to struggle to discipline every passion, appetite and desire so that every inclination which wars against the soul may be curbed and reined in, is the work of every student. Let us then accept this great twofold truth at the outset of our studies. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." The Father coöperates with the child; the human mind must do its part, the human will learn its lesson and throw its influence on the side of truth, and then in rightful relations between the Creator and the creature we can discern the advent of a glorious state in which sickness will be unknown, and error and ignorance be dead, crushed by the all-victorious heel of the sun-clothed woman, or the affections illumined with divine wisdom. No more beautiful hymn was ever written than the one by Bowring, found in almost every collection, every verse of which ends with the glorious sentence, "God is wisdom, God is love." Here we have the sphere of truth, not a single hemisphere. We must be wise as well as loving, intelligent as well as sympathetic, rational as well as emotional, before we can scale the pyramid and reach the apex of successful humanitarian endeavor.

LECTURE III.

WHAT IS DISEASE, AND HOW DOES SPIRITUAL SCIENCE PROPOSE TO OVERCOME IT?

IN our last lecture we hope we defined with sufficient clearness our reasons for adopting the phrase "Spiritual Science." It appears to us the most lucid and comprehensive title or name we can possibly apply to the system we are trying to expound. Remember, we lay no claim to invention, discovery, or originality; exposition and explanation constitute our only forte. Mrs. Eddy and her followers use the term "Christian Science," and call themselves Christian Scientists. For several reasons we refuse to accept that label; because of its exclusiveness, and by reason of its distastefulness to many minds, we consider it should be surpassed by those who do not claim to be Christian in the narrower sense of the term, which is after all, an ecclesiastical and to some extent a sectarian one. The words "Christ," "Christian, and "Christianity" are not pleasant to the ears of our Jewish friends, neither are they at all acceptable to a large number of Spiritualists, Theists, and Free Religionists, all of whom can study and practice mental and spiritual science. That the power to heal does not belong exclusively to a set of persons belonging to an exclusive sect or party is self-evident, and no publication of recent times has done more to enforce this fact than an article in the Century Magazine, June, 1886, in which an eminently Christian man, a Christian apologist and partisan, we may say, points with unexpected candor and liberality to the equal benefits flowing from the practice of persons of widely different schools of thought and phases of religious belief. Roman Catholics and Protestants, Faith and Prayer Healers, Spiritualists and Buddhists, all point to the miraculous cures effected by them in accordance with their own peculiar and distinctive methods of operation; and it cannot be denied that Allopathy, Homœopathy, Hydropathy, Magnetism, Electricity and Eclecticism, besides an immense number of minor systems, can all point to their laurels and bring forward marvelous cases of cures performed to substantiate their claim that their particular system or mode of treatment is the only really efficacious one. Not only miracles, but miracles of healing, i.e., wonderful or astonishing, and therefore truly marvelous cases, are continually brought before us. Statuvolence and vitapathy are numbering up their jewels and sending out accounts of the wonders performed through some mysterious agent hard to define, but evidently potential and curative in its influence, while Light and Color cure is so much the rage in some quarters that the disciples of the sun's rays refracted through the prism and admitted to rooms and baths through various colored panes of glass triumphantly point to the refulgent orb of day, and declare that when any are sick among them they have only to call upon old King Sol to restore them to health.

The tendency of the present day is toward eclecticism in everything; but unfortunately the so-called eclectic is as much creed-bound very often as the most rigid allopath. His creed itself is perhaps a more liberal one, but he is often a rigid dogmatist nevertheless. True eclecticism in spirit rather than in name never denies the good accomplished by any person or any system; and when a metaphysician is intelligently and inclusively eclectic in his theory he never refuses to accept gratefully the blessings conferred by those who do not sail under the metaphysical flag or avowedly practice in harmony with metaphysical formulæ. Disease, as the word itself implies, is the want of ease, the opposite of ease. Health is harmony, disease is discord; and while an old-school doctor may attribute illness to a mince-pie, while a mental healer will argue that functional derangements have their rise in disturbances of the mind, diverse though their opinions and methods may be, both may succeed, or possibly in some instances the disciple of Esculapius may succeed where the mental healer does not, in removing at least the symptoms of the malady. That medicine is not an exact but only an experimental science is everywhere conceded, and the simplest common sense is surely enough to convince a most ordinary thinker that to experiment with poisonous drugs and dangerous minerals is a pretty risky affair. We advocate a system which employs nothing deadly and permits the use of nothing at variance with man's highest ideal of correct and harmonious living. We place spirituality and morality in the foreground and teach a theology rather than materia medica. By a theology we mean a spiritual science, just as truly a science as geology is a science. You notice the termination of the two words is the same; the distinguishing Greek noun in the one case is theos, and in the other geos. Theos means God and all divine things, geos the earth and all terrestrial things; therefore theology should be as much a science of the heavenly world as geology is a science of the earthly state.

Anthropology, or the science of man, can never be truly taught unless we consider man as a spiritual being; the gross materialism of medical colleges brutalizes instead of elevates the students. They are taught to ignore if not to deride all things spiritual, and in their learned ignorance tap their foreheads and declare all their intelligence is boxed up in a physical brain in the interior of their heads, whereas the simplest reasoning ought to convince them that such cannot be the case, as the human brain changes as constantly and as radically as all other portions of the body, while the four great spiritual powers possessed and manifested by humanity, Memory, Understanding, Affection and Will, live on long after the molecules forming the brain have changed so entirely that probably not one of these original minute particles of matter remains. "The brain secretes thought as the liver secretes bile," is the utterance of many a college-bred young man, and medical colleges are educating women in these days to the same height or rather depth of sciolism. Life is a spiritual power, man is a spiritual being, the basis of life is spiritual. "Dust thou art, and to dust returnest," was not spoken of the soul, but only of the frail changing tenement called the physical body. These and many other aphorisms and truisms stand at the very threshold of metaphysical discoveries. The basis of our philosophy must be spiritual, and when we have found the spirit we have found the key to all the mysteries of human existence. Who can minister to minds diseased? is the question ever recurring among invalids. Popular novelists put into the mouths of their heroes and heroines the plaint, "Oh! how much longer will doctors try to discover in the body the cause and seat of these ailments which we know only too well can be found only in our sad and discontented minds?" Dyspepsia, neuralgia, consumption, liver and kidney difficulties, and a host of other distressing maladies appear in the body reflected in a mirror as it were, only after they have found a lodgment and taken their origin in a discordant mental state. Many metaphysicians say there is no body and therefore it cannot suffer. Such reasoning may be considered thorough and logical by some minds, but to the mass of humanity it does not and cannot appeal with the force of truth. We do not deny the existence of the body, though we regard it only as an effect, certainly not as a cause. Even the spiritual body, which is the real imperishable structure in which the spirit dwells or which it forms by the exercise of its volition as an instrument of expression, is only an effect of the essential life principle, without which there could be no body, which is but an instrument, the body holding the same relation to the spirit the organ holds to the organ-builder.

We can conceive of the possibility of there being in the world men who could build organs if they tried, but have never built any as yet. We can conceive of slumbering talent, sleeping causational power, if we may use such an expression; latent genius, dormant energy we meet with on every hand, but an organ without a mind to bring it into existence is an impossibility. To try and think of one is to endeavor to realize the impossible. We can conceive of spirit entirely separate from matter, dwelling in a realm of pure mind with no organ of expression, and so we can think of spiritual beings who have never had any earthly experience, but a body without a spirit is as impossible as a house without a builder. The New Testament informs us of two distinct bodies, one natural, the other spiritual. The word "natural" in that connection of course means physical or material, or, when applied to mental things, to that state of condition of mentality which man shares in common with the lower animals; there is then an animal body and also a spiritual body. You must take notice not only in reading the Bible, but also the works of Swedenborg and other spiritual philosophers and seers, that the word natural, whether rightfully or wrongfully we will not now discuss, has been used only in its lower sense, and signifies animal material, or physical, therefore it is said the natural (animal) man (or part of human nature) does not comprehend the things of the Spirit, of God. They are indeed, as Paul says, foolishness not only to the physical senses, but also to that worldly mind and proud intellect, which, though capable of amassing many important facts concerning physical existence, has no means whatever at hand for discerning spiritual truth or demonstrating immortality. It is to the spiritual body our attention is turned when we utter the oft-repeated truth, "Man never dies." The human body never dies, for the spiritual organism does not see corruption. It is not dust, from dust it did not spring, and unto dust it can never turn. It may improve, and grow more and more beauteous as ages move, but death and decay can never effectually assail it.

It is a noteworthy fact that in all ages when angels or spiritual messengers, ministering spirits, have appeared to men they have shown themselves as perfectly human in their form, and always in the enjoyment of perennial youth. The angels never grow old; they are young always, and these angels, ministering spirits or messengers, are your own brethren, members of the race to which you belong, human beings more fully developed than yourselves; as men are more fully developed than boys, and women than girls, so angels are more fully developed than men and women, and that is all the real difference there is between the angels and you, who are a little lower than they. The spiritual body cannot wear out or decay, and there is no reason why the physical body should; and here we are stating a novel and startling proposition, not new to students of the occult, not new to those who have peered deeply into Rosicrucian and other mysteries, but diametrically opposed to the prevailing belief of Christendom and all the rest of the world. We ask you to lay aside all your prejudices and preconceptions, and lend us not only your ears but your most earnest attention while we reason with you on this matter, for remember we are no dogmatists. We ask no one to agree with us, but we fully agree with the author of Proverbs in this at least, that it is a shame and folly to answer a matter before we have heard it; we must all be ready to welcome revolutionary truths, and not let the popular idols of misbelief and ignorant superstition bar for us the Golden Gates which open into the temple of heavenly wisdom.

The body is frequently compared to a machine, and a machine wears out: therefore say those who compare

"Constant use wears out my piano," says a musician, "and constant use wears out my body too, for my spirit's fleshly tabernacle is an instrument which wears out by constant use just as truly as a musical instrument grows old and useless by continued service." Now let us see whether there is really any true analogy or not between the piano and the human body. In the first place, the body is animate and the piano inanimate; that is a wide difference to start with. In the second place, the wood, wire, ivory, and all the other materials which go to make up a piano are just so much inert matter put together by mechanical skill, but endowed with no recognizable power of recuperation or increase. Can a piano lose several pounds of its weight and then recover them? If a piece is knocked off from the piano it is gone, it never replaces itself; if the bulk of the instrument is lessened it never recuperates; but man does. Man's body is not made in any sense after the fashion of a neuter machine. The physical body of man is an ever fluctuating concourse of molecules; the particles composing the human body change every moment. Thus the structure is being incessantly renewed, and this perpetual renewal of the fabric is an antidote to all destruction and decay.

The elixir of life so long sought for by the mystics could never be discovered in any powerful medicine or potent spell administered by sense, and those who become to any degree versed in the esoteric doctrine of magic know that the utmost claim made by the wise and learned initiates of secret spiritual orders was that by a life of rigid and long-continued self-discipline they could arrive at so high a point in spiritual development as to be able to look from thence with sublime indifference on all material things. They claimed, as Jesus claimed, that the highest condition of man was when he had reached a stage in his unfoldment where he could say with truth, "I have power to lay down my life and take it again, power to destroy the body, the living temple, and build it again." This power is not the exclusive right or possession of one here and there, but is common to universal humanity, and the secret of the unlimited prolongation of life in the body is the simple but all-comprehensive secret of so disciplining the lower to the higher nature, that the spirit can command the body instead of the lower passions controlling the spiritual aspirations and desires.

We do not say that physical immortality is ever desirable, but we do say that the happiest, purest, easiest, and most natural way for the spirit to quit the body is for it to withdraw from its sensuous envelope in response to a more powerful drawing toward the spiritual realm of being.

There is a vast difference between the thought of always dwelling in a material form and the thought of being able to do so if one desired. We do not believe the most perfect race of beings the planet will ever sustain upon its surface will become physically immortal, but we do believe the reason why they will not always remain on earth is because they will not wish to. Is there not a vast difference between voluntarily leaving a tenement and being rudely evicted from it? Is it not far sweeter and more reasonable to contemplate death as the voluntary severance by the spirit of the chord which binds it to the flesh than to think of death as an accident or a something dreadful and inevitable to which we must all reluctantly submit? In death robbed of its terror, regarded as a welcome change, a happy release, there is nothing to be feared; but in death as the result of accident, the effect of dissipation, or the last stage in a long, painful illness, there is indeed much to be feared and avoided if possible, and judging by all accounts received from communicating spirits who have passed through death summarily or prematurely, their condition beyond the grave is anything but an enviable one. They seem in many instances to be like poor victims of a sad catastrophe, driven from their homes, their dwellings swept away by fire and flood, while they, homeless, helpless, hungry and naked, wander as wretched mendicants around the haunts which once they called after their own names. Disease is most certainly unnatural, and so is unwelcome transition to the spirit world; the dear good old man or woman who departs in peace, having fulfilled every duty on earth, passes away, not reluctantly, but joyously; in such cases the spirit makes no effort to retain the body, but rather gladly lets it go. In many instances those who attained power to preserve their earthly forms as long as they wished, according to mystic writers, preferred to pass from the realm of mortal sense to lingering any longer here, and as Hargrave Jennings, an eminent writer on the Rosicrucian Mysteries declares, that those very men who had power to make gold by magical means no longer cared for it, as no mind bound by the love of mortal things is sufficiently emancipated from worldly desires to have attained to that sublime spir-

Disease should not be nor will it be the reason for man's passing to spirit life in the new generation. Disease is a something so repulsive, so hateful, that fortunes are spent every year in the endeavor to overcome it. The numberless doctors in every city, almost in every village — there are swarms of medical men, and most of them have a fair, some a very large practice — amply testify to the natural hatred of sickness which in every part of the world naturally fills the human breast. The greatest men of the East, the most celebrated in all history, are those who have destroyed and conquered disease and established health in its stead; but though there are a great many excellent men, ornaments to society, in the medical profession, it cannot be denied that diseases multiply, and the death rate increases in the very heart of the pretentious and highly cultured civilization of the present day. Why is it, we enquire, that while doctors multiply, so do diseases? Why is it that almost every new medical work contains a description of some new disease and how to treat it? Theological quackery has always taken for granted that children came into the world already ruined and lost. Schemes of salvation have been invented to save men from the inherited curse, and children's minds have been blighted in the bud by the inculcation of doctrines, upon which every conceivable abuse has fattened. Medical quackery has taken it for granted that children come into the world physically damned; but the medical man, unlike the priest, does not offer a full and free salvation from all the physical effects of Adam's fall, while the church does hold out

Children should never be taught to look upon disease as anything but unnatural and foreign to their original constitution. Health, not disease, should be held up before them as in accordance with nature's laws. Disease, the want of ease and its opposite, is no more natural and necessary than discords are in music. The science of melody, not of an unmelodious noise, is taught in our academies and conservatories. Truly, disease is a state of imperfection, but it is more and worse than imperfection. It is a state of inversion of good, a perverted condition, disorderly and utterly foreign to the law of growth; it is a mistake, an error, a something never to be expected, petted, fondled or condoned with. Diseases and vices are all alike tares which truth must bind in bundles for the burning in the unquenchable fire of purity and divine understanding. We must make no concessions to disease, no compromises with it. It must be attacked root as well as branch, eradicated from the system by its prior eradication from the mind, and it is this work of eradicating disease which spiritual methods are alone capable of accomplishing. Causes, not symptoms, must be attacked, for if we fail to find the source of error, no matter how often we may lop off its branches, its root remaining, it will continue to put forth new wood, new leaves, new flowers, new fruit. A razor can never do the work of a depilatory, scissors can never take the place of tweezers. External methods of treatment temporarily destroy appearances; they remove outward indications, but instead of destroying the root of the malady they essay to cure, they throw fresh strength and vigor to its already robust root.

We cannot for a moment doubt the evident sincerity and deep conscientious feeling of many who parade the vices of society before the world, and especially before the young, but while giving them credit for the goodness of their motives we are compelled to differ from them entirely in their method of operation Private lectures to young men only or to young women only are not necessarily evil, and when of a strictly anatomical and physiological character may fairly be said to constitute a legitimate fraction of collegiate education; but our deep-seated conviction is that co-education, or the equal training of both sexes in mixed schools and universities will soon completely supersede the one-sided training still so much in vogue. It seems to us for this and other yet more important reasons a mischievous concession to old fogyism for modern reformers to speak to one sex in the absence of the other on any matter in which both sexes are equally interested; and as nothing can possibly affect man without also affecting woman, and vice versa, so that system of training which seeks publicly and privately to educate men and women, girls and boys together, in all that pertains to their genuine welfare is the nearest approach to the ideal in education.

But the most important question before the world is what to teach and how to teach it. The recent celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Harvard University, one of the most celebrated and influential colleges in the world, has opened afresh the question of the true basis and best methods of human culture everywhere. Newspapers are crowded with glowing accounts of anniversary exercises, reports of brilliant speeches by eminent educators, and learned essays by worthy men and women on educational topics fill the pages of the leading magazines, while the pulpit takes as a text, "Add to your faith knowledge," and straightway discourses upon education. Education is unfoldment, not cramming; it is a healthy, natural exercise which ought to be positively delightful to all who engage in it. Instead of being regarded as an irksome task or unpleasant duty it should be unalloyed pleasure, and it is wherever the true meaning of the word is upheld in the methods employed. The trouble is that a great part of many people's time is spent in learning what they have to unlearn afterwards. Children and adults are all taught many things it can do them no good to know. The less one knows of vice the better, for knowledge of evil benefits no one. It is only the knowledge of good we require; there is infinite meaning, which does not, however, lie upon the surface in the old allegory in Genesis, of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The knowledge of good is enough, to learn evil is both a mischievous and superfluous study. Time is fleeting, and the conservation of both time and energy is the object in view in all sound ethical and economical instruction. Many persons talk ridiculously of young people seeing the world and sowing their wild oats. A popular delusion seems to have inebriated the minds of many to the effect that contact with sin is positively beneficial; thus young persons ought to see death (miserable life) in all its hideous foulness, not always indeed in the naked ugliness which is so repellant to all sensitive persons, but masked in brilliant salons, in aristocratic brothels and polite gambling hells; the cesspools of iniquity in which many young men are not only permitted, but encouraged by their elders to roam, are the plague-spots of society, the festering sores on the social body which should never be recognized except by those who recognize them only to remove them.

When we were lecturing in San Diego, in Southern California, we were questioned as to the good or harm being done by a certain Ben Hogan, who was drawing crowds nightly to a Methodist church and regaling his audience upon the sweetmeats and spices which he had carefully culled from the gaming table, the habits of confidence men and other disreputable individuals — the newspapers publishing column after column of instructions in the art of cheating. All this, remember, from the lips of a "converted" man posing in the role of evangelist, or revival preacher. Again we say we do not impute unworthy motives to the man in question or others who follow courses similar to his. We do, however, most vehemently denounce the modus operandi of any such revival work, for if it revives anything it can revive nothing but prurient curiosity and a distorted inventive genius which will in many instances set to work and endeavor to improve upon the models presented from the sensational pulpit. It is useless to say the lecture is delivered in the interests of morality, and the lecturer never finishes without sermonizing upon the wickedness and terrible consequences of such dastardly acts. The bulk of the young people in his audience who have been attracted merely for amusement are in too many instances like children who eat the middle out of a tart and leave the crust; to such the glowing accounts of vice are the jam or mincemeat, while the moral teachings between which the sensational body of the discourse is sandwiched is the forsaken and unpalatable crust and as the crust of a strictly orthodox pie is often nearly as unwholesome as the center, it may not be altogether a mistake to refuse it, for revivalists instead of dilating upon the natural and inevitable consequences of misdeeds, picture on the one hand a hell utterly at variance with all ennobling sentiment for the finally impenitent, and instant salvation, and, in the event of the body's dissolution, glorification, for all who believe then and there that Jesus is their Saviour and the atonement made on Calvary the propitiation for all their sins, past, present and to come.

We cannot be too urgent in our protest against bringing young people especially, face to face with evil; necessarily such befouling contact with pitch only blackens the one who handles it, and never does it give the slightest resisting power to those besmeared. The work of true science is to enlighten youth in true knowledge and virtue. There is no science of evil; evil is unscientific, irrational; it is opposed to all truth and right and it can never assist any one to the right knowledge of anything to be shown a picture of something maimed, hideous, distorted; such a mental image should never be allowed to pass before the mirror of the youthful mind. Plenty of evil will be brought before young people in their contact with society as at present organized in any case without teachers of morals stirring up foulness and causing their listeners to inhale the stench of error.

Just as it is with moral obliquity so is it with physical disease; to study disease or pathology, the so-called science of disease (literally a treatise upon disease, or a word about it), is to make a lamentable mistake, as it introduces a highly objectionable, an exceedingly pernicious element into a curriculum. We do not want to know anything about disease except in this sense: to know what health is, and therefore to understand that whatever is opposed to it must be disease. Take, for example, a teacher of art: he needs to show the students whom he is instructing how to draw or paint correctly, he must show them how the lines and colors should look, how they should blend; his incessant and untiring endeavor is to place the true model, the correct ideal, before them; in their ignorance and inexperience, and too often through carelessness, they will do a good deal of bad work, they will disfigure paper and canvas by crooked lines and discordant combinations of color; but it is not for the teacher to imitate their errors and discords, wasting time, energy and material in multiplying incorrectness. He must be in all things faithful to his highest ideal of right and perfection. If the lesson is only how to draw a line, the teacher must draw the line correctly and never any other way than correctly. The student must become familiar with the perfect line, see it before his mind's eye, and by constantly gazing at it and dwelling upon it he will at length be able to duplicate it. Now, nothing is so necessary in a college of health as to get the minds of students and invalids onto health and away from disease. Everything in the house should be harmonious, colors should blend, forms should be true to nature, sounds should be melodious, everything grating and jarring should be rigorously excluded, and, above all, patients should never be encouraged to talk about their ailments. Disease is not a proper subject for conversation. It is well enough to mention it confidentially to an experienced friend, or one to whom you apply for relief, but to make it a topic of discussion on ordinary occasions is both poisonous and disgusting, as many persons are so pitiably sensitive to the feelings of others, and many have such vivid imaginations, that they are at once made unwell themselves by hearing of the sicknesses of others. A hospital for this reason is often a nursery for disease; dormitories filled with ailing and complaining patients, moaning and sighing, turning restlessly from side to side on their uneasy couches, prevent recovery among sensitive people, despite all the care and kindness of doctors, nurses and attendants. The same is true of lunatic asylums, prisons and penitentiaries. In all such institutions, no matter how good the management and efficient the officials, the inmates corrupt each other as one breathes disease and insanity from the atmosphere impregnated with noxious emanations. A vitiated room from which air and sunlight are excluded is a chamber of death, but when poisonous gases breathed from the patients add to the unwholsomeness of the in any case "sick chamber," the combination of horrors is fearful to contemplate.

Thanks to the progressive spirit of the present, sanitation is being made a study; ventilation is receiving attention, sunshine is being welcomed, and forms of treatment are surely if slowly becoming less barbaric, but the institutional fever shows little signs of abatement even yet; to mass sufferers, lunatics and criminals together is still the prevailing custom and idea, and until such ideas and practices are fully eliminated from society disease will increase, crime will multiply, and organic efforts to check it will prove ineffectual. In short, metaphysical methods, though in perfect harmony with sanitary and dietetic measures, though in full sympathy with every effort to put virtue and cleanliness to the front in place of vice and dirt, are at deadly variance with all those antiquated hospital and asylum theories which still hold sway in popular belief. Overcome evil with good, is the adage of all true metaphysicians. This good is health versus disease, sanity versus insanity, virtue versus vice. To isolate the sick and then surround them with the healthy, to isolate the insane and give them thoroughly sane companions, to isolate the vicious and put them in the society of the positively virtuous, is the key to complete reformation in medicine and reform. Whenever possible, patients should be treated in their own homes, and every true healer must teach his patient the science of health, thereby making him strong to resist disease in future.

LECTURE IV.

PRAYER AS A HEALING AGENT.

FROM the earliest times, prayer has been assigned a prominent place in therapeutics, not indeed by the hard-headed scholars and materialistic philosophers who pride themselves on what is now popularly regarded as scientific agnosticism, but by the great mass of mankind, and we can never overlook the fact that the majority of men and women are not and never have been great thinkers. Emotion sways a far larger multitude than can be influenced by cold logic. Thus the logician may have a select, but usually only a small assembly to address, while the emotional enthusiast, no matter how illogical or even irrational his conclusions, usually finds himself when on the platform face to face with a numerous auditory. It is just so with literature. The books most widely read are never those which appeal to the profoundest depth of human intellect. They are sensational and romantic treatises dealing with the affections rather than the reason. Love stories flood the book-market, and they always find a sale, while purely scientific works have only a very limited circulation. It cannot be denied that mankind in general is far more emotional than rational. They are far more religiously than scientifically disposed; for if today scientists may be

Religious belief is natural to the race. It cannot be eradicated; all endeavors to eliminate it must entirely prove futile, for it is an essential product of human nature; but like all other tendencies, it does mischief when allowed to run wild; it needs training, disciplining and hedging round with reasonable walls or fences of intellectual restraint. The emotions, sentiments, feelings, all need to be assigned to their proper places; their functions need to be studied, and their culture and exercise made a matter of the most careful consideration. Emotion is essential to love, for love is itself an emotion, or at any rate it is the source of emotion. Hate and dislike are only inversions or perversions of its expression. Religion is truly founded in love; thus the two greatest commandments of religion are, Thou shalt love God and thou shalt love thy neighbor. All religious sentiments, duties and obligations take their rise and find their fulfillment in love. God is love; love is the supreme good; without it there can be no virtue worthy the name either in theory or practice. Even the old Roman idea of virtue, as synonymous with valor, courage, bravery, had its source in love. Men love their country, their homes, their families, their co-patriots; therefore they are ready to fight for them. They even shed the last drop of their heart's blood for what they love the best. Whatever is beloved has its valiant defenders and, if need be, its martyrs, but whatever calls forth no affection inspires no heroism, no ardor, no devotion. We all know how potent is the spell of affection; it is stronger than all beside; it is the absolutely unconquerable element in man's constitution which links him to deity and immortality. Love inspires prayer, and true prayer is nothing more nor less than love in exercise. Prayer must be regarded as affection struggling to accomplish wonders on behalf of a beloved object. As love laughs at bolts and bars and undertakes to effect an escape from prison which reason could never pronounce feasible, so love lays hold upon infinite benevolence, allies itself with faith, forms allegiances with hope, and controls both faith and hope, using them as servants to do its bidding. Love is mightier than either faith or hope, mightier than both combined, but employs these sister graces in the accomplishment of its end. It takes them indeed into partnership with itself; but they are juniors, it is ever the senior and the director of the firm.

Prayer is spoken of as foolish by many who do not understand it and cannot comprehend its relation to eternal and unchanging law. From their standpoint it is folly to pray; prayer to them is idle breath, and were they to attempt to pray in their present frame of mind, unless the attempt to put prayer to a fair test changed their position and personality, they would utterly fail to gain answer to their petitions because in reality though seeming to pray they would not and could not pray at all. Prayer is the outgoing of spiritual energy; prayer is no rival of work, no substitute for earnest and practical effort. It is work, only it is not work of any ostensible kind. It is not physical employment, but it is the putting forward of the most earnest effort of the spirit. It is sometimes hard, even painful, agonizing work. It uses every nerve of the spirit, it strains every fibre of the mental being;

thus many persons are exhausted through the fervor of their supplications; they are positively worn out mentally and physically, through the hard work some earnest prayer has been to them. True prayer, however, does not of necessity involve difficult and trying labor. On the other hand, quite the opposite; for when rightly understood and intelligently made use of, the agency of prayer is the exercise of the sweetest, calmest and most tranquilizing of all the powers and activities of our being. Let us consider prayer under several distinct heads.

First, does prayer, or does it not, presuppose fickleness on the part of Deity, or mutability in the law governing the universe? We answer unequivocally, without an instant's hesitancy, true prayer acknowledges first and last the unchangeableness of Deity and universal law. How then does prayer accomplish anything if God and law are immutable? Precisely in the way that all work is rewarded and industry crowned. We must understand what the universal, immutable law is before we undertake to say what can and what cannot transpire beneath its sovereignty. On the question of universality and immutability of law in the universe most thinkers are agreed, but on the question, what is the source and character of this all-pervading and all-prevailing law? philosophers differ widely. Theism postulates law as the manifestation of intelligence; it conceives of Infinite Mind as the original inspiration of law, but atheism considers law to be supreme over intelligence and the cause of it. To use a favorite expression, and adopt a favorite method of those calling themselves agnostics or materialists, reasoning from the known to the unknown, from the seen to the unseen, from the physical to the spiritual, from effect to cause, let us see where we will be landed. Will it be in the arms of cold, unfeeling force, or in those of warm, conscious and loving intelligence? There can be in the earthly state no law without pre-directing mind. Laws are not the creators of will; the laws of a country or a state do not pre-exist and then slowly evolve will in the persons whom they govern; but will is in every case the source of the being, and the only means of the enforcement of law. If we then have to do in universal nature with an Infinite Intelligence, an all-directing mind, and if we ourselves are recipients of the Divine nature, may there not be infinite truth in the Scripture passage, "God worketh in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure?" God works in us, God prays to us. We hear the supplicatory voice of the spirit of the Eternal in our own souls whenever conscience speaks, for conscience is not as some vainly imagine — a mere product of earthly training to be altered and modified by changing beliefs and circumstances. Conscience is collective knowledge, universal knowledge, concrete information, truth heard and known to some extent by all humanity.

Dr. Solomon Schindler, in a very excellent discourse delivered in the Columbus Avenue Jewish temple, pointed out to his audience one of the most striking illustrations of the fact of the Divine indwelling, when he showed how human ideas of wrong always remained, but they grew keener and more vivid as a brighter light of truth and knowledge illumined man's understanding. We think more things wrong today than we formerly did, because we have keener perceptions of right as a people than the Israelites had in the days of David and Solomon. But we never call that good which our ancestors regarded as evil, while we do consider many things evil they in their ignorance at least tolerated as allowable. Every one of the ten commandments constituting the Decalogue still remains at the foundation of all enlightened jurisprudence the world over. To acknowledge one only God, to refrain from evil speech, to observe one day out of every seven for rest, to do no murder, to commit no adultery, to deal honestly and bear only true witness, and to covet naught, all these are commands engraven on the heart of society. Truth when once apprehended is never lost sight of by the world. Truth never becomes falsehood, wrong never becomes right. We do not all hear the voice of truth with equal distinctness; we do not all enjoy an equally abundant moral revelation, but so far as it expresses itself at all, the moral sense is the same in every human being the wide world over. We must never let go of the proposition, there is an absolute right and an eternal distinction between right and wrong in the very nature of things. Sophistry alone endeavors to rob us of our moral heritage and becloud the clear vision of the immortal soul.

It is natural to man to ally himself with celestial power, to seek divine help and heavenly aid in every time of doubt, difficulty and trouble. The very act of prayer is a conscious and effective effort put forth by man in reasonable hope of achieving by means of it a definite and desired result. Half-way fatalism, with its manifold errors and inconsistencies, is always ready to step in and declare prayer to be foolish and valueless, because prayer as a spiritual power cannot be measured and detected by earthly standards. The thoroughgoing fatalist, if there is such a person living, must deny the possibility of changing any conceivable condition in any part of the universe by any conceivable kind of effort on the part of man. Therefore, all action is either inevitable or useless. We must either consider ourselves entirely incompetent to accomplish anything by any sort of endeavor, or we must allow that all our endeavors are foreordained and part of an infinite plan we have no hand in altering. If fatalistic argument is sound, even fatalism itself does not necessarily offer any objection to the efficacy of prayer; it merely compels us to consider ourselves in the light of machines, and our prayers as a part of the inevitable working of the clock-work arrangement of our being. Prayers are answered at all events; to say the least, they appear to be answered. They are not in vain, for many and many a sufferer who has vainly sought relief in all other directions has found relief in prayer. Let scoffers say it is fancied or imaginary relief, let them in their supercilious contempt for all things spiritual declare prayer to be consummate folly, an exercise unworthy of rational beings; their vulgar jibes and sneers can never alter facts, which indeed are stubborn things. The efficacy of prayer is a demonstrated fact in this world in the nineteenth century, and if imagination and fancy can be induced by prayer, and these are such powerful therapeutic agents that can relieve suffering and cure distressed maladies, if they can turn despair into hope, misery into joy, complaint into thanksgiving, then let us thank God for having so constituted us that we are amenable to the blessed curative influences of fancy and imagination.

But what are fancy and imagination? can skepticism decide? Are they not mysteries, well nigh insoluble factors in human economy? The word "imagination" leads us to suppose that, when we imagine anything, something is imagined upon our brain or some state of our consciousness; to imagine is to reflect an image; something impresses the brain and imprints thereon a likeness of itself which we see with the mind's eye, independent of the physical organs of vision. Imagination should not be repudiated or laughed to scorn as it too often is, but carefully and scientifically recognized and cultivated; imagination and fancy need careful training and discipline it is true, not repression, they are spiritual and mental powers of great importance and interest to us all and can be so utilized as to render unspeakable benefit to their possessors and cultivators.

A great many answers to prayer, so-called, are simply results of stimulated fancy or quickened imagination; but the peculiar state of activity into which these powers have been brought by the effort of prayer has proved itself therapeutically indispensable under the existing circumstances. When some years ago Prof. Tyndall proposed his "prayer test," which excited so much controversy and feeling both in scientific and religious circles, he entirely failed to comprehend the true nature of prayer and showed himself totally destitute of knowledge on spiritual subjects. If prayer were an outward, formal, mechanical act consisting in the repetition of certain formulated phrases, it would be easy enough to employ prayer in one hospital, but not in another; but as true prayer is entirely distinct from ritual observance and is an emotion of the spirit, an inspiration of the mind, not the parrot-like repetition of stereotyped words, Prof. Tyndall could have no possible means of knowing where prayer was offered and where it was not; he could only tell where an outward form of words was employed, and the employment of a set form of words or the introduction of the element of outward speech into prayer is not regarded as essential by any true believer in the efficacy of prayer.

In the New Testament prayer is permitted orally and possibly recommended in the adoption of the paternoster as a model form of prayer; but Jesus laid by far the greater stress on silent, secret prayer, the prayer of the retired chamber, the prayer of the earnest soul, pouring out its petitions at the throne of heaven, when no earthly eye or ear could see or hear. In a hospital oral prayer might be peremptorily forbidden, an intolerant board of directors might refuse to sanction any kind of religious service on the premises, but no managers could force the souls of the inmates to be silent; watchers might be stationed at every bedside, to prevent the slightest semblance to a prayer escaping from the lips of any person in the building, but all the while that prayer was forcibly interdicted the most earnestly heartfelt, the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous, which availeth much, might be ascending like fragrant incense to spiritual realms and obtaining from thence responses so marvelous that the materialists who had forbidden prayer could only attribute signal cases of unexpected recovery in their wards to the inexplicable action of undefined laws and forces of nature.

Prayer is not confined to locality. It matters not how far away the one may be who prays for a sufferer.

A prayer offered in India is as effective for an invalid in London as though offered in the British metropolis at the patient's bedside. It is, therefore, impossible to interdict prayer, which is a lifting up of the spiritual nature in confident expectancy of winning a suit in a heavenly court. Prayer, moreover, does not depend for its efficacy upon the correctness of the suppliant's creed; prayers are offered to the Eternal under the greatest variety of names. Jehovah, Brahma, Allah, Jesus, are all names frequently used in prayer to designate the Supreme Being. From the point of view of controversial theology they cannot possibly be all correct, as they do not all represent the same idea of Deity. Jehovah is a distinctly Jewish conception of the Infinite Being. Indeed, there are two distinct and widely divergent ideas embodied in this mysterious name. Jehovah, or Yahveh, represents the Eternal Being, infinite in power and majesty to the most advanced and illumined seers and sages of the house of Israel; but to the ordinary undeveloped Hebrew mind Jehovah is a local and titular being, the unseen head or president of the Jewish clan, a tribal divinity, who takes up arms for Israel against all its oppressors. Etymologically speaking, the name legitimately represents the Infinite, as it signifies the always-enduring, the ever-living; but no matter what the word itself may mean to scholars, when used in prayer its value depends solely upon the idea associated with it in the mind of the worshiper. Thus we can readily see how very wide apart in thought and feeling many Jews may be while they all address Jehovah in their prayers. One addresses the Infinite Being, boundless, ineffable. He endeavors to affix no limits to the being and love of God. He views the Supreme Intelligence as an infinite fountain of matchless justice, love, truth and wisdom, utterly incapable of an emotion of fanaticism or partiality toward any race or individual, while another, using the same outward form of prayer, pictures before his mental vision a capricious Deity, who fights for one race under all circumstances against all others for the sole reason that he has elected Jacob's descendants to share in his covenant of mercy. The prayers arising from the minds of two such widely different classes of religionists (though sheltered under the cover of a common family name, the poles asunder in belief and sentiment) would necessarily induce totally different results in the suppliants who offered them, and draw responses from widely separated planes of spiritual existence.

Take now the name of Jesus as a very common example of similar diversity of thought and object; no two minds conceive of Jesus in exactly the same way, while different bodies of professing Christians have persecuted each other even to death on account of diversity of view regarding Jesus. Calvin and Servetus were both Christians; both called on Jesus to deliver them in their hour of need, but one called Jesus "God the Son," the other called him the "Son of God," and for this difference in expression one believed the other to be in danger of everlasting condemnation. There can be little question of the sincerity of either the apostle of Geneva or the celebrated Socinian whose death he instigated. Such a terrible result of verbal and creedal bigotry is only valuable as a most powerful incentive against attaching too much importance to creeds, dogmas and expressions, while the real worth of religion, its spiritual element, is ignored and well nigh forgotten. We cannot, however, if we study spiritual laws and principles fail to see to what an immense extent our motive or intention in prayer determines the result. The Roman Catholic Church has always laid great stress on direction of intention. The same prayers, almost invariably the Paternoster and Ave Maria, are repeated, whether the object be one of universal or private and personal import. Masses are said in the same words for widely different intentions, and it is always claimed that masses and prayers bring about the special ends for which they were offered. The spiritual truth veiled in this practice does not lie near the surface: we have to dig deep into the wells of mind to find an adequate reason for this belief. If prayers were answered according to the letter of a petition, then it would matter very little what the state of mind might be so long as the correct words were uttered.

Such a foolish belief appears to hold sway not only among those pagans who use praying machines, which grind out prayers as a hand-organ grinds out music, but among many whose so-called Christian education ought to have instilled far more enlightened ideas into their minds. What is really no prayer at all is often confounded with prayer, and prayer is therefore brought into disrepute, insulted and ridiculed, because the common sense of the country cannot see the utility of a pretender masquerading as a genuine spiritual power. In many houses of worship prayer is brought into disrepute more than in any infidel lecture hall or atheistic publication; the stale jokes and supercilious jibes of the worst kind of atheistic attack on spiritual truth are furnished by the ridiculous mummeries of professedly religious people; the very persons who are most punctilious in their outward observances of religion are frequently religion's worst enemies, not of course intentionally, and not always hypocritically, as many persons who are no hypocrites are simply thoughtless conformists to an ancient habit, and go along with prescribed "devotions," because their ancestors were accustomed to say the prayers they repeat daily.

Reform in religious worship today shows itself nowhere so advantageously as in the changes made in old liturgies. Take the orthodox Jewish service for example. Not only is it tedious in the extreme on the mornings of all fasts and festivals, and a considerable tax on the ordinary attendant at a synagogue at the usual Sabbath morning service, not only does it contain no end of phrases utterly out of keeping with the best sentiment of the age and entirely foreign to the condition of all civilized communities, but on account of its extreme length and extraordinary complexion it is usually gabbled through with by the reader, while many of the congregation talk to each other in their seats, and scarcely make a show of giving it any attention. Then we may ask, why do they attend the synagogue regularly; are we to censoriously condemn them and uncharitably number them among that worst element in the sect of the Pharisees which receives such scathing denunciation in the New Testament? Are we to conclude that they are sharks and Shylocks, men without mercy, pretenders to religion for the sake of gain? By no means. They are simply superstitious, modern Kabalists of the unenlightened type; shrewd men of business they often are, but frequently honest in their transactions, kind and merciful to the poor and the distressed, good husbands, fathers, brothers, citizens and friends; they are simply in matters of religion creatures of habit; they believe in some vague, mysterious way that a peculiar value attaches to certain old forms of words muttered over in certain supposed holy places at holy times; they have borrowed from antiquity the customs of Oriental Kabalists without understanding, as the uninitiated never did understand, the inner significance of Kabalistic incantations.

The enlightened spirit of today wants no Kabala, or if retaining one at least proposes to translate and understand it, and if employing it at all use it with the intellect, not ignorantly, as a savage employs a talisman. In the Episcopal Church of England and America, as well as in the Greek and Roman churches, we find many vestiges of Kabalism, though the ordinary English country squire does not look much like an Oriental advocate of mysticism. The principle, however, is the same; you must go to church, you must read or say your prayers. As to praying, that is quite another thing, even an extemporaneous form of words is discountenanced by extreme liturgists; not even a clergyman is expected to pray except from memory or from a book; the living thought and living word are checked in favor of stereotyped formularies, yet many attendants on Episcopal churches say they have everything they need in their prayer-book. They may have a "sound form of words," but soul cannot be printed, published and sold at every bookstand.

that we can feel a real spiritual force emanating from the reader and inspiring us to lift up our hearts to God; but too often the prayers are read off mechanically without awakening any responsive feelings in the hearts of the auditors, who ought to be, and professedly are, worshipers. Not only in churches where liturgies are employed, but in many denominations where they are frowned upon, prayers are studied beforehand, fixed up to look nice, committed to memory until they look like dudes and dandies aping a clerical costume; they sound like ripples of soft music on the cultured ear; they are refined, scholarly, tasteful, gentlemanly, ladylike, artistic, poetical prayers; but how often are they true prayers, how often are they prayers at all? When the Angel of Prayer travels over the earth, according to a beautiful Eastern legend, to gather the prayers of humanity and bear them aloft to the throne of God, how much incense do you think he receives from the prayers of those who are renowned for the exquisite loveliness in which is couched their anything but heartfelt petitions? Nothing to us is more repellant than something not a prayer, trying to appear such! We do not, we beg of you to remember, bring a charge of insincerity against any sect of persons, neither do we urge the discontinuance of any liturgy and litany any of you may find helpful in your own lives, but we do ask you to consider that you may teach children to say their prayers day and night, yet never teach them to pray. Indeed, it is hardly necessary to teach, or to try to teach them to pray. True prayer is spontaneous, ejaculatory; it is involuntary, as natural as breath. It would require an effort to keep it back; to repress it would be to strangle, to suffocate spirituality. Just as where there is fire there is always smoke as a consequence, so where there is true devotion in the spirit, prayer results as a necessary consequence. What then about public prayers offered audibly in the midst of public assemblies by a person appointed to conduct or take part in a religious service? All we can say is that if a real prayer is forthcoming in such a place at such a time, no matter whether the words are extemporized, read or given off from memory, the necessary conditions to make a prayer is that the soul dictates and speaks through the utterance. When that is the case every one in the room feels a spiritual presence and acknowledges the kindling of a supernal fire. Some advanced minds of today use the word aspiration instead of prayer. Perhaps it is on such occasions very often the fitter word of the two. To aspire is to pray; it is to desire, to mentally ask, and therefore, physically, to place one's self in a receptive attitude to receive present blessings. Our own idea of true prayer is exceedingly simple; any child can understand it; and whenever we have been asked to address young people on prayer, we have found most of them catch the idea immediately. By prayer we no more undertake to change any law or reverse any established rule in nature than we do by opening a window, inserting a ventilator in a wall, ploughing the earth, irrigating the soil, pruning the fruit trees, taking exercise, food, sleep, or a bath, or, in a word, doing anything to change outward conditions in ourselves or our surroundings, by intelligent compliance with natural demands, and by sagacious and industrious coöperation with nature's laws and provisions. Now, one of the most formidable objections against prayer is, we can neither change God nor nature. Certainly we cannot, and we do not attempt to. But there is no law of God or nature which, when we understand it, does not make provision for some exertion on our part, for some exercise of our free agency. To revert to the fatalistic objection, all our reply to the fatalist is, if everything is ordained, our prayers are ordained. We cannot, in that case, help praying, if we pray, and thus prayer becomes a part of the universal plan, and must be recognized as a divinely appointed agent in bringing about a predetermined result. Many physicians and fatalists scoff at prayer; they tell us all spiritual aid is sought in vain, but at the same time they give you powerful material remedies and tell you that you are violating all reason and common sense if you do not swallow their nostrums. Now, on the plane of physical sense, called by some metaphysicians the substratum of the mortal mind, material agents doubtless have a certain value; certainly that value must have been originally imparted to them by mind and can at any time be augmented or decreased and in many instances created, or removed in toto, by mental action. We say to all such objecting doctors, if you can believe in the potency of your drugs, minerals and manipulations, surely if you have the slightest apprehensions of spiritual relations at all; you can conceive of prayer being effectual in healing the sick, if only by an excitation of those feelings and affections which in all cases must be aroused, or recovery is impossible. Prayer is a voluntary act of the mind, undertaken with a direct and specific object. Some special desire is uppermost in the mind, and by mental effort a sufferer, or a friend of a sufferer on his behalf, offers up a petition to the highest power he can spiritually or mentally apprehend, and in doing so he opens a window in his spiritual being through which healing sunshine and air can enter. The mind totally engrossed in worldly affairs, wholly occupied with mortal beliefs and pursuits, fails to realize the spiritual help which is ever ready to the hands of all who stretch out their hands to take it. You may suffocate on a windy day in a close room, no matter how much light or air there may be outside, if your windows are closed, your curtains drawn, every crevice hermetically sealed against approaches and influences from without. It is all in vain, so far as you are concerned, that the day is fine, the sun shining brightly, balmy breezes blowing and birds sweetly singing, if you are imprisoned in a cellar which you need not live in by any provision of nature; either by your own or another's wrong and foolish act you are doomed to unnatural incarceration, into your chamber of death life-giving influences, freely dispensed abroad for the good of all, cannot enter. Change all that, remove all those barriers which keep you from the enjoyment of universal benefactions, and without the slightest change having taken place in the order of nature, or any of God's appointments, your condition is in an instant reversed. Prayer is the stretching out of a spiritual hand to unbar a door, to unlock a window, to open a ventilator in the chamber of the mind. Prayer is answered, and the posture of the mind is of the utmost importance. We may open our windows to the north, and invite the cold, bleak breezes from the pole, or we may open them to the south and welcome the warm breezes from the tropics; we can make our rooms front to the east and thereby enjoy the morning sun, or we can face the west and see only its setting glories; or we can have rooms so constructed that there are windows all round, and then from all points of the compass we can derive the invigoration and blessing nature so freely bestows on all who ask for a share in her bounties. Let us be very wary of praying unadvisedly to God for what only a power of darkness could grant; let us be extremely careful, ever on our guard, lest selfishness, jealousy, and fear, or any unjust rivalries or unduly emulous feeling should dictate our prayer, and thus bring us into relation with the very elements and agents we most desire and need to shun. Above all things, let us never consent to pray for anything we do not conscientiously feel it would be for the best interests of humanity for us to have, for wherever self and self-love are uppermost in our hearts, wherever our affections are inordinately set on private advantage, wherever our own personal welfare or that of some individual we elect to unduly favor, dictates petition, we do not pray in truth or for truth, we do not pray in the spirit of universal love or wisdom, and therefore do not enter into true relations with any beneficent source whence divine inspiration can proceed. In our next address we will indulge in further explanations and specific illustrations, and take up the latest theosophical deliverance on this question, with a view to aiding you to put prayer to as much good use as possible.

LECTURE V.

PRAYER AS A HEALING AGENT. PART II.

PRAYER TO GOD AND TO INDIVIDUAL SPIRITS.—HOW, WHY, AND UNDER WHAT CIRCUMSTANCES IS IT ANSWERED?

IN our last address we laid what we intended to be, and we hope will prove, a solid and reasonable foundation for what is now to follow on the all-absorbing question of the nature and efficacy of prayer, especially as applied to the healing of the sick. It may strike some of our hearers and readers, that we do not confine ourselves very closely to the simple fact of healing; we do not attempt or desire to do so in any restricted sense, as we do not regard the power to heal the sick as a solitary gift or endowment, but rather as a result of a combination of powers and developments in the successful practitioner. That there is such a gift as the gift of healing, or that there are such gifts as the gifts of healing, as Paul states in his epistle to the Corinthians, we freely admit, and all such gifts we gladly recognize whenever our attention is called to their spontaneous outburst. But then there are an immense variety of gifts, all of which are so closely allied to acquirements that it is almost impossible to separate one from the other, fully. Take music as an illustration, and Mozart as a sample of natural genius. It is perfectly true that the gift of music, the fire of natural genius very conspicuously manifested itself in him while he was yet a little boy, still, no one who is in the slightest degree acquainted with the history of his subsequent career can ever fail to admire his earnest and persistent endeavor to utilize that gift to its very utmost. When he composed his greatest works he was both a gifted and an educated musician.

We think it is a grave error to preach a doctrine of human irresponsibility in the presence of divine and natural gifts; for, though we are not responsible for our natural and unsolicited abilities, and we are not deserving either of praise or blame for what seems thrust upon us by a power which acts independently of our volition, we are without question very deeply responsible for the use we make of the gifts bestowed, and we think if you study the matter carefully you will all arrive at the conclusion that in many instances gifts are rewards, and genius is the outgrowth of applied energy. Many persons who believe in and advocate what is called the "prayer cure," use a spiritual power which they do not understand, almost at random. Their intentions are excellent, their motives sincere, their dispositions benevolent, and, as a consequence of their real desire to help humanity through their intercession with the Almighty, they are instrumental in many cases in raising up those who are seemingly on the brink of the grave. But they give offence to many equally well disposed people whose minds take a more scientific turn as their methods seem to such to savor of fanaticism and superstition, while scientists of every name appear almost blasphemous to the simple-minded enthusiasts who recognize God as a Supreme Sovereign over all natural law with which, according to their theory, He interferes on their behalf in answer to their cry.

Now two facts have to be taken into consideration and carefully met in these present days; truths can never antagonize, facts can never be opposed to each other, however much they may appear to disagree. If we cannot reconcile truth with truth, and fact with fact, it is no argument against the perfect friendliness of all truths and facts to each other; it simply shows to us how limited are our powers and how small our knowledge.

Nothing seems more incontestable than the proposition that there is only one law of the universe which can never be reversed or set aside from its regular course under any circumstances whatever; with this law no Deity ever seems to interfere. The further we advance in scientific studies, the more deeply we investigate the mysteries of being, the more certain do we feel that there is an eternal, immutable, irreversible law which never varies. On the other hand the burden of proof on the side of the reality of what are called miracles (now occurring) is so overwhelming that we are forced, no matter how unwillingly on the part of some of us, to what at first sight looks like a counterconclusion, viz., that there is some power in the universe, and moreover, a power somewhat subject to the will and prayer of man, which does set aside what are commonly regarded as the fixed laws of nature. Out of the first part of our statement Atheists derive all their support, and out of the second portion of it believers in miracles derive their argument.

of Atheism and the equal fallacy of what is often designated supernaturalism. The truth lies between these two extremes or poles of thought. Granting an immutable law is not necessarily granting anything more than an immutable Deity. If God is immutable and if the law of nature is His law, why should it not be or how can it not be immutable like its author. The mutability of earthly laws springs from the mutability of their framers and enforcers. The immutability of divine law (and natural law is divine) springs from the fact that God never changes, and therefore his mode of action never changes. Universal law is, correctly speaking, neither more nor less than the unvarying habit of the Infinite Being. But to grant the immutability of law is only to grant one of its characteristics. An immutable law may be kind, cruel, wise, foolish, just, unjust, and still immutable. It may make infinite room for human freedom or no room for it at all, and yet be immutable. The single attribute of immutability covers relatively very little of the ground we desire to go over, and we shall never understand our subject if we confine ourselves to a cold, sterile belief in immutable law or even in an unchanging God, unless we go further into an examination of what the law is we agree in calling immutable.

It is an immutable law, so far as any one can discover, that an egg requires just so much heat to hatch the bird out of it. Nature left to herself provides the heat in the body of the mother bird, but does not refuse to allow you to invent an artificial incubator. A certain amount of heat is imperatively demanded, that must be supplied or the chicken will not be hatched, but nature does not seem to lay down any arbitrary law as to where the heat comes from or how it shall be generated. A law stares us in the face which we cannot get over, we cannot hatch the chicken without heat; but if you can devise unusual means for generating and supplying that heat, nature allows the result you desire to follow just as though the ordinary measures had been adopted.

The most surprising wonders of the Orient, according to those who have most carefully studied them, are just as amenable to a fixed and universal law as are the most common occurrences of every day life. If a mango tree blossoms in a few minutes from the seed of a gourd, nature's processes are simply accelerated by unwonted aid, and what is known as forcing is carried on to an extent so surprising as to suggest to the uninitiated the idea of a suspension of natural law. Now when we pray do we or do we not put forward some energy which brings about a result? Is there or is there not something going from the suppliant to the one who is eventually healed, or in the case of prayer for one's own recovery, is there or is there not something used by the patient to heal himself? We believe that whenever a person uses prayer and succeeds in healing himself by means of it he uses a spiritual force within himself which is just as much, yea, far more a remedial agent than any physician's prescription can be. When he prays for another and that other is healed apparently in direct answer to prayer, as no other reason can be assigned for his unexpected recovery, a force is communicated to the sufferer, from the one who offers prayer that he may get well; the cure is therefore performed in what is really a perfectly natural way, albeit in a manner usually called supernatural by those who limit nature to the narrow domain of their own personal acquaintance with it. We know many people will step up just here and tell us we are ruling God out of all our calculations, ignoring divine aid and substituting for it some magical virtue inherent in human nature. We are doing nothing of the kind, though we are acknowledging the operation of divine power in its own way and through its own appointed channels. It is an unmistakable fact in nature that we must all sow in order to reap, or even if we apparently reap what others have sown, the very act of reaping implies effort; we get nothing for nothing, whatever we obtain we have got hold of by the putting forward of some energy physical or mental; it does not then appear that God chooses to work for us independently of us, and if we can be sure of one thing more than another, we can feel most abundantly certain that God insists upon it that we shall work for one another and be his agents and ministers in dispensing his blessings among our fellow beings. Christian Scientists, as they call themselves, are very apt to speak in ignorance disparagingly of the assistance rendered by spirit friends to their kindred on earth, but whenever they do so they resort to worn-out platitudes concerning the privilege we enjoy of going directly to God and thereby avoiding the necessity of relying in any sense on human or angelic instrumentality. Their aguments usually fall worthless to the ground by reason of their perpetual misstatement of views they undertake to denounce. Men of straw are built up with much elaborateness and then with great energy demolished. More than once we have been told that we were guilty of a species of idolatry if we imagined we could do anything to assist God. As we never imagined we could assist the Infinite the arrow was pointless and hit nowhere; but if we gratefully acknowledge the Infinite Goodness in working by us and through us to accomplish his beneficent designs while we confessedly owe everything to God, we do not refuse to acknowledge the modes of divine operation chosen by the Infinite Mind. If you give a treatment and that treatment is successful, no matter how you give it, you employ energy in giving it; if it is only a lesson in truth, you must so present the truth that it will be accepted or the lesson is not received. To bring the truth home with power to the mind of your patient is the one thing needful; to do so you must exercise your own spiritual nature in harmony with the divine intent. Prayer seems to us nothing more than spiritual effort; incantations are vain, mere words are valueless in themselves, formulas are dead letters unless a living spirit breathes through them; but when what Montgomery calls "the soul's sincere desire unuttered or expressed, the motion of a hidden fire which trembles in the breast," is brought into active exercise with beneficent intent, work is being done, the soul is engaged in profitable industry, and the answer to prayer comes through the working of that universal law which compensates the toiler for his effort. Now let us look at some of the aspects of this question of prayer which call for especial review at the present time. All over Christian Europe, Jesus and his mother are said to have appeared in certain places, performed miracles there and ordained that pilgrims who visit consecrated shrines should be made whole, no matter what disorder they may be laboring under. These shrines have been and still are sources of immense benefit in a financial sense to the Roman Catholic Church. Witness the magnificent church at Lourdes erected through the offerings of pilgrims, see the crutches hanging up in many of the churches, see the medals reaching from floor to ceiling in many a lofty chapel, and then inquire into the likelihood of the apparitions which gave birth to such singular devotion. Easily enough you may dismiss the whole subject with a sneer, and having contemptuously hissed out "nothing but superstition," refuse to bestow any further thought on the matter. The question then arises, is not superstition a therapeutic agent of great value? and if people are by nature superstitious let superstition be cultivated by all means if it produces such benign results; but we cannot dismiss the subject in any such summary manner,— there is something far more real than superstition at the bottom of these "miracles of healing," as they are called. An undoubted spiritual power is at work in all those places, and to find out what that power is and how it works is one of the most interesting and useful psychological studies of the day. No further away than Hoboken Monastery, in New York, and the Portuguese Church in North Bennett Street, Boston, have persons been cured of long-standing and distressful maladies when brought face to face with "holy relics" at Hoboken, and water from a "holy well" in Boston. Then among Protestants we have the striking case of Dr. Cullis' work at the Consumptives' Home, Roxbury, where nothing but simple prayer is relied on. Patients do recover; though some do not, the fact that any respectable percentage get well is enough to commend the mode of cure to enlightened study. A very pertinent query sometimes indeed often raised is, do not the patients carry enough faith with them to cure them any way, and is not the simple fact of the mental tranquillity and hopefulness consequent upon that faith a sufficient reason for their cure? We have to answer in the light of facts, in a few instances yes, but in the majority of cases no; for the surprising feature of the subject is that some who have faith are not cured, and those who have no faith to start with get well the soonest. Usually a positive, determined mind is influenced by its own beliefs and unbeliefs far more than a susceptible, pliant individual who easily yields, often without knowing it, to the beliefs of those around him. Belief seems a somewhat positive attitude of the mind. If one believes anything it seems as though he has thought about it and come to some kind of a conclusion regarding it; but when a person is totally ignorant of the theory or method of practice, and is carried helpless into an institution, expecting perhaps to die in a few days or weeks at the most, if he is cured under any kind of treatment his own mind can have very little to do with the result attained. Of course an invisible and unsuspected power may work silently and secretly upon his mind and bear fruit afterwards in his recovery, but that power belonged outside of himself, it came from outside influences, not from any original belief or expectation of his own. Many prayers exercise a mesmeric influence over a patient; they lull him to sleep, soothe away his pain as they lull him into the arms of prayerfulness; they play the part of anæsthetics and render the entranced subject, while in a singularly negative condition, pecu-

Cures are performed by mesmerism; this we know, and can prove by many thoroughly well-authenticated instances; but a question arises, are they permanent? often we confess they are not. The question now arises, so long as really healed, does it matter how they are healed? Is not one method of cure as good as another, and if all kinds of prayers addressed to all kinds of divinities are available what matters it whether we profess a true religion or a false? Right here in the use of the word religion comes the answer. True religion is a matter of principle, of right feeling, of noble emotion, of inspiring sentiment, rather than of rigidly defined intellectual admissions. Religion is a question of love, of purity, of magnanimity, of fervent aspiration. It centers in the love of all good and of humanity; it is good and seeks to do good; it proceeds from the soul rather than from the intellect, and thus is far more a matter of the heart than of the head. If people were truly pious in their lives because they held certain doctrines and approached God in certain forms of words while all others were impious, we should then be compelled to look upon intellectual exactitude as necessary to salvation; but when we find the most excellent and truly religious people holding diametrically opposite views on all questions which can be submitted to the intellect, we are compelled to look deeper than opinion to find the secret of spiritual life and growth without which all ceremonies and invocations are empty forms and hollow mockeries. Whenever prayer is sincere it is an uplifting of the spirit to a plane of being which the spirit in its hour of need recognizes as real and present, or at all events near enough to be communicated with.

We hear much nowadays of mind-reading and thought transference; we hear and read much of curious experiments tending to prove the palpability of thought and the possibility of one mind communicating with another without any kind of contact between bodies; and while there is of course much difference of opinion among the learned as to the nature of the force which is employed in the transmission of ideas from one mind to another, the general impression seems to be that there is a subtle force within us and around us, subtler by far than electricity, which does a work in mind in the transmission of intelligence analogous to that performed by the electric fluid on the sensuous plane of communion. In every instance of thought transference we hear of certain conditions being necessary to success, the experiments being successful only when some subtle and mysterious requirements are fulfilled, these requirements oftentimes being of so unknown a character that the phenomena are noted more for their erraticity and incomprehensibility than for anything else. Just as it is necessary to employ machinery and apparatus in the conduct of electrical experiments, just as the telegraphic wires cannot be dispensed with in the transmission of intelligence from point to point, so in the subtler realm of mental interaction something analogous must be established to bring two minds en rapport with each other. Prayer seems in one at least of its phases to be the sending forth of a subtle force from within ourselves which grasps some power beyond us with which we desire to ally ourselves, no matter to whom we pray. The personage addressed, though a fancied historical character, may be after all only a myth, still we do lay hold of something and some one, we do get a response somehow from somewhere, and it is a response which in many instances answers perfectly to our idea of the being we addressed in our prayer. Now it seems to us incredible that an impossible or a non-existent character should ever have found its way into human thought or literature.

Novels we have in abundance; so-called works of fiction are plenteous as daisies in spring, but are works of fiction, works of fiction in the strict sense after all? Where do the characters come from? Are there no actual patterns after which the writer copies? Are not novels very often simple biographies more or less distorted, names, dates and places changed, personages considerably mixed, but still the whole tale made up from real life? It is an open secret that popular novelists put people of their acquaintance into their books and often travel and seek society for the purpose of collecting material for fresh romance. Supposing the myriad personages involved in prayer by the various bodies of worshipers the world over were for the most part fictional ideals, still they would have their counterparts in real life, each one would stand out distinct from all others as the embodiment of some especial quality, and an invocation to an imaginary being possessed of such quality would bring the mind of the suppliant into relation with some real being in whom that particular characteristic was peculiarly prominent. Suppose now, for the sake of argument, Jesus of Nazareth never existed. Historical evidence of his existence is extremely slender and many modern critics assume that he was merely a mythical or an ideal personage. If that be so are we forced to conclude that all the prayers ever offered to him are fruitless, that they represent just so much wasted energy and idle breath? Such a conclusion would be too pitiably cruel for us to entertain for a single instant. The value of prayer is in its spiritual fervor and intensity, and if one prays to Jesus with an ideal before him and with the sole object of conforming his life nearer to the standard of that ideal, if he invokes that to help him to become more like itself, such petitions instead of being valueless are ladders to living spheres of spiritual being, and it matters not whether there ever was on earth a human personality who lived out that ideal in mortal form. The ideal in the human mind is a reflection caught from the realm of spirit; it is exceedingly probable that history more or less clearly proves the outward manifestation of the ideal; but if history does not, prophecy assuredly does, and the future condition of mankind on earth is a condition already reached in spiritual being somewhere and reflected upon the consciousness of those yet dwelling amid the shadows of materiality.

Now take away from the character of Jesus all that savors of what is commonly termed the miraculous and supernatural, draw aside the curtains of mythology and let the human personality stand out in all its spiritual and natural loveliness; forget all theories of a miraculous conception, throw to the winds all thought of anything other than a pure and perfect manhood, think of Jesus only as an elder brother, in a word take the view of him which Theodore Parker took, and what have you to contemplate but a human being who has reached a nobler height of holiness and devotion to truth than the rest of mankind. As Moses was the greatest lawgiver mentioned in Jewish history, as Phidias was the greatest sculptor known to Greece, as Confucius was the greatest ethical teacher and reformer known to the Chinese, so Jesus was the greatest spiritual light known to Christendom. But some will say, and with great showing of truth, there is no evidence that any one man ever lived in whom all moral excellences met; have not historians borrowed from many and many a person, many and many a clime, and decked their chosen hero in many borrowed garments which were not rightfully his own? Such may be the case, but even if it is, it does not alter the fact that there are human beings, if not a solitary human being, in whom these excellences have met; the whole glory may not belong to one alone, it may be the joint possession of a great multitude, but the hope of relating one's self to those realms of intelligence and virtue in which such moral beauties are outwrought in beneficent conduct is not a baseless dream, it is a well-grounded confidence.

Surely there are no skeptics who will not admit as much as this. Nothing can be in the world's history which transcends the attainment of the human mind. If Shakespeare was not the author of the plays which bear his name, Lord Bacon or somebody else wrote them, they did not write themselves. They are written and some mind or minds must have lived adequate to the task of producing them. So with Homer; if such a man as Homer is generally supposed to have been never lived, the Illiad and Odyssey being in existence were brought into existence by an intelligence adequate to the task of their production; and so with the ethical teachings of Jesus, they have been given to the world some where, by some one, at some time.

Beyond that point where the baldest skepticism may possibly stop, we as gnostics rather than agnostics necessarily go, knowing that no life perishes, that no mind fades away; that all intelligence enjoys a career immortal. We confidently proclaim our unfaltering conviction that if you in sincerity of purpose fervently address a plane of being called by you by any name you please, or by no name at all if you cannot give it a name, you enter into living relation with that very degree of mind which made the teachings and products you most admire possible on earth. You may then have an erroneous idea of personality, you may address the name of a myth, but you address the real spirit which you are endeavoring to find and commune with it beyond the myth which partially obscures your mental horizon. No doubt many divinities invoked by many nations are mythical creations, so far as their literal history is concerned, and we can none of us doubt that many "saints" have been canonized because of services they rendered and offerings they made to the church, while their characters up to the very last were anything but saintly, their death bed repentances and conversions being unreal, as they were only induced by fear and in the hope of escaping deserved punishment and winning unmerited reward after the death of the body. These "saints" are, no doubt, at this moment, many of them, in a very dark and unprogressed condition in spirit-life, and utterly beyond the reach of the adorations of those who invoke them.

Still the suppliant has before him a mental image of true sanctity, he invokes an ideal in his own mind, and when he does so he forms a connecting link between himself and some being or beings who really do represent the ideal height he desires to reach, and from which he is laboring to win a response.

Paganism and Romanism alike acknowledge an immense number of lesser divinities somewhat corresponding to the Elohim or Demiurgos of the Kabala. One of these divinities is supposed to protect the one who seeks his or her patronage from drowning, another shields from land accidents, another from fire, another helps his charge to the acquisition of wealth, another finds and restores stolen property, while others whose missions are more spiritual assist those who invoke them to the acquisition of graces and the development of their higher nature generally. If there were no such thing as communion with departed spirits at all these prayers would not be in vain, as the very desire to enter into relation with a certain type of mind would introduce the petitioner into the sphere of other individuals on earth whose mental exhalations fill the air and affect us more or less powerfully as we become receptive or non-receptive, according to the bent of our desire.

We come now to an intensely practical part of our subject, viz.: the means whereby and the reasons why persons affect each other so powerfully under some conditions, and scarcely at all under others. Spiritual science teaches you before all things the paramount necessity of properly directing your thought and wisely using your will. A true spiritual scientist is never a mesmeric dupe, never a victim of any and every influence which may be floating by. We must try the spirits in the fullest sense, i.e., put every influence which approaches us to the test of reason and conscience, and never allow ourselves to be blindly led by the passing breeze in whatever direction it may be blowing.

An incalculable amount of danger may be avoided and misery averted if persons will only act by intuition and by reason, not by blind impulse. Untold misery is occasioned by that prevalent externalism abounding everywhere which teaches the child from his earliest breath to bow to authority and bend to custom. We must set rather than follow fashion; though ever ready to take advice, we can never be too careful in hesitating to follow an impression because it is an impression. An impression is not an intuition, as an intuition is an impulse of the soul, while an impression is only an impress made upon our mind by some effluence of another's mind which is at the moment in our vicinage.

When we have settled the point that thought is a substance, when we realize with sufficient vividity that we are constantly praying to others while others are praying to us, that every thought, desire, wish, and certainly every effort of will is a prayer, we shall see that we are both praying and answering prayers continually. Prayer is aspiration, desire, will, request; so when an apostle said, "Pray without ceasing," and coupled with that injunction, "Watch and pray," aspiration and vigilance were estimated at their true values and placed in their rightful relations. We must not only watch as well as pray, but we must watch, and that carefully, ere we pray. We must not allow ourselves to pray for anything and everything; it is a mischievous fallacy to suppose that because God cannot answer a prayer for what is evil, and no good angel can reply to it either, that therefore it goes unanswered; it is most assuredly responded to from that state of mind toward which it gravitates and with which it is in sympathy. We have known children as well as brigands to steal, and pray that they might not be found out. We have known people to deliberately set out upon an evil course, and before they undertook to plunder their fellow-creatures, offer up a prayer for success in their nefarious undertaking. Now are such prayers harmless, do they amount to nothing? Are they mere wasted breath? We might wish they were, but as it is they are causes of the direst misery, as they link those who offer them with the powers of darkness, and these powers of darkness which inhabit the air are none other than other minds similarly intentioned who clasp hold of all who invoke any mysterious or unknown power to aid them in a work of evil. If prayers for evil ends are answered are we not then in continual danger? Yes, but only when we do not curb our lower instincts; only when we encourage, or at least allow the baser proclivities of our nature to assert themselves.

Obsession is doubtless a fact, but it is occasioned by low and evil thoughts and desires, by those very thoughts which necessarily lead to vicious practices whenever indulged in. Metaphysical healing makes a dead set against errors in mind; it utters its protests with clarion voice against all secret thoughts of evil; it does not and cannot stop where physiology and sanitary legislation are compelled to stop, at the making clean of the outside of the cup and platter.

Metaphysicians frequently say very little about outward practices, why? but because they know the truth of the adage, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." It would indeed be a blessed thing for the world if prohibitory legislation could put down evil, but does it? Alas, no! In a republic prohibitory legislation is impossible if the people are not sufficiently well disposed to desire it, as laws can only be made by the people, and they will never make better laws than they desire, and they will only desire good ones when they are morally and mentally enlightened. And then again, if a prohibitory law is passed and enforced where people are too vicious to appreciate wise legislation, they resort to every conceivable artifice to evade it, and their moral progress is therefore retarded rather than advanced by pressure brought to bear from the outside. Education and Moral Suasion are the only two possible means of bringing about reform; force is impossible, utterly impracticable, unless you are dealing with serfs and savages, and even then it only leads in the long run to mutiny and revolt and an exhibition of the most flagrant vices possible to humanity. Some Socialists, we know, laugh at moral suasion, others distrust its power; almost all believe in improved legislation and state interference as the sovereign remedy for existing ills, but how are they to get improved legislation, how are they to get a well-organized state, without education and moral suasion? If some like the word education, and do not favor the words moral suasion, how, we should like to know, are they going to separate the two unless they rob education of all its moral elements and thus reduce it to an artificial and utterly ineffectual attempt to accomplish the impossibility of raising mankind to a higher level without appealing to the only lever which can lift society, viz., the moral sense.

Intellectual and physical culture alone are miserably inadequate to evolve a perfect state. Greece, Rome, Babylonia, Chaldea, and multitudes of ancient names stand eloquently forth in history, vetoing any such absurd attempt. The nations which fell away most completely from virtue and at length from material prosperity also, those which have been utterly destroyed, and whose ruins alone remain to tell the tale of their once glory have fallen when culture was at its height and schools were crowded with learners.

The one thing needful in education was unhappily left out, and that was moral and spiritual culture. Healing by spiritual power means healing the mind of evil thoughts, exorcising the demons of impure wishes; and as every physician and sanitarian knows disease and vice, health and virtue are intimate associates, the true spiritual healer must minister to a mind diseased, to affections depraved, and by inducing first the love of virtue and begetting in the patient's mind the understanding of it will soon find that as all growth proceeds from the center outwards, not from the circumference inwards, so it is impossible to change fruit without changing the condition of the root from which it springs. Just as the use of cosmetics can never purify the blood or impart the natural glow of health to the cheek, as all the beauty of skin stimulated by rouge, pearl powder and other vain and injurious compounds, products of an age of insincerity and sham is indeed less than skin deep and tends to increase rather than lessen the pallor caused by sickness, as such preparations clog the pores and prevent that natural action of the skin which is indispensable to health, so all attempts at glossing over defects and making persons act and speak well without any motive power from within impelling them to do so can only intensify instead of relieving the moral maladies under which society groans.

We must devise some more radical means of improving the morals of the rising generation than physiological text-books will supply. When well written they are good as far as they go, but they lack all power of appeal to the spiritual nature. Boys and girls are told if they indulge in sexual excesses they will suffer from nervous debility, that as they grow older diseases will overtake them when they least expect it; they will lose health, strength and powers of enjoyment by contracting vicious habits. All this is true enough, no one can dispute it; but we fail to see how an address to selfishness, or at the best an appeal to the animal instinct of self-preservation as conspicuous in rats as it is in man, how an appeal to fear of consequences falling upon lawless indulgences can do much to stimulate that moral and mental force without which it is extremely difficult, almost impossible to restrain the passions.

A spiritual treatment succeeds where the physiological argument fails, because the former induces the dormant spiritual energy in the one treated to come forth, assert its power, and hold the lower impulses in check. Spiritual healing is the victory of spirit over sense, of mind over matter, and true prayer addressed in all sincerity to infinite purity cannot fail to arouse in the one who prays thus, that very moral vigor which is more than a match for all the wiles and seductions of the lower nature. When we pray for another we should never desire or expect more than this, to enter into some blessed fellowship with the powers of light in such a manner as to assist in the awakening of the divine light within the sufferer or sinner in whom it a while lies dormant. Prayer is spiritual effort, the truest, noblest and most earnest work in which we can possibly engage.

LECTURE VI.

MIND-READING, THOUGHT TRANSFERENCE AND KINDRED PHENOMENA.—WHAT IS THEIR SCIENTIFIC EXPLANATION?

THE columns of the daily and weekly newspapers being at the present time almost filled with accounts of more or less successful experiments in what is properly termed Mind Reading, we have chosen as the topic of our discourse tonight some of the more familiar phases and aspects of this singular and interesting phenomenon, feeling sure our hearers and readers (for this discourse is being reported in extenso) will be interested in hearing what we have to offer on an always attractive but just at present peculiarly seasonable topic. You are doubtless all of you pretty thoroughly familiar with the now widely accepted theory of animal magnetism. You all have heard and read and perhaps experienced something of its alleged marvelous potency, and while many of you are willing to lay it aside for what you feel to be a higher revelation of truth, you cannot but admit that the theory of its existence on the sensuous plane of thought is both tenable and logical. The magnetic theory, as we understand it, is practically this: The human body is an aggregation of molecules or minute particles of matter kept in a constant state of frictional motion by means of that subtle power we call life. As long as life operates upon these molecules their activities are continuous, but when life retires their wonted movements are instantly and finally suspended so far as their remaining part of a particular body is concerned. The constant friction of atoms must necessarily produce an energy, or force, an emanation or effluence, hard to define, perhaps, but nevertheless to be palpably felt, and under certain conditions susceptible of analysis. That heat and moisture are constantly being thrown off from the human body no one can deny, and no one, we should think, could accord to heat and moisture no properties.

On the plane of physical existence animal magnetism operates as all material forces operate; this subtle fluid emanation is without doubt communicable from one person to another, with or without contact consciously or unconsciously on the part of both the donor and recipient. Now in mind-reading, or thought transference, animal magnetism plays a very subordinate part, as ideas are what we have to deal with rather than physical sensations. Animal magnetism, if it ever acts as a therapeutic agent, if it ever aids in the relief of pain or the cure of organic disease, can only act as food or any physical remedy can act; it cannot convey ideas or act as a self-intelligent agent in the conveyance of mental impressions; but when we turn our thoughts from the body to the spirit, from matter to mind, we can readily see how closely analogous magnetism on the physical plane may be to thought on the mental.

Thought is without doubt a substance, a something real, tangible, objective to the senses of the spiritual body, and we must never forget that man on earth is a spiritual being, the possessor of a spiritual body which he will continue to inhabit when the mortal form has crumbled into dust. Man, then, on earth has latent within him all the potencies and capabilities of so-called departed spirits. Death does not revolutionize character, neither does it necessarily produce any immediate change in the moral and mental status of an individual. Departed spirits, as those are usually called who, to use Shakespeare's language, "have shuffled off this mortal coil," are not necessarily either more or less advanced than you, and our most decided conviction is that without a solitary exception, if you were every one of you to pass out of earthly existence at this moment, you would each one commence your progress in the unseen world at that precise point in your development which you had reached the instant prior to experiencing the change called death. If this inference be correct, and both Spiritualism and reason endorse it, we can surely see our way towards an amicable settlement of many differences of opinion between Spiritualists and others which occasion much unpleasant controversy and the manifestation of much hard feeling on both sides.

Metaphysicians, Theosophists and Spiritualists are for the most part all laboring to the same end, and frequently they are only calling the same thing by three different names, and thus their dispute is rather over the name by which the flower shall be called than over the rose itself, whose fragrance is not affected by any name which may be given to it,—to allude again to Shakespeare and borrow from him an illustration. The experiments with Irving Bishop which have formed the subject of so much discussion of late are extremely simple and can very easily be explained by an intelligent student of spiritual science. Such experiments are valuable more on account of their bringing metaphysical and spiritual matters before a class of the community often hard to reach by less sensational methods than on account of any great inherent virtue they may possess, as they constitute only the alphabet of Spiritualism, and explain only the very first principles of metaphysics or theosophy.

What is thought? is a question ever recurring. How is thought generated? does the brain secrete it? Is it dependent upon an organized brain for its existence, or is it rather an independent reality which manifests itself outwardly through the brain, using the brain as the vehicle of its expression, while the brain has no power to produce it but only to make it outwardly manifest? These and hundreds of allied questions are being raised continually in the present state of psychological controversy, and it is our object in this address to make an attempt to discuss and if possible to answer a few of them.

Now in the first place it always strikes us that the great fundamental error in materialism is that the materialist reverses the natural order, and while of course recognizing both cause and effect, declares cause to be effect, and effect to be cause, falling therefore into the precise error called in a homely proverb, "putting the cart before the horse." A few simple axioms or truisms which no one can successfully dispute seem to us to thoroughly confute materialistic reasoning. Take, for instance, the following which we believe are almost universally admitted to be unanswerable: "Out of nothing, nothing comes;" "A cause must be equal to the effect produced from it;" "A stream cannot rise higher than its source;" these and many others too numerous to mention, all in the same strain and absolutely irrefutable, answer finally the assumption of the materialist, that matter produces mind.

Nothing can be evolved which is not previously involved; involution is the key to evolution and the only intelligent and adequate explanation of its phenomena. We often have occasion to refer to what are commonly called the physical sciences; we never speak disparagingly of them, but we insist that there are spiritual sciences which explain them and without a knowledge of which they are both misleading and inexplicable. Take phrenology and physiognomy as instances, it is beyond dispute that character can be read by the organs of the brain and also by facial expression. Even hand-writing portrays character, character is depicted moreover in every line of the hand and in every movement of the body; but because we admit all this and do not refuse to be guided by these outward indices, if we have no better and more interior methods of judgment at our disposal, are we compelled to commit ourselves to the self-evident fallacy proposed by some, that the character is the result, the outcome, the effect of these externals; are not these externals the results, the outcome, the effects of character? Outward experiences do not influence mind or limit intelligence, but mind and intelligence certainly do occasion and regulate all outward indications. A thermometer has no effect upon temperature, it cannot heat or cool a room in which it hangs, but it certainly can indicate the temperature which it has no possible power to modulate. A barometer has not an iota of influence upon the weather, still the quicksilver in it can warn you of the rains, winds, or tempests it has no hand whatever in inducing or preventing; we do not refuse to acknowledge the value and usefulness of these indicators because we are not foolish enough to believe them to be weather-makers; just in this proportion do we acknowledge and utilize phrenology, physiognomy and kindred sciences.

If a child is brought to us whose development is very meagre in certain respects, if the conformation of the head proves him to be very unevenly developed, we do not tell the parent that he is stamped for life with certain littlenesses and infirmities. Rather do we endeavor to spur on the parent to exert himself to the uttermost in overcoming these defects and annihilating these limitations. The brain has nothing to do with the intellect, any more than the barometer has to do with the weather; it may indicate how far the intellect is expanded, but that is all. How often we observe coarse, brutal expressions marring the faces of unkind people; a change of mind, or a change of heart as Christians often say, completely revolutionizes a person's appearance. Kind thoughts lead to genial smiles and pleasant lines in the face, while disagreeable thoughts, even when kept to one's self and never translated into speech, pucker up the countenance and give it a sour and repellant aspect. Far too much stress is commonly laid upon externals; the majority of mankind are altogether too superficial and conventional; formal etiquette receives far more attention than it deserves, and thus a whitewashing of sepulchres full of corruption within, and a cleansing of the outside of a cup and platter filthy within, is as much in vogue today as it probably was when condemnation of such

Thought is not only a substance or reality; it is a far greater reality, a far more important and influential substance than either word or action. Thus we need the Arabic as well as the Christian statement of the Golden Rule. Combine them and the rule is perfect: "Thou shalt feel and do towards thy neighbor as thou desirest thy neighbor to feel and do unto thee.' If we recognize thought as more powerful than anything visible, audible, tangible, or otherwise perceptible to man's outward or bodily senses, we harmonize perfectly with chemistry and other physical sciences in declaring the invisible to be vastly more potential than the visible. Chemistry positively demonstrates the invisible forces of nature to be far the more potent of the two. No mechanical engineer needs to be told this truth; he knows well enough the superiority of invisible steam to visible vapor. Every chemist knows of the superiority of ether to matter; all matter can be converted into ether, but all ether cannot be converted into matter, for when the conversion is attempted a residuum always remains on the side of ether. Of course we may be found fault with for suggesting that ether and matter are distinct; many scientists say ether is only refined, rarified, ethereal-ized matter. We maintain that that is a wrong statement of the case. The truer statement is that matter is a lower form of ether, as experiments go to prove that there is something in ether there is not in matter, while there is nothing in matter there is not in ether; ether may therefore be the parent cause of matter, but matter cannot be the parent cause of ether, as matter cannot produce what is greater than itself, while ether may produce what is less than itself. Consciousness is surely greater than unconsciousness. The conscious is surely greater than the unconscious. Thus matter may be a product of mind, but mind cannot be a product of matter. When organization is spoken of as necessary to mind, truth is inverted, turned topsy turvy. The fact of the case is the direct opposite of the statement. There can be no organization without mind; mind is the organizer. It is the inevitable habit of mind to organize, therefore if it should be true that wherever mind is there is organization also, the organization or organism is not the creator of mind, but its creature, not its cause, but the effect of it.

If you will follow this process of reasoning to its ultimate you will quickly see where the fallacy of materialism lies, viz., in confounding cause and effect, reversing them, mistaking one for the other. Now to apply this reasoning to the curious and exciting phenomena under discussion, a pin or some larger object is hidden away somewhere out of sight of a "mind-reader;" the mind-reader usually insists upon it that some one who knows where the object is hidden shall concentrate his mind upon it, and then either with or without physical contact with the person who knows where the article is concealed, the mind-reader finds it and produces it, much to the amazement of the spectators, who greet his success with acclamation, without attempting to solve the mystery or tell how the thing is done. Mr. Bishop is a notorious example of a power lying dormant to a greater or lesser degree in every one, and he himself admits it can be cultivated by those who pursue it with perseverance and assiduity. It of course involves an effort and exhausts the performer much as any other kind of work does which involves taxation of the mental energies. The experiments which have been conducted both publicly and privately in many places in the presence of many distinguished men of science and representative clergymen can only be explained in one of two ways; they may be adduced as evidences of spirit control, or they may be brought forward simply as samples of the wonderful power resident in the human mind while yet associated with an earthly body. We will take the latter view into consideration first, as it leads up to the former; a due consideration of what is commonly called mental phenomena paves the way in the popular mind for what is always designated spiritual phenomena, for though the use of the words "mental" and "spiritual" in that connection and with such implied limitations may be open to criticism, we all know that such use of them is very common, and therefore needs to be taken into account in presenting an explanation to the general public.

The mind of man here and now is assuredly the same typically that it will be after it has severed its connection with flesh. Death cannot materially alter the condition of the mind; it may liberate it and afford it wider scope than it previously had for the exercise of its powers, but substantially the condition of yourselves and your so-called departed friends is the same, with the single difference of outside organization. Now if we are all spiritual beings here and now and forever, if we can generate and transmit thought by reason of our being spiritual entities, why can we not communicate with each other, and that perfectly, without bringing into requisition the physical senses at all?

Probably no one is entirely destitute of interesting psychic experiences; it is really extraordinary to note how many peculiar events have taken place within the knowledge of almost everybody, events which have been dismissed as inexplicable until the present deep and growing interest in the spiritual side of nature calls them up from the recesses of memory where they have long lain stowed away, and offers a reasonable explanation of them in harmony with a hitherto unknown law. When you shall have accustomed yourselves to depend more on spiritual means of communion with each other and less on external avenues of intercourse, you will find yourselves receiving impressions conveying news of distant friends to such an extent as to enable you at length to dispense with outward means of converse almost entirely.

No power unless specially sought after or unusually prominent makes itself manifest under ordinary circumstances except in case of necessity. There is no reason whatever why people should not write with their left hand as easily as with their right, the only reason why they do not is because they have not been educated to do so, and have never felt the necessity of trying to accomplish what they have not been taught. But let an affliction deprive one of his right hand, the necessity of writing with the left frequently gives power to use it, or at all events it affords an incentive to an exercise which, if faithfully persevered in, is invariably crowned with success. Even the toes have been made to hold a pen where both hands have been lost, and the caligraphy of the toe-writer has been quite intelligible. Just as children have only been taught to use one hand and no toes in writing, and have, therefore, only developed the power of using one hand in penmanship, so they have been taught to rely exclusively on their physical senses for all communion with one another, but let a sensitive, impressionable child be educated from the cradle to respond to thought without the use of language or anything outward, and that child will grow up a natural seer. Seership can be cultivated or repressed as well as any other power indigenous to the minds of the human family. When Mr. Bishop conducts his experiments he always tells some one who assists in the exhibition to keep his mind firmly fixed on the hidden object to the exclusion of all other thoughts for the time being; he therefore succeeds much better with one person than with another, though all who constitute a committee may be equally friendly and desirous of seeing the experiments a success; still one has more concentrativeness than another, and the person who can rivet his attention on one object to the exclusion of all others for the longest time and with the most fidelity is always the one whose mind the mind-reader can read most freely.

We knew two ladies at one time, one an Englishwoman, the other a Spaniard; the one could not speak or understand anything of the other's language, yet they conversed with each other in mind so perfectly that the one was a perfect companion to the other. We will give you two or three illustrations of the manner in which they communicated, as it was a singular and deeply interesting, also a most instructive, case to the student of psychism. We will say, before proceeding with the narrative, that the ladies conceived a strong attachment for each other at the time of their first meeting, thereby manifesting an intense natural sympathy which always greatly facilitates thought transference. They were accidentally left alone together in a large London house late one evening in a thoroughly and exclusively English-speaking neighborhood, when the Spanish lady was suddenly taken with a fit of indisposition; this greatly affrighted the English lady and also deeply disconcerted the Spaniard, but only for a moment, for no sooner did the sufferer express a wish for hot water than her English companion brought it to her; no sooner did she desire a window closed or opened than the English lady opened or closed it, of course at the time being acting automatically, scarcely knowing what she was about or why she acted as she did, as her companion's words conveyed to her no meaning whatever. From that day forward they were the most intimate and confidential of friends, and, though they had neither of them learned anything of any phase of mental or spiritual science from any book or person, they acted out a spiritual play perfect in all its parts. Of course, the question may be raised legitimately, how far was the English lady a medium? how far was she influenced by spirit friends? but, without endeavoring to finally decide that point, let us look over the ground a little and see what warrant we have for indorsing such a conclusion.

Clear proof of spirit intervention must necessarily transcend the abilities of those present in the flesh. We are not justified in recklessly attributing everything to departed spirits without adequate reason for believing in their intervention. Over-credulity among Spiritualists does quite as much to retard an intelligent understanding of spiritual operations as does any amount of skepticism or even opposition on the part of those avowedly hostile to the theory of the Spiritualist. Whenever we have proof of spirit intervention we stand confronted with a fact not logically referable to the action of our own unassisted minds; for instance, if the lady whom we have brought forward as an example of the working of mental telegraphy, did nothing more than she was mentally requested to do by her Spanish friend, the Spanish lady stood in the position of spirit guide and the English lady served as her medium. If at other times their relation was reversed, as it often was, the English lady was the directing intelligence and the Spanish lady the subject sensitive; but if information was obtained foreign to the knowledge of either of the ladies, if either of them acted beyond her own and her companion's thought and knowledge, then we conclude there must have been a third party to the result and that party an unseen spirit.

In frequent instances a mesmeric subject is taken entirely out of the hands of an operator and made to obey another will, there comes in the action of the unseen spirit disconnected from the body; but even in such cases there is not always absolute proof that the influencing mind is not still on earth. Our theory, however, while it may at first sight appear to cut the ground from under Spiritualism, in reality makes it stronger, as our science is anthropological and we cannot study man as he is and where he is without gaining new light on his probable powers and conditions in another state of existence. We may say that we know that many of the instances recorded by the Theosophists are unquestionably genuine cases of thought transference, but they do not support an antagonism to Spiritualism when they are rightfully explained, they rather cut the earth from under the opposition. If while here on earth, environed in matter, limited at every point by the senses, we can still exercise our spiritual powers to the extent of conversing with one another across miles of land and sea as well as when near each other in bodily presence, what must be the powers of those liberated minds who, no longer hedged in with mortal surroundings, no longer impeded with earthly exactions, can use their divine resources to an unlimited degree. Mrs. Eddy, in her celebrated book, "Science and Health," gives no adequate reason whatever for her militant attitude toward Spiritualism; she says she knows spirits cannot communicate with their friends on earth, while she dilates at great length upon the power of one mind to affect another in this world mesmerically when not metaphysically. Mrs. Eddy's very argument in favor of spirit being the only reality, and the physical man virtually a nonentity, are just so many practical contradictions of the anti-spiritualistic statements she makes elsewhere.

Many Mind Readers, Mental Healers and others seemed possessed with the delusion that a belief in spirit communion or a recognition of it as a fact must be given up if mind reading or metaphysics can be proved true, whereas the exact reverse is true, for all phases of mental and spiritual phenomena strengthen one another, and direct spirit communion entirely independent of physical accessions is only the apex and crown of all lesser demonstrations of what is in all instances virtually the same power. There are indeed diversities of gifts and operations, but the same spirit worketh all and in all; the Spirit of God indeed is the primal fount of all intelligence, but the spirit of man also is the appointed medium of the Infinite. It is surely the will of God that we should help each other, gregarious instincts are evidences of the divine intent that we should perpetually serve one another; in no other way than by mutual service can we rise to celestial altitudes; thus, instead of ignoring the ministry of angels in our work, let us thankfully recognize it, but at the same time never fail to credit ourselves with what is duly ours, as no truth needs borrowed plumes or is ever enhanced by the addition of anything not strictly in accordance with veracity. Our practical application of these thoughts is this, we cannot always say to a fellow-being, give up such and such a habit; our position in life, the circumstances in which we are placed often erect formidable, almost impassable barriers on the plane of mortal sense between us and those we most desire to reach and help, but no barrier of caste or prejudice can clip the eagle wings of thought, no law can forbid our thinking; where we cannot go in body there let us go in mind. If we cannot say drop that cigar, drink no more liquor, frequent no more that evil haunt, indulge no more in that vice, we can think our message, we can direct our thought earnestly, prayerfully, confidently; we can sow good seed in mind, we can give silent treatment where all outward attempts would be rebutted scornfully as unwarrantable interference. If we will recognize the power of thought more and rely on outward operations less, we shall be both surprised and delighted to find ourselves running a mental telegraph, not for the purpose of filling our pockets with golden ore through ministering to the love of the sensational and the curious in the minds of those who are always searching for attractive novelties, but with the blessed intent of relieving, not primary and chiefly bodily suffering and sensuous distress, but the fruitful cause of it in depraved thoughts which lead inevitably to words of blasphemy and cruelty and acts of crime.

In so doing, whether we know it or not, the hosts of heaven will work in union with us, and as we afford the only really necessary condition for true affiliation with pure and holy beings, our work will be one with that of angels and we shall in our turn become angels, ministering spirits, helpers of our brethren, whose sole delight and ambition is to consecrate our every power to the furtherance of the best interests of humanity.

LECTURE VII.

IT has often been stated, as we think very falsely, that the law of love was first enunciated to the world by Jesus of Nazareth, whose name is always coupled by Christians of all denominations with every pure and ennobling precept found in history or romance. We hear constantly of Christian graces and virtues, as though there was no excellence in the world before the Christian era, while the truth is that Jesus was simply the teacher of ethics and revelator of spiritual truth, to whom Christians have ascribed the origination of every beautiful maxim that he indorsed.

The real Jesus was unquestionably a very different personage from the exacting and self-asserting God to whom Orthodox Christendom superstitiously and idolatrously bends the adoring knee. Out of the only four gospels which are called canonical, only one, the fourth, even seemingly favors the deification of the Nazarene. Matthew, Mark and Luke present to us a very natural and intensely human character, in which the grace of humility is conspicuously present, while the Gnostic author of the fourth evangel mystifies readers by his blending of the personal Jesus with the Logos of philosophy, which is nothing other than the divine wisdom in its life-giving operations, made mention of in the Book of Proverbs, where, in Chapter VIII, wisdom is personified, and made to speak as the divine maternity, who co-existed with the divine paternity from all eternity. "I was with him in the beginning," says Wisdom, when speaking through Solomon of her part in the formation of worlds. This divine wisdom in the divine nature forever exists and acts in perfect conjunction with divine love; and when this love and wisdom are combined and operating in precisely equal measure, then and there, and then and there only, can be found that perfect sum of all perfections whose name is Eternal Justice. Justice is the true governor, savior and redeemer of the race, and justice is equally wise and loving. Justice is the perfect sphere; love is one hemisphere, wisdom is the other. Love may be compared, for instance, to land, and wisdom to water. Could there be a perfect globe if there were water only, or only land upon its surface?

There was once a time, far back in the history of earth, when the waters covered all the land, and at their subsidence in sections of the globe dry land appeared. As the earth is surely and steadily advancing toward perfection, the land is gaining on the water; about two-thirds of the earth are now under water, and there must be a perfectly equal divison of empire between these elements ere the earth attains the zenith of its perfection. The outer earth, as it becomes constantly more and more perfectly dual in the front it presents to space, registers outwardly in the equalization of its elements the unfoldment of the life of nature, which is dual in its essence, but not in its expressions, until such time as it has gained an equilibrium in the realm of manifestation.

This great and most important and essential truth was shadowed forth in monuments and Kabalistic writings long ago in Egypt and all over the Orient, and in various parts of the pre-historic world. The grim old Sphynx on the banks of the Nile, with woman's head and lion's body, propounding its question to every passer-by, is not a riddle to the student who is conversant with the hidden meaning of ancient imagery. The head of woman means the reign of love; the lion's body means the subserviency and at the same time the coöperation and coördination of reason. Reason is wise but not loving when alone; love is not wise when disassociated from reason. The perfect blending of reason and affection, or love and wisdom, produces justice, and to arrive at a perfect understanding and administration of justice is to solve the problem of all the ages, and make strife, discord, unhappiness, bloodshed and tyranny henceforth impossible. The reign of justice is the reign of the Prince of Peace, whose sceptre is righteousness. Without equity, strict impartiality, there can be no safety and no freedom. Liberty can only dwell in safety beneath the roof of justice. The slightest deviation from the strictest rule of justice is unkindness and unwisdom. To spare the rod is to spoil the child; but to lash the child in anger is not to be just.

Among the beautiful precepts laid down for the guidance of man, in Deuteronomy, we find many so essentially rational and so exquisitely humane, that it matters not who reads them with unprejudiced mind, he must agree to them. Take, for instance, the commandments referring to the taking of a pledge, to the reaping of the fields, to the paying of all just debts. No one but a fool can dissent from the wisdom there enunciated. Modern critics may deny inspiration if they please; they may treat dramatic and sensational stories of burning bushes, quaking mountains and mysterious voices and thunders as old wives' fables, if they will, but surely he is utterly bereft of reason, of humanity, of the simplest sense of justice, who fails to recognize both the nobility and utility of the major portion of the Jewish law, which is not only a moral but a sanitary and hygienic law; a law, moreover, which so well agrees with the necessities of human nature that multitudes are sick, suffering, dying today because they disregard it.

Utilitarianism and expediency may altogether fail to see a truth in divine interpositions in human affairs, but let the utilitarian deny inspiration or revelation as he will, if he be but a student of human nature, as an anthropologist and advocate of pure ethics, he must perforce admit the divinity of the useful, the safe, the humane; in a word, of all that conduces to consolidation and to liberty. Liberty can never mean license. No one can ever be justly free to injure his brother in order to please himself. The interests of the race form a unit, and if one member of the race suffers all suffer; if one is uplifted all derive a benefit. In purely private, personal matters people may have an unlimited right to please themselves, but whenever self-gratification produces a state of being which affects one's surroundings, then that portion of society which is affected has a right to complain and interfere, and the constituted officers of any government are simply doing their duty when they step in to prevent all fanatical actions which imperil the safety of the commonwealth.

We are not today dealing with a semi-civilized people, journeying through a desert, and therefore are not called upon to make our own in every minor detail the customs and observances of three thousand years ago; we can only follow truly the leadership of truly great men when we emerge from bondage, cut loose from old limitations and strike out for ourselves in a new and broader pathway than the broadest in which our ancestors could see to walk. The more liberal, radical and progressive you become, the more truly conservative of all that is truthful and ennobling you will become. Any child can pluck a flower to pieces, or destroy an exquisite vase which no money can replace; the ability to break down is a power the iconoclast shares with every baby and idiot the world has ever produced. There is nothing sublime or instructive in making fun of other people, ridiculing them, deriding their belief and speaking contemptuously of their organizations. The true reformer builds far more than he pulls down; he knows that if the soil be rank, and he uproot weeds ever so often, they will grow again; he knows that there must be an improvement in the quality and condition of the soil, or no harvest of delicious fruit and nutritious grain will result from clearing earth. To improve the earth itself, to remove the means of growth from under the roots of weeds, to substitute a normal, healthy, vigorous constitution for an enfeebled one, to cast out the twin demons of vice and disease by introducing into the system a powerful active force which makes for health and righteousness, may not be a simple or an easy task; it may need much labor, strength, patience and knowledge to perform it; the new seeds may take a long time in sprouting, the new temple may take many years in building, but good must ultimately triumph over evil, love must eventually conquer hate, truth at length must vanquish error, even as the power of sunshine alone can dissipate the darkness of night and the mists of early morning. Of what use would it be to fight the mists, or seek to drive them away unless something came with superior force ready to supplant them; nothing, no matter how unlovely or obnoxious it may be, will go away to make room for nothing. If you have darkness and wish to get rid of it, you must introduce light; and light being stronger than darkness, takes up the room the darkness formerly occupied. If you are stifling in a dense, oppressive atmosphere, how do you get rid of it? Surely, by admitting the fresh, pure air, which drives away the dense and obnoxious vapors from your room.

The strong man of sin, error, death, darkness, ignorance, misery or disease, will retain possession of all parts of the earth and man, until the stronger man of virtue, truth, life, light, knowledge, happiness and health, comes into the world and into man, to cast the evil genii out. Giant Despair will keep possession of his castle until an invader stronger than he comes to evict him; and were one giant turned out, and his castle demolished, others would soon arise, unless a new dynasty were established, and the land fell into the hands of other rulers and occupiers.

In so far as the Mosaic laws are simply prohibitions, in so far as men are simply told what not to do, the Christian has right to claim superiority for the affirmative commands of Christ. But where the Christian grievously errs is in his statement, oft reiterated in Orthodox pulpits and through the press by men who ought to be better informed concerning the contents of the Bible, certainly, as many of them have graduated from colleges where it has been their daily study for years, that Christianity, or Christ, first brought before man's consideration the affirmatory command to love. All through the Old Testament, yea, and to be fair to other nations beside the Jewish, we are in honor bound to admit all through the sacred books of India, Persia, China, and many other lands, teachings identical with those of Jesus of Nazareth may be found.

He whose boast it was that he fulfilled the law, he who never claimed it in his mission to discard it, has been grossly insulted, shamelessly misrepresented, crucified afresh and put to an open shame by those who have taken his name as the label for a system which has persistently dishonored him by lip-service coupled with alienation. The name of Jesus has been associated with absurdities and immoralities so detestable that it is hateful in the ears of many modern reformers who endorse almost the whole of his teaching. To bring Christians into oneness with their own historic Christ would indeed be to accomplish a miracle of reformation, and for endeavoring to do this, hundreds of liberal and conscientious ministers and laymen have been branded infidels, and refused admission even into the pulpits of the avowed liberal and progressive Unitarian as well as Trinitarian churches of Christendom. Theodore Parker's crime was his imitation of Christ. In his life he illustrated the great and glorious precepts laid down in the Gospels of all climes and centuries. He was a man who knew he would never feel happy in heaven while his brethren were suffering in hell. He was too broad, too lovable too loving himself, to worship a caricature of Diety which made Omnipotence a fiend, and substituted vengeance and tyranny for justice; and because of this, only two pulpits in Boston and its suburbs were open to him, and prayer-meetings were the scenes of blasphemous petitions that his lips might be closed and he never allowed to return to his place in that city. Boston today reveres Theodore Parker as one of the greatest of its teachers. His name is now heralded forth from East to West, and far o'er the seas, as one of the noble army of prophets, martyrs and confessors who have died in harness, and even cut short their earthly career by their intense devotion to the cause of truth and human liberation; while the churches that opposed him have either so far remodeled their theology that it almost resembles his, or have lived a cold, narrow, stinted life, regarding with chagrin the liberalization of thought around them, finding themselves growing weaker and smaller every year, until in the dim distance they see only annihilation staring them in the face, unless a miracle be worked to rekindle the dying embers of the old, awful faith in endless hell and relentless devils, which has now so nearly left all the cultured part of the earth that Calvin's and Edwards' theologies are little more than names for systems as practically defunct as the Ptolemaic theory of astronomy.

Religion, however, lives; no foolish tirades on the foolishness of prayer can destroy the practical life-giving power it wields today; no coupling of the terms religion and folly in an announcement of a meeting in a public newspaper can destroy the power of true religion to reform, uplift, console and bless mankind. Religion is as far removed from the puerilities of a blind Materialism as it is from the narrow dogmatism of those who consider a band concert on a Sunday a nuisance which the strong arm of the law should suppress. Infidelity is the natural outcome of superstition. Idolatry and bigotry have made infidels, and all the folly we perceive in rampant atheism is to us traceable to that unnatural, and certainly unbeautiful and ungodly slavishness, that blind devotion to a capricious letter, which makes the form of religion a matter of infinitely more concern than the power of godliness made manifest in whatsoever conduces most to the present and future welfare of the human race, individually and collectively. An old proverb says that none are so blind as those who will not see, and it seems to us pretty often as though some persons will not make a distinction which can be made most easily by any person of even ordinary intelligence who reflects at all upon the subject, between the unchanging intention and the constantly fluctuating application of wise and humane law.

Recently the Sabbath question has been agitated afresh here and elsewhere, and though quite a number of very liberal sermons have been preached, and articles written full of good sound sense, the voice of intolerance, more adapted to the days of Cromwell or the Puritan forefathers than to the closing years of this nineteenth century has not been silent. No enlightened physiologist will deny that one day out of seven is needed by man and beast alike for rest and recreation, and no one can fail to see physical degeneration among all who neglect to conform to salutary discipline, and obey wise and loving laws formed for their guidance under the highest intelligence expressed on earth in this or a bygone age; but the very words of the fourth commandment show how utterly irreconcilable is its spirit with the narrow prejudice and interference with public liberty which often masquerade as concern for the religious welfare of the whole community. If Saturday or Sunday is to be a day devoted entirely to religious observances of the puritanic type, no provision would have been made securing rest to the ox and the ass, as well as to son and daughter, man-servant, maid-servant and stranger. Oxen and asses have no souls which puritanism recognizes. They are under no obligation of serving God on one day of each week in any especial manner, but their bodies, yea, and their minds also, for animals have minds, and are capable of intellectual exertion, need rest on the Sabbath as well as yourselves, and none of you are keeping holy the Sabbath day in the sense in which it needs to be kept holy, unless you so employ the day that when you rise on the following morning you feel refreshed and strengthened for all the duties that lie before you through the week.

We do not say that incessant attendance at balls and parties or constant frequenting of the theater is calculated to unfold the nature of man and qualify him for his daily work under ordinary circumstances. We do not believe that popular excursions on crowded boats or trains, where the day is often wearisomely spent in seeking pleasure and finding only fatigue, are adapted to the real needs of the populace, or that they tend in any considerable degree to point out the true and natural mode of Sabbath observance. We believe, morever, in the need of satisfying the spiritual or religious side of nature, and regard that mind as dwarfed, and that life as crippled which has not fully unfolded the organs seated in the coronal region of the brain. The front brain and the top brain must be cultivated as well as the middle brain and the back brain; and the great defect in the present system of education, despite its many advantages, is, that the moral and spiritual organs have too little attention paid to them. We hear a great deal about morality, but in practice it is often reduced to mere conventionality. A simple outward respectability, which is aped by many because it admits them into society into which they could not go if they did not bear a good moral reputation, is too much sought after, while character is too little estimated and far too little stress laid upon real worth.

But, some will say, how utterly impossible it is for us to scrutinize each other's motives. How can we know when to excuse and when to condemn? The sermon on the Mount comes at once to the rescue and affords an answer to all such inquiries. Judge not. You cannot judge correctly oftentimes, and when you can you are not called upon to pass sentence upon another's life. Cast the beam out of thine own eye; make thine own life pure, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye. But does not this look as though we ought to take action in condemning others as soon as we are no longer flagrantly sinful ourselves? By no means; the conduct of Jesus with the woman taken in adultery forever decides the question of judgment for all true followers of the spirit of the Nazarene; and that spirit which we are told animated his breast is the identical spirit whose presence and constant activity made truly great all the really successful moral reformers the world has ever seen. To cast out the mote from your brother's eye after you have expelled the beam from your own, does not imply that a censorious, pharisaical or condemnatory impulse should actuate you.

How can you best reform another? How can you best help a fallen brother or sister to sin no more? "Go and sin no more," if said earnestly and practically, surely cannot mean simply that you utter a trite phrase and then dismiss a penitent without providing him or her with the means of subsistence or opening the doors of any home or workshop where the once culprit may retrieve his forfeited honor by works of usefulness henceforth. It is plainly the duty of all interested in the welfare of society to set their faces like flints against every form of crime and immoral practice, by making it as difficult as possible for people to do wrong, and as easy as it can be made for them to do right, but this does not in any sense or way necessitate your speaking, acting or thinking unkindly toward any one. No matter how lowly fallen a human being may be, he is a child of the Great Universal Parent and a brother of yourself; and as a brother it is for you, if you are wiser and stronger than he, to hedge in the road which is to him beset with so many difficulties and temptations. A weak and erring child should not be allowed full liberty if he uses that liberty, or, rather, misuses it so that it degenerates into unhallowed and dangerous license which imperils the safety of all around. Penalties must be administered; houses of correction must exist; administrators of justice must do their work until lawlessness is dead, and

But we must learn to treat sin as an infirmity; crime must be regarded as a disease, an infectious ailment, a contagious blight; and hospitals be provided for criminals, as insane asylums are provided for those bereft of reason, and the best surgical and medical skill, accompanied by the best of nursing, is provided for those who are bodily diseased or ailing, even though the sufferer should have brought his ailments upon himself by his own sins, follies and indiscretions. If you find a poor, broken-down wreck, humanity prompts you to take him in and do for him. No matter though he has been a drunkard or a libertine, his case is urgent, his necessities pressing, and society is endangered if with an infectious malady he is allowed to roam at large; so you have fever hospitals and cancer hospitals, and institutions of every kind and name, for the cure of sufferers and as safeguards to society.

Now as we do not deprecate the hospital, but regard it as a necessity today, even though we may include it in a catalogue of necessary evils, we are no opponents of a prison system, provided it be a humane and enlightened one, and widely different from that now in vogue both in America and abroad. No doubt American prisons are almost palaces in comparison with some Siberian dungeons; no doubt the governments of Europe devise means of torture unheard of in the United States today, and you have much to congratulate yourselves upon in the humanity of your prison discipline compared with what it was a century ago, and what it still is in many parts of the world claiming to be civilized; but revelations made not long since excuse the impetuous enthusiast for saying that all places where human beings are deprived of light and liberty are abominations. So they are in comparison with the institutions of a perfect world.

Sewers and heaps of rubbish; dust and dirt and poisonous insects; stagnant pools and slimy bogs are all abominations, and will eventually be swept away; huge cities with their hundreds of tenement houses, where human beings are crowded together without sufficient air and comfort to properly expand any side of their being, are abominable, and will give place to widely different centres of industry and dwellings ere long. But reform cannot be fully accomplished all at once. All nature's processes are gradual; it is ever here a little and there a little, line upon line and precept upon precept, that truth and right gain the victory over falsehood and wrong. A celestial condition on earth is not possible until the whole human race has fully outgrown every thought of evil, and each unclean, unkind and unwise disposition. But progress can never be made unless continuous effort is made to progress. Your best actions yesterday may be culpable mistakes today, because the discipline of yesterday should have prepared you to live a higher life today. So methods of correction, tolerable and possibly necessary in olden times to carry out the true spirit of legislation, may be iniquitous and utterly unjustifiable at present. There can be no excuse for punishment in any case until all mild measures have been tried and prove ineffectual. Then and only then are you morally justified in resorting to harsh treatment; and when you are obliged to resort to asperity and coercion, you should blame yourselves fully as much as those to whom you have literally to administer the rod of correction; for not only their obtuseness and incorrigibility, but your own deficiency in the higher qualities of the spiritual nature, have compelled you to resort to a semi-brutal mode of correction.

Some people are great advocates of the whipping-post, and of the gallows even; they cannot understand any one being benefitted or society being protected by mild and persuasive measures; they take delight in shaming and humiliating others, and even in taking away life, as they say, for the good of the majority, whereas in a mode of castigation which only degrades the chastized one in the eyes of others, no appeal is generally made to the higher nature. We have known many brave, high-spirited boys who would have been noble, courageous, generous and just, had they been properly trained, almost transformed into brutes by the absurd and inhuman floggings to which they have been needlessly subjected. No parent, teacher or guardian of the young, and no custodian of public morals, will ever succeed in doing real good to those under his charge, unless he inspires their confidence; and when or how can brutality and fierce anger inspire confidence? No one ever has a right to strike a blow in anger, and this has even been recognized to some extent among duelists, who have usually fixed the hour of meeting early in the morning, and under the most dispiriting circumstances. Before you strike a blow you should remain by yourself long enough to carefully analyze your grievance; and when you rise the next morning to meet the one who has wronged you, the chances are that in nine cases out of ten you would feel it a degradation to yourself to deal the blow, as the offence does not merit so deadly a means of expiation.

The law of love is based upon justice, and that strange command, strange at least in the ears of many, "Love your enemies," by no means implies that we are to associate on equally intimate terms with everybody, for natural preferences are not only legitimate, but positively of divine appointment. Neither does it signify that we should allow the burglar to escape only to commit depredations elsewhere, when he has been let off after having attempted theft, and possibly murder, on the premises of the man who has been weakly good-natured enough to throw him out upon society, chuckling over his easy escape from the clutches of the law. The law of love, however, enforces such action in all cases as will leave no reason for personal spite and angry retaliation. No law has ever been regarded as juster than that which ordains trial by jury, because twelve unprejudiced men are supposed to be found who have no personal feelings in the matter, and can feel no individual interest in the condemnation or acquittal of the prisoner at the bar, while the persons whom he has wronged directly can scarcely be expected to feel no resentment or bias against him.

The law of love does not command us to wink at calumny, slander and detraction; neither does it compel us to be silent in our defense when enemies are blackening our names and spreading reports damaging to our standing and usefulness in society; because, as no one can seek to injure another without really harming himself, and as no one can possibly indulge in habits of gossip without bringing himself into a state of mind in which he becomes the prey of evil-disposed men and spirits, there can be no fulfillment of the law of kindness in allowing another to persist in a course of action which, while injurious to ourselves, is doubly harmful to the one who is indulging in it. It becomes, therefore, an imperative duty devolving upon the teacher of morals to show plainly the difference between an exhibition of hatred, revenge and spite, and a proper concern for the safety of society, by means of the just punishment of evil-doers.

But here comes in the most important question of all: what kinds of punishment are really just, and what measures can be wisely and safely adopted to elevate the sinner and protect society? In this connection allow us to express our unqualified disgust with the present system of prison discipline, both in America and elsewhere. Probably the prisons of America today are almost palaces compared with European dungeons in the middle ages. Even Newgate in London was, in the time of Elizabeth Fry, a reeking cesspool of the vilest abominations, black as the hole of Calcutta, a disgrace to civilization, and a blot on the escutcheon of Christianity, which it will take centuries to efface. Bastard systems of religion which have been fathered upon primitive Christianity are, however, in no sense attributable to the spirit of Christianity itself, as the horrors perpetrated avowedly in the honor of Allah are in no sense natural outgrowths of the religion of Islam. It is vain and foolish in the extreme for iconoclasts, in their rabid onslaughts upon systems of religion, to denounce the system for all the evils committed in its name, or presumably in defense of its honor, or to extend its conquests. If allegiance to any particular form of religion made people necessarily good or bad, we should of course find good people all grouped together around one common standard of faith or profession, and evil-minded people gathered around an opposite centre. If Roman Catholicism or Church of Englandism made people of necessity bigoted and cruel, we should find bigotry and cruelty largely confined within the territory covered by those religious systems; but though both Catholic and Protestant have burned heretics, and the fires and dungeons of the inquisition have been apparently outgrowths of an aggressive ecclesiastical hierarchy, we cannot shut our eyes to the treatment accorded to Socrates by the Athenians, nor to the diabolical fanaticism of the French Communists, nor the atrocities of the modern Russian Nihilists, while highway robbers and scoundrels of every name are, in many instances, utter unbelievers. Still we should be most unjust in fathering upon modern skepticism, or an avowed system of intellectual infidelity, the crimes and misdemeanors of the present century.

The truth is, neither sacraments nor ordinances, neither faith in dogmas nor belief in "nature," can change the stony heart to one of flesh, or hold in rein the turbulent passions of undeveloped humanity. Spiritual growth, moral development alone can do this; and so we find in the same church the saint and the sinner, the one loving, humane, generous, self denying, just, the other proud, hard, lascivious, dishonest, dangerous. Often such contrasts have been baptized at the same font and received the eucharist together at the steps of the same altar; but the one receives from the sunshine what warms into life all that is beauteous, the other only an added incentive to evil. Religious ceremonies and beliefs make some people better and others worse. Even a knowledge of spiritual truth itself, if unaccompanied by heart devotion to goodness, will but give added power to men to work mischief. So in this day we see illustrated all around us the four kinds of magic admitted by Orientals. Some attain to the red magician's supernal power of subordinating flesh utterly to spirit, and, being infilled with divine life, find in every outward faculty and grace a means for promoting the highest welfare of mankind. Some, as white magicians, though not as yet fully and finally victorious over sense, are on the road to complete and ultimate conquest over pride, passion and infirmity; and these employ every means of spiritual development as a stepping-stone to a higher life. Many there are who are quite contented with the gray magician's compound of good and evil; an admixture of purity and foulness seems best to suit their taste, and, while they use some gifts aright, they befoul their lives by the misuse of some portion of their power. Others again, as black magicians, prostitute, desecrate every pure, holy and useful thing to purposes of wrong and for the advancement of criminally selfish or malicious ends.

The same philosophy, the same science, the same outward knowledge, the same visible practices may lead these four classes of persons to such diametrically opposite results, and do we not see an analogy to all this in physical nature? Behold the sunshine streaming down in golden beauty upon a rose-bush and a neighboring dunghill. That light and warmth which makes the roses blossom and causes them to emit so sweet a fragrance on the surrounding air, makes the dunghill hot and putrid, sending forth a poisonous stench all around. Without the heat and light of the sun, neither the rose-bush nor the dunghill would have displayed its latent possibilities. Spiritual influx, the light of knowledge, the means for arriving at the highest standard of moral excellence, by perverse and selfish persons can be so inverted that the very light is the cause of their deeds of darkness. See that the light within you be not darkness, or the greatness of that darkness will be such that, enveloping your soul in its plutonic shades, it will shut you out for ages from all sense of true happiness and all companionship with wisdom and its followers.

We have introduced these observations neither discursively nor irrelevantly, as they were needed to rebut an unjust attack which is often made upon whole societies and classes of men by those who attribute to belief or opinion that which springs from indwelling pride, lust and selfishness. Change the opinions and faiths of the world a million times, and with all your success in helping men to arrive at correct views of truth intellectually, you will fail utterly in reforming society unless you reach their inner being, and cause the spiritual nature to break its bonds, free itself from its entangling chains, and stand erect and liberated in the glory of a royal independence which only those can know who are honest not because a penalty is attached to stealing; who are pure not because external chastity may be advantageous in a worldly sense; who keep all the commandments not because the law will punish those who break them; but because the ways of virtue, of true wisdom, have been found to be indeed ways of pleasantness and paths of peace, and the spirit that has yielded to the charms of virtue can see no longer a beauty or delight in vice.

We say, once for all, that in the dealing of Jesus with the woman taken in the act of adultery we have a setting forth of the highest of all examples of reformation. She out of whom the Christ cast seven devils, tradition says, was Mary Magdalene, the penitent, the faithful follower, who counted no sacrifice too costly for him she loved, and who stood last by the cross and first at the sepulchre. These stories of the overcoming of evil with good are no mythologic fables, or if they be such in the eyes of any, then to those we would point out the hidden teachings of mythology, and unveil the important truths the ancients hid in allegoric guise. "Go and sin no more," one short, simple sentence of only five words may do more today to render society safe, as well as to accomplish the restoration of the fallen, than all prisons and penitentiaries the world has ever seen.

But of what avail are words without action? Of what use is it to say to the hungry and the thirsty and the naked and the shivering, be warm and clothed and fed and thirst no more, when your coal-bins are full, your pantries crowded with food, your wells running over with water and your warehouses overstocked with apparel, if you hug these treasures to yourselves and do nothing to dispense them to the famishing? Of what use is it for you to pray verbally the pater noster, and then do nothing whatever to save others from temptation or deliver them from evil? Good resolutions may pave the infernel realms if not carried into effect in life. Prayers can be but mockeries in the sight of heaven if the spirit of every prayer be not a desire to become yourselves instrumental in furnishing answers to the prayer you pray for others' welfare. The true life of a reformer is not one of indolent inaction, of prayer that is a substitute for work. His prayers are rather his soul's sincere desires, accompanied by his life's most earnest efforts to call out all that is divine and true in his own and every human breast.

In conclusion — and we must conclude this address, though we have but lightly touched the hem of our subject's garment — we would urge upon you to consider how more than necessary it is that you should let every weak and erring mortal know that you believe sincerely and devoutly in the latent goodness which smoulders within every life. No matter how depraved, let education, the unfoldment of the spiritual being, be your manifest object in every administration of reproof. We may safely have pictures, pianos, flowers and good living in our prisons, provided we teach every prisoner how to work, and see that he never eats the bread of idleness. The utter elimination of barbarity from modes of correction is the spiritual ideal, and as idleness is one of the most prolific parents of all evils, if we make our captives work for an honest living, and then reward them for their toil, we shall not only be rendering good for evil and overcoming evil with good in obedience to Gospel precepts, endorsed by seer on earth and angel in heaven, but we shall be effectually protecting society by cutting off the supply of marauders and disturbers of the peace, as, through our instrumentality, the once criminal becomes a useful being on the road to angelhood.

LECTURE VIII.

SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AS RELATED TO MESMERISM AND MAGNETISM.

NUMEROUS are the enquiries from all points of the compass as to the attitude to be assumed on the part of Spiritual Scientists toward Mesmerism and Magnetism, especially as to the use to which these systems are put in the relief of pain and alleged healing of the sick. To treat these systems fairly and intelligently it is necessary that we should know something of their origin and history; we shall, therefore, occupy a short portion of the time alloted to this discourse in tracing the sources whence these systems spring, and then dilate upon the work which their supporters and exponents are actually performing. The word Mesmerism, you scarcely need to be told, is sectarian, i. e., the word is derived from the name of a man who was as much the founder of a sect as any man ever was. Anton Mesmer stands in logical and historical relation to a system properly called Mesmerism, as Luther stands to Lutheranism, Calvin to Calvinism, the Wesleys to Wesleyanism, Swedenborg to Swedenborgianism, Mohammed to Mohammedanism, and so on, ad libitum. Mesmer himself was a medical student at Vienna, where he took the degree of doctor of medicine, in 1766. A few years later he began to study the curative powers of the magnet, and was led to adopt the opinion that there exists a power similar to magnetism which exercises an extraordinary influence on the human body. This power he designated Animal Magnetism; he soon began to publish accounts of his discoveries of the medicinal value of this newly found therapeutic agent. Honors were conferred on him in Germany, where his researches were warmly endorsed by many persons of influence in scientific circles. In Paris he also attracted much attention. His system commended itself to many distinguished lights in the medical profession and to intelligent and educated communities at large. He seems to have regarded his knowledge as a personal secret, as he refused a considerable sum of money which was offered him if he would reveal the secret; his refusal to accept about four thousand dollars as an annual pension for making the desired disclosure gave rise to suspicions and provoked much antagonism, which led to the appointment of a commission by the government composed of physicians and naturalists to investigate his claims as thoroughly as possible; as the report of the commission was unfavorable to Mesmer he soon began to lose his former popularity. Having fallen into disrepute he left France for England, where he made no great stir; he then retired into complete obscurity.

Such is in brief the history of the founder of the modern system called Mesmerism, or animal magnetism; let us now look at the system itself, and turn our glance toward some of the other notable characters who figured prominently in its history at the close of the last and during the present century.

Animal magnetism is always closely associated in theory with a subtle mental force, a power of thought or will which, emanating from one person can strangely affect others. The claim is not made by magnetists of the mesmeric school that bodily emanations suffice to induce the magnetic or mesmeric sleep, or the somnambulic condition: on the contrary, all professors of the art or science claim that will is a powerful operative agent; thus mesmeric and magnetic treatments border upon mind cure, as they pre-suppose the exercise of a purely mental force in addition to all that proceeds from body to body in the act of manipulation. The theory of animal magnetism is not by any means ridiculous, and it is vain for metaphysicians to argue there is no efficacy whatever in magnetic treatments; simple animal magnetism exuding through the pores of the physical organism has properties and produces results on the plane of mortal sense, just as food nourishes the external body, and other outward agents play a part in sustaining the outward frame.

Animal magnetism is largely animal heat; heat is generated as we all know by friction; thus the rapid and sometimes violent movements of magnetizers serve to evolve a vast amount of animal energy, which by means of the respiratory system can be easily communicated from one body to another. A person taking a magnetic treatment believes and admits that somebody else's vitality enters his body through the pores; he therefore acknowledges dependence upon the physical force generated in another system than his own.

Mesmer supposed animal magnetism had some relation to the magnetism of the loadstone. The method of inducing the magnetic state employed by Mesmer involved the use of quite extensive apparatus; iron rods, etc., were employed, but the more popular phase of treatment has always been the use of passes made by the hands of the magnetizer from the head of the subject or patient downward, sometimes to the feet; in many instances, however, passes have been dispensed with and the subject has been commanded to fix his eyes upon the operator, under which circumstance some of the most remarkable psychological or biological results have been obtained. When passing into the sleep, the subject usually feels a curious creeping sensation come over him, he seems to lose all power of voluntary thought or action, which sensation is occasioned by the will of the operator directing the patient's subjugated mind wheresoever he (the operator) desires. Various estimates are given by different authorities as to the average percentage of mesmeric sensitives in an average community; some fix the average at one in ten, others at one in seven, again others say that probably thirty-three and one-third per cent of the entire population are amenable to magnetic influence. It appears, however, on closer inspection that the average varies considerably in different countries; climate, personal temperament, education, average of intelligence and many other causes too numerous to mention, tend to immeasurably modify the susceptibility of persons to the will of others, and while, as said before, simply animal emanations have an effect on the animal plane, no Mesmerist is simply a Magnetist of the physical order.

Mesmer was no rubber of the illiterate type; he was a man of will, power, and decision, who when he set out to accomplish a result had great force of intellect and dominant purpose of mind to back him. According to the Mesmeric theory the nervous energy of the operator has overpowered that of the subject, and while the word nervous may convey to some only a physical idea we think it would be difficult to find a sane individual anywhere who does not recognize to a greater or less degree the direct action of mind in all nervous conditions. Many of the best scientists, including members of the French government commission appointed to investigate the source and secret of Mesmer's power, or at least the efficacy of the system he originated, have arrived at the conclusion that it is a delusion to attribute the power which entrances the human subject to an influence emanating from any physical object. The effects, whatever they are, said these men of science, must have their origin elsewhere. As early as 1785, when the report of the commissioners was handed in (one of the commissioners was no less a man than Franklin, who was appointed by the king of France to investigate the subject), they had arrived at conclusions almost identical with those which find favor among mental scientists today, for though at that time the reflex action of the mind upon the body had not been studied as extensively as it has been since they pronounced the phenomena the result of imagination.

The word "imagination" needs careful and elaborate definition and explanation to render it a really appropriate one for use in such connection; but understanding imagination to be simply an image or reflection produced upon the mind by some thought or object influencing it in ways not ordinarily understood, imagination is a good and expressive word. Imagination is a power, gift or faculty natural to man; it needs proper cultivation, but should never be decried as useless or injurious, as it only becomes a snare when allowed to run riot, as all faculties do when not properly disciplined. In many instances persons have been most powerfully affected when nothing whatever was done to them, but when they thought something was being done; there is such a thing as self-mesmerism, though what is usually called such is generally brought on in the first place by the operation of some outside influence. Among the early believers in the magnetic theory who had not extricated themselves from the meshes of too much dependence on assistance derived from inanimate things was the justly celebrated Baron von Reichenbach, a German naturalist, who in the earlier days of his manhood became involved in serious political struggles resulting in his imprisonment. On his release from prison he seems to have given up to a large extent his political ambitions, and devoted himself almost entirely to the natural sciences and their application to industrial arts. He was a man of great force of character and power of mind, capable of engineering vast undertakings and managing large estates. He was, therefore, of that peculiar temperament of mind necessary to success in all enterprises where the subjection of one will to another is involved. He it was who thought while studying animal magnetism he had discovered a new force in nature. This force soon took the name of Odyle or Odylic force, to the operation of which many of you may remember the spiritual manifestations of thirty-five or forty years ago were attributed by many. This Odyle, sometimes called Od (supposed to mean all-pervading), Reichenbach declared pervades all nature just as Vril does according to Bulwer Lytton. Vril in Lyt-

ton's mind was probably a higher manifestation of the Od conceived of by Reichenbach; it manifests itself, according to him, as a flickering flame or luminous appearance at the poles of magnets and crystals, and wherever chemical action is going on. This force was said to account for the luminous appearances sometimes seen at graves which have given rise to terrible frights and no end of weird superstitions.

Od force is said to have, like magnetism, its positive and negative poles. The human body, according to this theory, is positive on the left side, and negative on the right. Reichenbach claimed to have demonstrated as a positive fact in his own experience that sensitive people positively see the odic radiation like a luminous vapor in the dark, and can feel it by the touch like a breath. As the meeting of like odic poles causes an unpleasant sensation, while the pairing of opposite poles produces an agreeable result, a reason is assigned for those remarkable attractions and antipathies which can never be logically accounted for unless some such theory, or a still better and more explicit one, is given for their explanation.

You have probably all come in contact with some of those apparently fastidious persons, whose extreme sensitiveness makes them keenly and often painfully alive to influences unfelt by the majority, at least to any appreciable degree. We often come across persons who say they cannot sleep in certain positions, and according to Reichenbach and his theory of Od there is a scientific ground for their peculiarity. Some sensitive persons declare they cannot sleep when in the northern hemisphere on their left side, because the north pole of the earth, which is od — negative, affects unpleasantly a person's right side which is also od — negative.

As all motion generates Od, this force is said to account for many singular phenomena usually attributed to a mysterious but unknown power, such as the use of a divining rod for the finding of water under the ground. Why, it is asked, may not a stream running underground affect a sensitive water-finder so that the divining rod in his hand shall move without any conscious effort of will?

Reichenbach ascribes all mesmeric phenomena to the working of this Od, but not being a sensitive himself, he never claimed to have had first-hand sensuous proof of its existence. His conclusions rest entirely upon the experiences of the many sensitives upon whom he operated and by means of whom he conducted his interesting experiments.

Comparatively few scientific men of renown have given much credence to this theory in its physical aspects, and it appears to us the time has now come for a reconsideration of its claims, rather with a view to discovering a mental cause for mesmeric phenomena than with the hope of establishing a physical basis on which they may scientifically repose.

Kindred phenomena to those attributed by Reichenbach to Od have been explained by the light of what is termed Hypnotism by Dr. Braid, of Manchester, England, who published some very interesting papers on the subject in an English journal of Medical Science in 1853. The word hypnotism, as some of you are doubtless aware, is derived from the Greek hypnos, signifying sleep. The hypnotic state, according to Dr. Braid, proceeded rather from the physical and psychical

Directions given for inducing the hypnotic state which some persons have followed with considerable success are substantially as follows: Take a silver lancet-case or other bright object and hold it between the fingers of the left hand about a foot from the eyes of the person on whom you desire to experiment, in such a position above the forehead as to produce the greatest strain on the eyes compatible with a steady fixed stare at the bright object. The subject must be directed to rivet his mind on the object at which he is gazing. The symptoms are, first, a contraction of the pupils of the eye; then they will dilate considerably; then after they are widely dilated the operator should extend the first and second fingers of the left hand, keeping them slightly separated from the bright object, toward the subject's eyes. The eyelids will probably close with a vibratory motion. After ten or fifteen seconds have elapsed, the patient can be made to keep his arms or legs fixed in any position in which the operator places them.

It will usually be observed that all the senses except sight become highly exalted; the special senses are the first to exhibit this exaltation; the muscular sense and sensibility to temperature become remarkably keen; but this exaltation of function is followed by depression or torpor, placing the body in a condition far below the state of natural sleep. Only when in that torpid condition is a person thoroughly hypnotized.

This rigidity of the muscles and extreme torpidity of the nervous system can and ought to be instantly removed. An opposite condition can be induced by directing a current of air against those limbs or muscles the operator wishes to render limber, or against an organ he wishes to excite to action; by mere repose the sensitive will return to his normal condition. If a current of air directed against the face is not enough to arouse the sleeper, pressure and friction should be applied to the eyelids and the arm or leg sharply struck with the palm of the operator's hand. Dr. Braid, after a careful analysis of a large number of experiments, came to the conclusion that by a continual fixation of the mental as well as of the bodily eye upon an object, with absolute repose of body and general quietude, a feeling of stupor supervenes which renders a subject liable to be affected in the manner recited above. Such experiments are found to succeed with blind persons, thereby proving the action of mental rather than visual action and concentration on the part of the one affected; the effects then cannot be produced through the agency of the optic nerve of the body, but must be rather due to impressions made upon the sentient, motor and sympathetic nerves, and above all upon the mind.

Many surgical operations have been performed painlessly upon hypnotized patients, and hypnotism has frequently been employed with much success in various forms of disease, especially in cases where nervous derangement was the explanation of the disorder concurred in by the faculty. Now that mind-reading and thought transference are agitating the popular mind so violently as to render mind-reading one of the most popular topics of the day, it behooves all students of Spiritual Science and all mental healers to address themselves to the task of finding the true explanation of these phenomena in mind, not in matter, and from what has been quoted and advanced in this discourse you will see that the general drift of thought in the scientific world even among physicians and physicists has been to refer mesmeric, magnetic, biologic, and hyponotic phenomena to a mental and not to a physical cause.

We will now proceed to state as tersely as possible wherein metaphysics must of necessity be far in advance of mesmerism, animal magnetism, biology, hypnotism and all other phases of semi-mental phenomena which favor the employment of physical assistance, and start with the assumption that one human will is stronger than another, and then proceed to argue and act as though it were a divine appointment that stronger wills should control the weaker. Up to a certain point these quasi-mental systems are pure and lawful, but in no case are they the equals of the true metaphysical system we endeavor to advocate and explain. Now what is the essential contrast between Metaphysics and Mesmerism? Surely in this all-important fact that metaphysical treatment aims at liberating a patient's mind and will, and mesmerism aims at controlling or enthralling it. Disguise the fact as one may, mesmerism, according to its accepted exponents, is a system of mental bondage, a system which boasts of the ability of one mind to hold another in subjection; it is then a system which upholds mental slavery, and no slaveholding system can harmonize with the advanced views of liberty now everywhere proclaimed as essential to the highest civilization. Given all the credit it can possibly merit, mesmeric methods are only suited to the infancy of human development; as children are held in obedience to the minds of others until they are able to walk alone and act independently, so persons who are in an extremely weak and suffering condition and also powerfully influenced by other minds in error, whose influence over them retains them in sickness, may be reached beneficially at first by the mesmeric power of a really well-disposed, healthier and more enlightened person than those whose mental outgoings exercise so baneful an influence on the invalid. In such a case as this we may compare the mesmeric treatment to the transfer of a slave from a bad master to a good.

In the days of negro slavery many of the negroes in the South fared so well with kind masters, they did not desire freedom. Many women today who have good husbands and happy homes, put the greatest obstacles in the way of the Woman Suffragists, by maintaining that women have all the rights they need to demand, citing themselves as examples of woman's happy lot, with which say they all women should be satisfied. No one denies that many negroes were well treated while yet they were slaves, and no one questions the fact that many women without the ballot are in a comfortable condition, but in discussing the question of slavery and the question of suffrage, principle must be taken into consideration, not immediate comfort or discomfort of certain individuals. Is the system right or wrong? not, are certain persons happy and contented under it? is the question of the hour whenever a reform is called for. In grave national contests the arena of battle is principle at stake; under a despotic sway people may live very happily and be very kindly treated, as they often are, by humane rulers.

A sultan, a czar or emperor may be an excellent, truly kind-hearted and justice-loving man, during his reign all may go well and the people have no cause for complaint; but rebellion against despotism in theory is imperatively called for by reason of the fact that at any moment the removal of a single individual from office may deprive a whole nation of all their rights and liberties and land the entire population in the arms of cruelty and all its hideous results. Now the case of a mesmerized sensitive is about parallel with the case of a slave dependent on the good nature of his master, a woman dependent on the caprice of her husband and a nation dependent on the personal character of a solitary head; at any moment the mesmeric influence may be withdrawn, at any moment the kind and wise mesmerist may remove his protecting arm; and as human nature is not yet infallible and unchangeable in all its operations on the external plane, a mesmerist formerly wise and kind, may, under the influence of some strong temptation or other powerful incentive, begin misusing his power so as to bring the sensitive under a most baneful sway.

To be the creature of another's will is to be in slavery, and even though the will may be kindly and mercifully directed we should all strive to obey the command, "Thou shalt worship the Eternal thy God, and him only shalt thou serve," which translated into plain, everyday language practically means no more and no less than that we should under no circumstances allow ourselves to be blindly led by any kind of influence, but in all our dealings with forces seen and unseen employ our conscience and our reason, and only yield to truth and goodness because our interior sense points out to us that what we are asked to obey is a divine monition.

The writer of these pages has had personal experience in mesmerism, so far enlightening him as to its nature and effects as to impel him, in duty to those who may not have had the same experience, to speak decidedly on this matter. The writer will now devote a brief space to personal illustrative reminiscence, by way of enforcing the lesson here intended to be conveyed. When about sixteen years of age, and at that time very impressible to all such influence as that commonly called mesmeric, he made the acquaintance of a young man whose mesmeric ability was unusually great and who exerted over him the most complete sovereignty for more than twenty-seven months. During that period a great number of deeply interesting and at the same time highly instructive experiments were tried, proving conclusively the absolute surrender of the subject's to the operator's mind.. As the operator in this case did not abuse his power to any serious extent or in any important direction, no harm sprang from their association, but a sample of the experiments successfully conducted will convey to the mind of every reader a faint idea at least of the absolute sovereignty of the one mind over the other.

In the year 1876, in a London drawing-room, in the presence of a numerous company of distinguished and influential ladies and gentlemen, including doctors, lawyers, clergymen and others high in their respective professions, the subject was engaged in close conversation with one of the gentlemen, while the operator was taken by another into a room up-stairs and there shown some curious old prints at the bottom of a trunk; he took a definite and complete mental photograph of them and then willed the subject down-stairs to tell the assembled company what he (the operator) was looking at overhead.

Instantly the subject commenced to describe the trunk, pictures, dates and other writing on them, the precise arrangement of a number of articles which had been removed from the trunk and lay in confusion on the floor, with all the exactitude of a closely observing eye-witness. Immediately the description had been given, most of the company hurried up-stairs, and there found everything precisely as the subject had described it.

In many instances he would be made to do the most extraordinary things without rhyme or reason, and that so suddenly and impetuously as to cause the greatest wonder and merriment among all his companions. Not only were similar phenomena of frequent occurrence, but so great was the influence upon him of this gentleman's mind that he liked everything and everybody his operator liked, and detested everything and everybody the operator disliked. He could, moreover, at any moment and at any distance from the operator be thrown into an unconscious state, and made to say and do whatever the operator desired.

This is no singular or isolated instance; it is a common experience wherever mesmerism is practiced. If Professors Carpenter, Cadwell and others about whom we hear so much in New England, and whose exhibitions are truly marvelous, can so influence their subjects as to make them think ice is hot, and burning coals are cold, if they can give to lemonade the flavor of brandy, and cause tea or coffee to taste like whisky to the palate of the entranced or semi-entranced sensitives with whom they exhibit, and if this power is not confined to place or time, but can be exerted from any distance when once a subject is completely brought into subjection to the operator's will, in what danger are persons placed who yield blindly and unthinkingly to every influence which strives to excite or lull them to submission.

Eternal vigilance is indeed the price of individual mental liberty, and while we do not tell you to yield to no influence whatsoever and under no condition, we do tell you that state of mental passivity which makes you the mere creature of another's will is hazardous in the extreme, and ill befits any one who believes in human equality and in the right of individual human beings.

Mesmerism can be used to allay pain and also to impart vitality. Vital force can be, and often is conveyed from mind to mind while animal magnetism passes from body to body by the mesmeric process. But Spiritual Science, telling you to depend on God and draw your supplies of strength from universal mind, not from personal beings whose caprices may at any time land you in sickness, crime or disaster, urges you to so cultivate your own spiritual being that anywhere, at any time you can obtain from the fount of all life the health and aid of which you stand in need.

Mesmerism subjugates, it enforces submission, it controls; while metaphysics teaches, argues with the patient, and instead of endeavoring to reduce him to the level of another's creature, brings him to see his own true position as a child of God and invites him to listen to the voice of God in his own soul, not recognizing the intermediation of any priest or Mesmerist claiming authority to dominate the will of another being. In our next lecture, which will treat on Mediumship, we shall pursue this subject into the arena of Spiritualism, to which Mesmerism always serves as a gateway and introduction.

LECTURE IX.

METAPHYSICS AND ITS RELATION TO MEDIUMSHIP.

IN our last address we spoke very pointedly on the subject of Mesmerism, or animal magnetism, and took decisive ground against that blind submission to another's will which is the leading element of success in mesmeric operation. Some persons, indeed many, seem to be so unhappily constituted as to be unable to steer clear of extremes; either they must accept another mind as their superior and master, almost as their God, or else repudiate its influence altogether.

Though metaphysics is old enough in India, and lies at the very foundation of the ancient Brahmanical religion, which is a purely, indeed an abstractly metaphysical system, in this country and in Europe, metaphysical ideas are so comparatively new to the mass of mankind at least, that any amount of error and misconception prevails among the populace as to what is really taught by metaphysical science. Some metaphysicians, indeed many, claim that spiritualism is a gigantic delusion, and style all mediumship error of the mortal mind; others again endeavor to unite the two, and in some instances manage to employ both most advantageously. The oft-repeated quotations, "You cannot mix oil and water," "there can be no fellowship between truth and error, light and darkness, Christ and Belial," do not apply in this connection, for

If we are to consider this subject fairly we must first define what we consider to be the true metaphysical view of death. Poets affirm "there is no death." At the Spiritualists' Camp Meeting in Oakland, California, where our teachings were received with so much kindly favor during June, 1886, these words were inscribed over the platform. Such an inscription of course excited much attention and provoked much comment; people were for the most part familiar with the quotation; it is to be found in Tennyson's "In Memoriam," in some poem of Longfellow's, and doubtless in the compositions of other poets also, but no matter how familiar the ear may be with certain words, no matter how often they may be heard in poetical readings or recitations, poetical license is always allowed for, and it is only when they come to be written up in plain blank prose as though they were as self-evident as the favorite motto, "Honesty is the best policy," and other equally sober and well-worn proverbs, that the public mind begins to challenge their truthfulness or really bestow much if any serious thought upon their import. Many Spiritualists and many who are not Spiritualists also take these familiar words and accept them as conveying a great truth; they find no fault with the phraseology and yet they make all kinds of fun and ridicule out of the assertion of metaphysicians, "There is no disease," a kindred statement; if one can be supported the other can, if one falls to the ground the other falls with it. Do those people who write over their platform, "There is no death," mean that there is no death in appearance? certainly they teach nothing of the kind, but very wisely draw a distinction between appearance and reality; while they affirm most positively there is no death, man never dies, they inter the body in the earth and acknowledge that it crumbles into dust, they are simply wise enough not to confound an appearance with a reality, they know the physical body is not man but only his fleeting garment.

When we affirm there is no disease we do not mean there is no appearance of disorder on the surface of the flesh, neither do we mean to deny that there may be disorders to clairvoyant vision in the interior of the physical frame, but we deny that man's body is himself just as we deny that man's clothing is his body. Science denies sunrise and sunset, but all experience acknowledges the rising and setting of the sun every day as appearances, nevertheless sunrise and sunset are illusions; the sun neither rises nor sets from the point of view of scientific vision, it only appears to; from the standpoint of science there is no sunrise, there is no sunset. Just as science disposes of appearances and illusions by revealing facts and truths otherwise unknown, concerning the constitution of the external universe, so spiritual science, which is the highest degree of all science, makes known the truth of Spiritual being in direct contradiction of every mortal and erring belief and appearance. Death is an appearance, an illusion, a belief of mortal mind and nothing more, and judging from the testimony of Swedenborg as well as from that of any number of modern seers and mediums, man does not know he has died unless he has himself passed through the belief of death in his own mortal mind. Swedenborg tells us he encountered spirits who had left their bodies fully fifty years and still did not know they were separated from them; again and again are we told by persons who claim to be in daily communion with so-called departed spirits, that there are myriads of spirits who do not know they are out of their earthly bodies, they cannot realize death unless they pass through the belief of death, while they have died to the belief of their companions on earth who have laid away their bodies in the ground, satisfied their mortal minds and memories that such and such persons are dead and gone, therefore, they see and hear from them no more unless some extraordinary phenomena occur in their presence which lead them to create another belief stronger than the belief that they are dead; this other belief, the belief in spirit return or in clairvoyant vision, is in such cases the stronger man turning out the strong; a stronger belief always overcomes a weaker one, a belief in spirit communion or in clairvoyance often suffices to neutralize the effects of the previous belief that some friend is really dead, has actually perished, or else has gone far, far away to some mysterious bourne from which no traveler returns, and whither no message from earth can reach or from whence no answer can be returned even should the message reach its destination.

Mortal belief establishes the idea of death, it then requires physical phenomena, test mediumship, clairvoyance, clairaudiance, etc. to break down this misbelief. The greater part of the work done by many Spiritualists and in many circles is an iconoclastic work, a work of pulling down, rooting up, image breaking, etc.; this work is in many instances positively necessary, and were it not done spiritual truth could not find an entrance to the mind of man on earth in its present average condition. Sites have to be cleared, rickety buildings must be torn down and carted away before new wholesome edifices can be erected on the land where once the shanties stood. The farmer knows well how necessary it is for some one to clear the ground of stones, kill the snakes and in various ways make ready for the sowing of the good seed which when planted in the cleared earth will in due time yield luxuriant harvests.

We must not condemn, neither must we undervalue, the hard iconoclastic exertions of the sturdy pioneers, who during the past nearly forty years have stampeded through this country proclaiming that man lives after the death of the physical body, and that those yet in mortal form can hold communion with those who have laid aside the mortal tenement. Many of these rugged teachers who have dealt sledge-hammer blows at error, may, like Cromwell's soldiers, when they entered the English cathedrals and parish churches, have broken down much that was beautiful and much that later on will be restored, but if like an army pursuing in hot haste the foe, trampling down gardens and cornfields on their way to victory over tyranny, injustice and oppression, these sturdy men and women, with little reverence for old beliefs, have overthrown some beautiful works of art in their endeavor to destroy only hideous idols, if they have sometimes been too reckless and have not fought with the most spiritual of weapons, we must remember that storms clear the air, and there is a perfect correspondence in the realm of mind to the facts of external nature, or rather, to state the idea the other way and more correctly, as the spiritual realm is the seat of cause, the physical universe being only the region of effects, there is a perfect reflex action in the external sphere corresponding to the events transpiring in the unseen realm of mind; storms, hurricanes, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, in a word every physical disturbance encountered by man on earth, corresponds to and results from some prior agitation in the kingdom of thought. We shall always observe, if we watch the signs of any times, that periods of great mental excitement and upheaval are marked physically as seasons of violent storms, and dread convulsions of external nature. It is now commonly admitted that the physical atmosphere of this globe is very considerably affected by human conduct, it being an almost undisputed fact that storms accompany and follow battles, and even large and brilliant pyrotechnic displays. If the inventions of man can create thunder and lightning and bring rain from the clouds, then surely as these inventions proceed from mind and are carried out by means of mind, no one need doubt that mind unassisted or rather unhampered by material things, can and does produce the greatest conceivable modifications in external temperature. The weather cannot be controlled by any one solitary mind, but when a concentrated mental effort is made, climate certainly is modified, storms are warded off, or rain is caused to descend.

In praying for rain two difficulties have to be met. First, all persons are not agreed as to the weather they desire, thus their power of will or influence of thought discords, one mind helping to bring about what another assists in warding off, and secondly many persons who employ a form of words have no real faith in the efficacy of what they are doing. Union and faith are both necessary to a result; where one is absent, and more still where both are absent, prayer and work are rendered ineffectual as means toward the accomplishment of any desired object. All miracles and wonderful occurrences which have taken place since the world began are just so many demonstrations of the power of mind over matter, nothing more or less. They are not, strictly speaking, supernatural, and they will not always be styled miracles, as miraculous correctly speaking is wonderful, and things no longer inspire wonder when the law governing them is understood.

Spiritual manifestations, and those in whose presence and seemingly through whose instrumentality they were produced, were in olden days supposed to be the favored few, the specially chosen of heaven to demonstrate the being and will of God to men on earth. To-day, as phenomena multiply and all sorts of trivial things are attributed to the action of "departed spirits," it becomes highly necessary for some one to so deal with the marvels of the present day, nineteenth century miracles as they are sometimes called, as to make of them a means for enforcing great universal truths not very well apprehended by the majority of those who pay to witness them and enthusiastically uphold them.

Now once for all let it be stated that metaphysicians cannot afford to ignore or taboo spiritualism. It is for them to recognize its claims and throw light upon its phenomena; to attribute all phenomena to illusion or delusion will not do. It satisfies no profound thinker, and least of all will it weaken the hold Spiritualism has gained on the minds of the people.

We must all admit that, making all due allowance for imposture and exaggeration, alleged phenomena do occur, and these phenomena are indubitable demonstrations of the transcendent power of mind over matter in many instances. No matter what interpretations may be put upon old-time wonders; no matter by what processes of subtle reasoning and the invalidation of history and testimony Rationalists may seek to explain away the miracles of the old and new testament and those of the ancient books of India, China, Persia, Egypt and other distant climes, these "miracles" are being duplicated in our midst today; we see the cheap jugglery of the mendicant fakir of India imitated by many "mediums of the new dispensation," and however we may dislike so low a phase of mental action, it is vain and absurd to try and defend the hypothesis of fraud, which is no explanation whatever of either the oriental or the occidental medium's performances.

We have, however, ample evidences of far higher manifestations of spirit power than those which can possibly come under the head of jugglery, even when the word is used as applicable to much that is really genuine in India, though on a low intellectual and moral plane. Unmistakable evidences of a higher order of intelligence accompanying the phenomena are multiplying on every hand, and surely no one can read Crookes, Wallace, Zollner, and many another celebrated writer in defense of phenomenal Spiritualism without seeing that men of unquestioned scientific standing and ability are compelled to consider spiritualistic phenomena as worthy the closest scientific scrutiny and most persistent investigation. Professor Huxley and other learned men who have spoken derisively of Spiritualism have by such actions done far more to demean themselves in the eyes of the fair-minded than they have injured the cause they have treated with disdain.

No subject bordering on the question of human immortality can ever be regarded by the really serious and studious as other than of the deepest interest and utmost importance. All attempts therefore to belittle so grave a theme can only expose the shallow-mindedness of those who treat it with flippant contempt. Unfortunately, many Spiritualists play into the hands of their detractors by approaching a subject of the most serious importance in a spirit of levity and idle curiosity. From the traitors within the camp far more than from avowed enemies on the outside Spiritualism receives its deadliest attacks. But the movement itself is vital and prolific enough to successfully resist all opposition both from within and without, and though many Spiritualists are nervously afraid lest the enemy should prevail when the phenomena are submitted to the searching analysis of reason, such apprehensions must, in the nature of things, be groundless unless those who entertain them have secret doubts of their own as to the real genuineness of what before others they enthusiastically maintain.

True metaphysicians, instead of denouncing Spiritualism and decrying mediumship, in order to be true to their own standards and to act in defense of their avowed principles, must be the interpreters and exponents of the truths of Spiritualism, though at all times and under all circumstances they must not be backward in exposing fallacies and correcting prevailing errors. To rightly understand the nature of men we must consider man not as a compound of matter and spirit, but as spirit only. We have bodies as we own clothing and dwelling, but we are spirit. Man is altogether a spiritual being, and therefore the whole of man, not only a part of him, lives after the death of the body. The very first step in the direction of a right comprehension of spiritual science is for the mind to arrive at a point in its perception of truth where it can intelligently asseverate its full conviction that man is only and altogether spirit; man being entirely spiritual, not partly spiritual and partly material, it stands to reason that man's prerogatives and powers are not necessarily affected to any appreciable degree by his retaining or losing the outward structure called the body. If man is not wholly spiritual, if it takes spirit and matter, two opposite and distinct elements to make man, then throughout eternity you will all of you be something less than perfect human beings, unless you are reembodied in a physical structure lasting eternally.

No end of vagaries have arisen from a belief that the duality of human nature is a duality of spirit and matter, which it is not. The true duality of man is the duality of love and wisdom, of intellect and affection, of man and woman, but the masculine and feminine principles which constitute the perfect dual are equally and immortally spiritual and spiritual only. It certainly seems high time, after nearly forty years of spiritualistic advocacy in this country, that Spiritualists at least should have long since abandoned the false beliefs which have led to a carnal doctrine of the resurrection of the physical body on a future day of judgment, a doctrine indeed which Spiritualists most emphatically deny, but one which they must nevertheless ultimately accept if they share the radical error which originally gave birth to it, viz., a belief that man is a compound of mind and matter.

Does it not appear evident to every one of you that if it takes mind and matter both to make man, that those who are minus matter, having left their material bodies in the ground, must either at some future time be rehabilitated in matter and have matter secured to them forever, or else be eternally minus something necessary to their completeness as human entities?

We know there are many of the school of Kardec who advocate what Kardec calls re-incarnation, and that the same doctrine in slightly altered form is now extensively advocated in Spiritualistic circles under the name of re-embodiment; we know also that Theosophists, as a rule, accept this doctrine in yet another modification, but the tendency of all re-incarnationist teaching is to the effect that the wearing of a mortal body indicates a somewhat imperfect and unprogressed condition of the spirit. All desire to see the time when they will be embodied in mortal forms no longer, while all who are to any extent familiar with Buddhistic teachings know that the Buddhists make many sacrifices of earthly pleasure that they may shorten the term and lessen the number of their earthly embodiments.

It will be seen then that not only is it not taught even by believers in the necessity of several successive earthly embodiments for the human spirit that the body is necessary to the existence of the spirit, but the case is put very much more strongly; the only logical inference from such teaching being that whenever the spirit arrives at a condition of maturity or perfection it will have done with matter forever. The reverse doctrine, that matter is necessary to the perfect human being, is taught by orthodox Christians whose views on the resurrection and eternal duration of the physical body are borrowed from the crudest and most external views entertained long, long ago by the Egyptians, whose scriptures were evidently familiar to many of the Christian teachers of the first century. Paul in his epistle to the Corinthians had evidently been reading the Egyptian scriptures: he refers to them and not to the Hebrew writings, which contain no such doctrine, when he argues against the prevailing ideas concerning the resurrection entertained at Corinth in his day; he accuses those of folly who entertain the materialistic fallacy he undertakes to answer and demolish, and while he teaches of a body which is indestructible, and incorruptible, he vehemently protests against the belief that the resurrection-body is the physical frame.

Though a long chapter giving Paul's views on this subject in detail forms part of the burial service of the Episcopal church, that church, in common with the Roman and Greek Catholic churches and all orthodox Protestant sects, maintains the resurrection and deathlessness of the physical organism, and while no one can possibly reasonably accept such a dogma, it is accepted by all strictly orthodox Christians as a matter of faith, tacitly though blindly assented to and usually included in a catalogue of insoluble mysteries, which on closer investigation can never be vindicated when judged at the bar of reasonable religion.

The Christadelphians, Second Adventists and some other singular modern sects, have gone so far as to proclaim the inseparability of consciousness from the physical frame. Man, say they, is his body and his body is himself. Man is mortal only according to their theory, he actually dies, he has no immortal soul, he goes down into the grave and knows not anything until the shrill blast of Gabriel's trumpet shall re-awaken him on the resurrection morn.

This latest expression of folly is the ligitimate offspring of a belief in the physical body of man as a necessary portion of himself. Endow matter with sensation, let yourself believe that the physical body can feel and suffer, admit the theory of a sensorium in the physical brain, and it is only a step to the reductio ad absurdum of the Christodelphians, for they, seeing the folly of believing that man is made up of two diametrically opposite elements, both of which are necessary to his real being, discard the idea of spirit altogether, and make the flesh everything.

Again and again have we said to our students and audiences, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve. Matter or Spirit, which? Materialism or Spiritualism, which?" One or the other you may accept, but logically you cannot accept them both. They are like two horses hitched together in a team, when the one horse insists upon pulling in an opposite direction to the other. A comic picture full of the keenest and wittiest satire, published some years ago, exactly illustrates the "matter and spirit" theory of human nature advocated by so many. Two lawyers were pulling at a cow; they seemed both about equally strong men. The one tugged vigorously at the cow's head and tried to pull her forward; the other with equal force tugged at the tail with the intention of dragging her backwards. The result was, the animal remained stationary.

arrive at any intelligent result in investigation, if we have one theory possessing our minds perpetually neutralizing the influence of an opposite; as you lean more to spirit than to matter, so far you succeed in demonstrating truth, and in reaping such advantages as accrue from faith in truth; but in so far as you lean to the idea of the reality of matter and regard your physical organism as a necessary part of yourself, the partner of your spiritual nature, as a kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation and no man can serve two masters, so you fail utterly in arriving at any logical result in your reasonings, and continue impotent to conquer the ravages of disease because your mind is held in the thraldom of mortal misbelief in which you are children of darkness and slaves of error, not knowing the freedom of the spirit which alone is liberty.

But it may be asked, if the physical body is not even a part of a real human being, what is it then? is it a mere illusion of mortal sense, having no kind of real existence whatsoever? We know many metaphysicians take that extreme ground, and sometimes appear to render their position defensible by elaborate arguments; but for all practical purposes we do not need to go further than to deny to matter when organized into a physical body any more power than it possesses when in the form of an article of wearing apparal which we may wear and constantly be seen in, but which is in no sense a part of ourselves. A poet speaks the truth and nothing but the truth when he says of the discarded form lying on the bier about to be interred in the earth, "it was mine, it was not I."

When we speak of mortal bodies in the possessive case we can recognize their existence in the same manner as that in which we recognize the existence of our clothing, and you none of you believe there is any sensation in your coats and dresses. You can witness the destruction of your wearing apparel on your person and yet feel no pain; the fabric cannot feel and you do not imagine that it can, but if the flame or rent passes from the clothing to the body, you then under ordinary circumstances, begin to suffer pain; metaphysics, however, takes you further than the outward shell, and tells you you feel no pain in the physical structure any more than in the dress, but in your mortal mind which is reached through your body just as your body is reached through your dress. When anæsthetics are given to dull pain, doses of mortal mind belief are administered, the mortal mind consciousness of the patient is benumbed; if completely so, then there is no pain whatever during the performance of the most difficult surgical operation of the longest duration. If the mortal mind is only confused or partially stupefied then the patient suffers from experiences which may be likened to bad dreams and distressing nightmare. When mesmeric treatment is given, if the operator be a person of intelligence and good-will, far less danger is incurred by the patient than by the use of ether, chloroform, nitrous oxide, gas, cocaine, or any of the other deadly drugs and gases usually resorted to by physicians and dentists. When a very mediumistic person comes under the influence of a spirit friend who entrances him, and thereby removes his thought entirely from the outer plane of consciousness, the mesmeric method is still employed, only in such cases the operator has passed through the change called death.

Dr. Baker Fahnestock in his work on Statuvolence, which is a species of self-mesmerism, relates many interesting anecdotes of persons who have thrown themselves into what he calls the statuvolic condition, and while in that state have remained quite impervious to sensations conveyed from without.

We do not wish in any degree to derogate from the purely metaphysical position we have taken in these lectures, and which we know is the only really logical and tenable one; still there is such a thing as "rendering to all their dues," "rendering to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's," etc., and with a view to not neglecting this duty, we give all due credit to those lower agencies which, as secondary causes, necessarily operate on their own plane with outward and visible results, sufficient to lead to the avowedly scientific theory that material remedies have a power and virtue resident in them, whereas Mesmerism alone is adequate to demonstrate that mortal mind operating upon simple matter can apotheosise it to such an extent as to convert it into wine, beer, ardent spirit, tea, coffee, lemonade or anything else the operator may choose to will it to become to the perception of the sensitive who drinks it. Mesmerism deals in hallucinations, it purposely hallucinates, and by so doing demonstrates what we are teaching, that mortal mind endows matter with such properties as it may choose to impart to it.

Man's creations are unreal, God being the only true Creator; the witness of mortal sense is incoherent, so that when a question is raised as to what are the properties of a simple glass of water, one mesmerized sensitive describes brandy, another lager beer, another whiskey, another coffee; to the audience, which is usually in a state of the utmost hilarity, all the subjects on the stage are acting most comically and unreasonably; the professor makes his living by repeating these experiments night after night before crowds of excited, often enthusiastic spectators; but what is the outcome of it all? Has the simple fact that mortal mind endows matter with such attributes as it evolves from itself been utilized as a rule among mesmerists and their followers in the elucidation of the greatest problem of the ages? Here and there there have been and there still are men who devote themselves to the practical and humanitarian work of making such experiments serve to teach the community many a useful lesson, but who can deny that in the majority of instances curiosity, sight-seeing, love of sensation and mystery constitute the stock in trade of those who throng the halls where mesmeric entertainments are given? Now how is it with Spiritualists and mediums? Is there on the whole a much higher tone in the spiritualistic than in the mesmeric community? Are spiritualist meetings and séances at large devoted to much more than the gratification of curiosity? If we utter something of a Jeremiad against the present widespread apathy among Spiritualists toward the higher phases of Spiritualism and the almost insane demand for tests everywhere, we shall only be echoing the voice of the spiritualistic press all over the country and abroad.

Take Boston as an example; Boston has long been celebrated as spiritualistic headquarters, the Banner of Light, the oldest newspaper in the world devoted to the advocacy of modern Spiritualism, has floated on the Boston breeze for many and many a year; public meetings and private séances have been held continuously with many fluctuations in their number and importance for a period of well nigh forty years, and yet today a large percentage of the oldest spiritualists are crying as with the voice of the horse-leech, give us more, more. More what? science? philosophy? No, alas! no, tests. The same old, old tests over and over again, without even a break in their monotony; the same faces may be seen year in and year out at meetings and séances, demanding these everlasting tests which must long since have lost the least approach to novelties. This insatiable greed for tests is as bad as any other depraved appetite, it is like a taste for liquor, opium or tobacco, it grows upon the persons who indulge in it, and what under heaven can be more farcical than to see a company of people, many of them gray-haired grandsires and grandmothers, demanding the same old tests of every old and new medium, and then shrieking themselves hoarse whenever they platitudinize on "progress" and "advance." Such is of course not a faithful portrait of all Spiritualists by any means, but unfortunately it does no injustice to a numerically powerful section of them.

Now what influence do such people exert on mediums? How far do they influence the communications? We reply unhesitatingly that in the case of susceptible and partially developed sensitives it reacts upon their mental sphere like a fog to obscure the sunlight, it rears impassable barriers between them and the higher spheres of intelligence, it checks their aspirations and keeps them perpetually on the lowest round of the ladder of intellectual and spiritual culture. Mediums are constantly blamed for the delinquencies of their clients; their over susceptibility is the cause of their reflecting to the extent they do the desires of those around them, and so depressing is this incessant demand for the most inferior kind of tests that many a medium confines himself or herself to this incessant ministration to the lowest condition of mortal mind curiosity, for the sake of a living for self and family. Demand regulates supply in every market; if articles are never called for tradespeople soon cease to keep them, but let an article be asked for with any degree of persistency and it is soon procurable almost everywhere.

We must in every particular strive to conform ourselves to the truth embodied in those often quoted words, "Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened, for every one who asketh receiveth, he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." The paltry twaddle and the hateful recrimination continually passing from lip to lip, against mediums and mediumship, the sanctimonious attitude of the "unco guid," who stand aside with an air of "I am holier than thou," can no more raise the tone of mediumship and stem the torrent of misleading information conveyed through mediumistic channels, than streets can be cleaned by people exaggerating their foul condition, but never raising a hand or taking a single step in the direction of cleanliness. To remove evils, not to bemoan them, is the work of the true reformer; to stand still and rail at evils while all the while you accept them as inevitable, is the worst kind of folly; when we see an error we must set to work to overcome it. "You must take people as you find them," "You must make the best of things as they are," and similar speeches so constantly heard are the most effectual barriers imaginable to true progress, and here we come to a point in our address where we must explain the difference between clairvoyant and intuitive diagnosis and prophecy.

Ordinary clairvoyance, which is rarely genuine clairvoyance (clear-seeing) at all, looks at disease, evil, misery, and after describing the condition of a patient at the time of examination as pitiable in the extreme, sometimes goes on to depict future hopelessness. Such delineations are vile and false in the extreme they are worse than useless; not only do they do no good, they lead to the most distressing results, as they fill the patient and his nearest friends with the gloomiest forebodings of impending disaster, thereby robbing the patient and his attendants and sympathizers of the bright rays of hope they might bask in, were it not for the influence exerted upon their minds by the prophetic utterances of one who by reason of some singular gift of thought-reading has impressed them as an almost infallible discerner of their actual condition and destiny. Astrology, clairvoyance and a whole batch of kindred mixtures of truth and error, science and superstition, need considerable revision, expurgation and elucidation before they can be of much real service and do no harm to communities at large. "A little learning is a dangerous thing," "A little knowledge inclineth man to atheism," no wiser sentences than these culled from the poet Pope and the philosopher Bacon, have ever fallen from human lips, but we know how studiously both those geniuses pursued the fair goddess

A superficial smattering of information on occult subjects is often dangerous and misleading; the student of the occult needs a well-disciplined mind and must be prepared to make some hard and consecutive effort to reach the deep still waters of safety beneath the rushing, treacherous breakers on the shore. An astrologer in Boston handed out some horoscopes the other day with this inscription: "The wise man rules his stars, the fool obeys them," and this audacious acknowledgement of human free agency he declared harmonized perfectly with the conclusions of the best astrologers of ancient time. If this be so, then astrology is no more objectionable and quite as serviceable as meteorology. If clairvoyants can take the stand and proclaim the wise man conquers fate, the foolish submit to it, clairvoyance may be utilized as a means for the prevention of catastrophes instead of, as it is too often, alas, misused as a means of fixing error ineradicably in the human mind. Clairvoyant delineations of disease may be and often are superficially true, but in many instances they are not even that; often a reputed clairvoyant becomes morbidly sensitive to the latent fears of a patient and to the fears of those who fear for him also, and in an abnormal condition proceeds to locate imaginary diseases in all parts of the body. The danger you incur if you permit such diagnosis to affect your belief, is that nervous affections, notably hysteria, which is the most extreme form of nervous excitement, in many instances lead to the creation and external manifestation of the very disorders which a person dreads and believes he already has or soon will have.

To see an evil is not necessarily to be able to cure it; genuine clairvoyance, or rather intuitive perception, finds the cause of the evil, discovers why you have anything the matter with you at all, and by ferreting out the primal cause of your being in any way disordered or diseased, sets to work to overcome the effect flowing from the first cause of the malady by meeting that cause courageously and helping you to vanquish its hold upon your mind. Jesus, we are told in his conversation with the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well, exercised what might now be called clairvoyance; he read her past life and told her all about her marital relations, past and present, but instead of giving her to understand that she must always remain burdened by her misdeeds and the consequences of them, he used his gift of seership only as a prelude to a glorious oration on the all-potency of the living water which every human spirit can find within itself, the panacea for every ill, the right divine which conquers every wrong.

Many mediumistic persons are really influenced by minds who have not yet outgrown their earthly errors; they are therefore led to prescribe the same abominable medicines they used on earth, and to predict the doom of patients after the method of ignorant medical prognosis. All such proffered information and advice should be attributed to the source whence it really emanates, viz, mortal mind in error, and as the dissolution of the outward frame does not guarantee such spiritual illumination as will enable one to become immediately infallible, as earthly errors are often slowly laid aside one by one, we must assume precisely the same attitude to "spirits" as to "mortals," knowing that error will continue to manifest until overcome by spiritual growth, not by the dropping of the mortal robe of flesh which no more changes the condition of the spirit than the dress changes that of the body. Let mediumistic powers be estimated at their true worth, cultivated and utilized accordingly; but a blind idolatry which has for its watchword "Thus saith the spirits," is a return to the errors of barbaric ages, and accords only with a slavish subjection of one's own mentality diametrically opposed to every enlightened conception of individual liberty.

LECTURE X.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS FOR STUDENTS COMMENCING PRACTICE.

THE preceding nine lectures in this course, as you must all have observed, have been devoted largely to laying a foundation on which to build a consistent method of practice in accordance with such new light as the world is now receiving on the science of life immortal. It is said of Jesus that his mission to the world was to bring life and immortality to light, in other words, to reveal to man the nature of his own being, to help the human race to discover and to recognize its own latent possibilities.

The new birth so constantly preached upon from Christian pulpits is nothing other in its esoteric sense than the unfolding of man's spiritual nature so that he discovers what he really is. "Man, know thyself," the celebrated motto written over the great Athenian Academy of old, is the command of Spiritual Science to all the world today. "The proper study of mankind is man," does not surely mean that anthropology must be confined to the study of man's outermost vesture, the mere shell which for a brief span apparently encircles and encloses the kernel of immortal man. Spiritual Science, or Theosophy, is, properly speaking, comprehensive anthropology, and it is at the same time pure theology, for theology is as much a science as geology; but as we do not look down into the earth to find the stars, neither do we gaze toward the heavens to discover fossils, so we cannot investigate spiritual truths by means of simply physical research.

With what exists on the plane of mortal sense, and with all the bewildering and utterly discordant beliefs of mortal mind spiritual truth has no other dealing than the sun has with darkness, mist and fog, truth drives away error as light banishes darkness. What is error? what is darkness? nothing, a simple negation. It is, therefore, incontestable logic to affirm there is no disease as there is no darkness, which means that disease and darkness are both on a level, they are nothing, they are simple negations of the intellect, and as negations only must they be fought and overcome. Darkness occasions fear, it engenders every form of horrible dread; weird and awful superstitions are born and cradled in ignorance which is spiritual and mental darkness; dispel the illusion produced by ignorance or darkness and fear flies away with the approach of dawn. The first step for the healer to take is to affirm the nothingness of error; you must in your practice make it nothing to your own mind and nothing to your patient's thought also, for as long as either of you regard it as something you will fear it, and fearing it, it will have power over you as it will receive power from above, i. e., from your mind endowing it with the semblance of reality.

Some practitioners fail to demonstrate truth in many instances because of their failure to comprehend the true principles of the science of which they are the professed exponents. Take the case of many well-meaning but poorly-informed aspirants to metaphysical knowledge; they evidently have no clear idea in their own minds, and therefore cannot impart any clear thought to their patients when they employ certain formulas which they suppose are endowed with some talismanic value; such Kabalistic incantations often mystify and mislead, as they savor far more of blind mysticism than of intelligent appreciation of truth. You have no cancer, no tumor, no fever, etc., etc., conveys to many a mind no truth whatever, but rather it instils error and fails to break the hold of mortal mischief upon the patient's mind, as the patient hearing such an utterance or receiving such an impression mentally, while understanding nothing of spiritual science, reasons thus with himself: Some people are afflicted thus with disorders it is true, but I am happily not one of that number. I have been misled by false diagnosis into a belief that I have a disease with which some of my fellow beings are afflicted but from which I am free. Such a conclusion is false in many cases, as the process of reasoning which leads to such a conclusion is utterly erroneous; that person has that disease whatever it may be, as much as it is possible for any one to have it. There has been no mistake whatever in diagnosis, the diagnosis has been absolutely correct on the plane of mortal sense; the condition and appearance of the flesh is just as the doctor stated, and it is not any part of the work of a metaphysician to deny that there is such an appearance in the flesh as the one indicated. The metaphysician must turn from flesh to spirit, transfer the glance of his mind from mortal error to immortal truth, look away from the outward garment, tattered and disfigured as it may be, to the perfect spiritual form in health and harmony. You may be ill in body, you may suffer in mortal mind, but what matters it if you do? you must look away from sense to spirit and start right in your treatment or you can never hope to arrive at satisfactory results. Bad beginnings can never lead to good endings, for as surely as the flower and fruit will correspond in type and species to the nature of the sown seed from which it has sprung, so certainly will dire results of harm and failure follow upon all attempts at treating mentally, starting from false premises.

Every practitioner should regard himself or herself as a teacher rather than as a healer in the ordinary sense, for as spiritual science recognizes neither magnetism, Mesmerism nor any external force or aid whatsoever in method of treatment, the spiritual doctor (Latin equivalent of teacher) must never undertake to tolerate the assumption that he is to heal another by virtue of imparting his life-essence into another frame; vampirism is possible but detestable, and must be sternly discountenanced in all its phases. Likewise we must boldly denounce the hateful and obnoxious error that supposes it neccessary for a healer to take on a patient's disease in the process of removing such disorder. You surely do not consider it necessary to take on people's immoralities in order to cure them of theft, lying, or impurity; you cannot cleanse the moral atmosphere around you by becoming befouled by its corruptions, neither can you help to raise the sick to health any more than you can raise the fallen to virtue by descending onto the plane of error and becoming yourself a victim of disease.

dents have usually to contend. The first great obstacle in the way of accomplishing the healing of a patient is your own as well as other's belief in hereditary sin or transmitted disease. Now how are we to meet and vanquish the prevailing belief in heredity, apparently so well grounded in exact knowledge. The sins of the parents, we are told, are visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generations: daily experiences seem to prove the truth of these declarations of the Jewish scriptures. Adam's sin transmitted, even if not imputed, is said to be the fruitful source of human suffering, and in some form or other hereditary vice and suffering are acknowledged by all classes of thinkers. We freely admit the truth of the theory of heredity up to a certain point, but under no circumstances do we deem it advisable to dwell upon transmitted evil and let our belief in it tie our hands and cripple our confidence when we can all go back to the sublime opening words of the Pentateuch and exclaim, "In the beginning, God,"—God is the beginning of every life, the foundation principle of all being, and to God (infinite goodness) we must all trace our origin. If God be for us, who or what can prevail against us? if we are partakers of God's infinite nature, how can we be subject to any finite power? we must direct our thought immediately to the supreme fountain of all life and make God the all in all of being in our thought. We must look at each other in spirit as in God, as all alike partakers of the divine nature; we must forget all save the atma, the absolutely pure and only really immortal part of our being. Gazing at a patient in spirit and not in sense, with the clear vision of the soul, we see the soul in another, all phantasms of mortal sense are blotted out, all the will-o'-the-wisps of earthly fancy and illusion fade away, and, standing face to face with man in truth, with man as Son of God in heaven, we see the Father in the Son, recognizing the Eternal Parent in his offspring.

The fourth gospel teaches this glorious truth esoterically; exoteric interpreters claim all the utterances ascribed to Jesus as pertaining to a solitary embodiment of divinity in Palestine nearly two thousand years ago, but spiritual discernment troubles not itself with history; it recognizes as ever present the life of God in man, and thus, overlooking all ancestral taint as derived from the first man, Adam, it acknowledges only the second Adam, the Christ, the Lord from heaven. Paul the Gnostic undoubtedly labored hard to impress these esoteric verities upon the minds of the Christians of the first century; he never talked to them of Christ as a personality but as a living principle of truth within them. Christ in them the hope of glory meant the soul, the discovery of which assured those who found it of endless and fadeless glory. Paul's attitude toward bodily dissolution appears to have been one of utter indifference coupled with perfect submission and resignation to Divine Will. He speaks at times as though debating the question with himself, as to whether it is more desirable to prolong existence on the mortal plane, or to quit the earthly tabernacle; but one way or the other, let God's will be done, says the devoted apostle.

A considerable amount of misapprehension seems to prevail among many as to what the mortal body really is and what earthly discipline is designed for; the strangest theories are promulgated in some quarters which by reason of manifest inconsistency demand rebuke and refutation. A prevalent idea among some metaphysicians seems to be that the physical universe is an unreality, a dream, a phantom, a shadow; in one sense it is just that and nothing more, but shadows are cast by substances; if there be a subjective there must also be an objective state; reflections are produced by what is more than a reflection; so the physical universe is the reflection of the spiritual; matter is only a shadow, spirit is the only substance; everything is spiritual and indestructible, and being so is infinitely greater than mortal belief makes it

Diseases are inverted mental images, misapprehensions of the truth of being, the sorriest and most miserable illusions, unworthy of an instant's countenance. Spiritual man in health is God's reflection of himself, physical man in health is man's reflection of himself. A perfect reflection is neither an evil nor error, it occasions no pain, sorrow or distress, it is beautiful to gaze upon, lovely to the view. Physical man in health is truth's reflection, wisdom's mirror, not indeed a reality in the sense that spirit is reality, but the beautiful product of a beautiful reality, like unto a lovely landscape depicted in clear waters, or a charming picture depicted on a screen. Physical man is created perfect by spirit, and while not destined forever to remain as a separate and apparently self-existent entity, is nevertheless produced as mind appears to mind, seeking expression.

Generation is a spiritual, not a physical act; mind wishes to reflect its image, mind desires communion with mind, and in the attempt made by God's ideas to communicate and manifest themselves intelligently, the one to the other, the physical universe, including physical man, is brought into existence. The mortal mind is thus created, it is man's creation, and originally imperfect though not sinful; sin commences when the creature turns away from the creator and desires a life apart from the fountain of all good.

A question constantly raised by students is, to what extent is faith necessary on the part of the patient? Some appear to teach the absolute necessity of faith prior to healing, in a manner calculated to render it impossible for a large percentage of earnest seekers after health to receive it. To assist such enquirers as far as possible has been one of our principal aims in preparing these addresses for the press. There are without doubt several kinds of faith mentioned in the Bible as there are several kinds of wine mentioned in its pages. True, vital, saving faith, faith necessary to salvation as it is often called, is not simple belief, it is a result of spiritual unfoldment, it is the natural and inevitable effect of the spiritualization of the believer. This faith James defines as inseparable from good works; in his epistle which Luthur did not understand and therefore rejected, he contrasts two opposite kinds of faith as unlike each other as are the two kinds of wine mentioned in different parts of the Bible, the one being held up to execration and the other cordially recommended to the attention of all who wished to preserve their health and vigor. As unlike as the pure, unfermented juice of the grape is to the abominable health and morality destroying stimulant, the sale and consumption of which is the deepest degradation of civilized communities and the blackest spot on America's as well as on England's escutcheon, so unlike are false and true faith, the one like alcohol leads to bitter persecution, hatred, revenge and murder in the name of religion, while the other brings forth only the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

Faith rests on evidence, mortal belief too often relies solely on fanatical prejudice and superstition. True faith is only one degree less than absolute spiritual knowledge or divine understanding; mortal belief is founded in most instances on nothing more credible than idle tales invented by ignorance and malice to win the unwary into the embrace of a dominant autocracy in which the rights of the individual are crushed beneath the relentless wheels of a tyrant Juggernaut. Aristocracy engenders mortal belief, democracy encourages the individual to place himself on a level with all other human beings; and instead of telling him to bend in abject submission to another finite mind, fallible and liable to error as his own, it directs him to the central sun of being, to the immortal luminary, even his own immortal soul. God is in me and I am in God, says the one who has discovered his own soul; have you found your soul? not are you in danger of losing it? is the question asked by the true spiritual director, who is not a prelate or a master, but simply a guide to the less experienced along the lengthy journey which most at least must take from the city of destruction into which they were born to the celestial city whither the road of earthly discipline, no matter how long and weary it may be, is ever tending.

It is all in vain to teach a philosophy of negation and label it spiritual science; science is knowledge, not ignorance, neither nescience nor sciolism nor psuedo-science can heal the sick and cast out devils; only the bright light of truth dawning upon the soul can melt the icy barriers of prejudice and error which hold it away from salvation, and what is salvation but extrication from mortal misbelief According to the theorizing of those who draw no clear line of distinction between saving faith and mere belief, theory and practice are so confounded that the former is supposed to include the latter. Salvation through belief in truth is impossible unless belief leads to action, and no further than belief does lead to action on the part of the believer.

What is sensible, rational belief? and remember there is such a thing as rational belief, and while belief is no substitute for knowledge it is the next thing to it; it is far less than knowledge oftentimes, it can never at its very best be quite equal to knowledge, but it may be on the road to knowledge, it may even be termed a lesser degree of knowledge, and is so accepted practically in every court of justice in the world, and in every daily transaction in business circles. Judge and jury sum up evidence and pronounce accordingly; they have not seen a crime committed, it is true, but they have examined and cross-examined evidence, witnesses have been called repeatedly to the stand and questioned with a view to extracting from them the utmost they know bearing on the case in hand. No sensible person could be guilty of the manifest absurdity of accepting testimony against his own positive knowledge as an eye-witness, but as decisions have to be arrived at in many instances where testimony is all that judge and jury have to go upon, so in almost every instance in daily life, faith, in its lower meaning of belief in the credibility of testimony which does not fail when submitted to the closest reasoning, has to be relied on.

You may marvel at some people's obtuseness and incredulousness, but no honest skepticism can ever be sinful. The fact that it is honest is enough to prove it honorable and upright. Agnosticism, a merely negative condition of mind, may not be so conducive to a quick response to spiritual action as a more enlightened condition; but as an agnostic may be a thoroughly honest person and have the sincerest desire to learn, be in continual and aspiring readiness to accept truth immediately it appeals to him, agnosticism or skepticism, in other words ignorance and doubt, are no insurmountable barriers for either healer or patient to confront. Belief rests on evidence. How can I believe without evidence? and I have had no evidence sufficient to convince me. I would believe if I could, I don't want to be an unbeliever, but I cannot believe without more light than I ever expect to receive in this world at least. Such are the expressions we are constantly hearing from the lips of those invalids who cannot understand how they are going to reach the Jordan, or find the pool of Siloam, in whose healing tide they may lose their sickness and their pain.

The true spiritual scientist takes such people as he finds them and trusts to the active aggressive action of positive spiritual light to dispel the darkness of ignorance which yet enshrouds their minds.

Do I believe in sunshine? Is not the question rather, Do I feel the warm kisses of the sunbeams on my cheek? Do I believe the winds are blowing, the birds singing, the waters rushing, the insects humming, nay, do I realize these sights and sounds of nature? I may indeed, if I am blind or deaf, accept the word of truthful witnesses and feel convinced they are not deceived when they tell me of what I cannot individually apprehend; but before I can enjoy any certainty on these matters I must come in relation with them for myself through the awakenment of powers heretofore dormant in my being.

To demand belief as a prerequisite to healing, without defining how faith comes about is unreasonable in the extreme. But it will be argued, does not the New Testament tell us that Jesus said to many whom he was instrumental in healing, "Thy faith hath made thee whole," and are we not told of many instances where he spoke approvingly of the great faith manifested by some who had not as yet been the recipients of any special blessing? The faith thus commended seems to have sprung from two sources, sometimes from one, sometimes from the other, and possibly in some cases from a combination of both. There can be no doubt that many in the surrounding country had heard the story of the wonderful cures performed by Jesus on those who were considered hopelessly sick, insane, or even dead, and having investigated some of the alleged cases of recovery and found them evidently genuine, they naturally were inclined to believe on the testimony of those whom they knew were relating positive fact when they described the manner in which they were healed.

Many of those whom Jesus helped appeared to be in some doubt as to the manner in which they were helped. In the case of a young man who received his sight the writer of the story implies that he knew little or nothing about his case except that he was formerly blind, but after having received a treatment from Jesus his sight came to him.

Not in all instances, not in the majority even, does it appear that patients really knew how they were healed, but then how many people are there today who really know how the sunlight invigorates them, or how the air and food nourish and sustain their bodies? The great bulk of mankind stand in the relation of passive, unthinking, unknowing recipients of daily blessings. They have instinct or reason enough to place themselves within the reach of light and air; they know enough to eat food, and instinct, if not reason, teaches them how to select it; so is it in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred with those who place themselves in the hands of a doctor or healer. It should not be so; persons ought to be better informed, acting less in the dark than they usually do. Still so ready is God through Nature to bless us all that unless we actually turn away from what is needful for our sustenance we are sustained.

The understanding of truth is indeed necessary as a protection against the manifold errors and seductions with which all are constantly surrounded. Intelligent faith is a result of the partial understanding of truth at least; faith may be eventually lost in sight as the twilight of morning is lost in the fuller brightness of noonday; but to confound mere unsustained belief with any spiritual power capable of restoring the sick to health is to so confound truth and error as to make them almost synonymous. If you as a healer go to a patient suffering in darkness and foul air, and you open the windows and let in the sunbeams and fresh currents of wholesome atmosphere, you do not demand of the sufferer that he shall believe in your power to do so before you have demonstrated your ability. The only attitude which places a barrier in the healer's way is a dominant, obstinate, aggressive error in a patient's mind, which causes him to wilfully spurn or reject the overtures of healing strength in a spirit of obstinate perversity, contempt and scorn. The proper attitude for a person to assume who knows nothing of spiritual science is a calm, quiet, negative attitude of receptivity to evidence if it be presented.

The truly scientific spirit is the only desirable one to cultivate. A scientist is supposed to have no opinion on a subject of which he knows nothing. He is, however, prepared to witness phenomena dispassionately and carefully and impartially weigh all evidence presented. Now let us see wherein faith, confidence, indeed absolute knowledge is required on the part of the healer, while the patient, on the occasion of a first introduction to metaphysics, should hold a calm position of agnosticism. If you advertise as a healer and undertake to treat the sick in mind and body, society has a right to expect that you have had some practical and indeed incontestable evidence of the value of a mode of treatment you eulogize and practice; you are expected not only to have some theoretical knowledge of metaphysics enabling you to talk well on the subject, you must ere you attempt to heal publicly or professionally have obtained some evidence not only that spiritual science is demonstrable somewhere and by some people, but that you yourself can demonstrate it, and indeed have done so.

Never rashly precipitate yourself into a position you may find through maturer experience you are unfit to fill. The qualifications for teaching classes are distinct from those necessary for individual practice. In class teaching you only need to be able to argue the matter well, you have only to appeal to the intellect of your students, while in healing you have to individually apply your mind to the work of demonstrating what you teach by reducing theory to practice. A teacher does his work if he enlightens the minds of his students and aids them to reduce the theories into practice; but the healer, though it is well for him to be an eloquent speaker, one able to teach classes, or at least converse in private with ease and fluency, may, though he cannot talk well, heal wonderfully, while those who can teach admirably are not always in the right mental condition to heal. A public, busy life, crowded with miscellaneous cares, presses very hard upon a healer, while one who is simply a teacher can usually withstand the wear and tear of active life on the material plane very well. A healer ought to have many opportunities for privacy, should devote much time and thought in solitude to spiritual things, should live a contemplative, studious, secluded life as far as possible, and whenever practical should live in a quiet house in a not very noisy neighborhood. Teachers have to live more publicly, they must mingle with the outside world more extensively; but in the case of healers we would add, seclusion in the ordinary sense of the word, is not always necessary or even desirable. A quiet, contented, easy frame of mind, an unruffled disposition superior to the storms of prevailing misbelief, ability to defy the ordinary cares of the world and live unmoved by the worries and vexations which torment ordinary persons,—all this is imperatively necessary, and apart from this mental serenity on the part of the healer we really do not see how under usual circumstances cases can be successfully conducted.

If your own mind is uneasy and perplexed, if you cannot rise above the breakers and bid the tempest of your own condition to be still, if you cannot quiet the heavings of your own agitated breast or keep your own passions and appetites in subjection, how is it likely you should be able to do all this for others? Physician, heal, tranquilize, compose thyself, and endeavor not to bid peace be still to the tumultuous waves of another's fears if your own feet are not firmly planted on the rock of ages. Living epistles are always more influential than written ones. Many an earnest seeker after truth has said he would gladly go many a mile to see a sermon put in practice, while he would scarcely cross the street to hear an excellent discourse delivered.

To practice upon one's self is the important part of all practice, for when a sufferer comes to you seeking relief he generally gets from you through some subtle psychical contact an impression from your sphere, a reflection of your condition. Thus some healers agitate and others quiet their patients, some make them worse while honestly desiring to better their condition; for to sit still and think towards any one a thought of trouble, disquietude or doubt is to think into them far more mental poison than healing truth. The patient, if he succeeds in feeling a treatment at all, always takes on the condition of the healer's mind to a greater or less degree. Thought is a substance; thoughts travel in the air and are carried by means of atmospheric vibration from one mind to another; thoughts are the finer, words the coarser vibrations with which we all are constantly coming in collision. Frequently a patient entertains a belief that he is the victim of some deadly malady. Medical or clairvoyant examination has implanted in his mind a fixed conviction that he is seriously ill, possibly dying. This impression comes often to a healer, as thought can be heard often far more distinctly than words. If any of you when endeavoring to practice have such impressions enter your minds you may tell the sufferer that such thoughts have been suggested to you, but place no credence in their truthfulness. Never acknowledge they are correct; rather cast them forth as reflected errors of mortal mind, and explain to the patient that they are only floating mental impressions wafted from the sphere of his opinions or fears.

Jesus told the woman of Samaria that she had had five husbands and was then living with a man who was not her husband. In one sense then he appeared in the role of clairvoyant and test medium, but did he not at once proceed to tell her only of the living water, by means of which all impurities might be swept away.

Treat diseases and crimes as one and the same. Show no more sympathy for one set of errors than for another; give no more place in your thought to neuralgia, sciatica, or rheumatism than you would feel justified in giving to theft, drunkenness or bestiality. Take the bull by the horns, as the old proverb expresses it; deny what you see in the spirit of bidding it as an impious falsehood to depart and let your patient know instantly that you fear no disease, and do not recognize the possibility of any human being remaining a moment longer the slave of error than the length of time it takes him to turn mentally from error to truth. No special number of treatments need be given, no specified length of time occupied in treating, and no arbitrarily prescribed formulas be used either mentally or verbally.

Spiritual Science is not Kabalism. Words, empty words have no saving power; stereotyped sentences are often but meaningless and valueless repetitions, and as no man or woman living has any right to legislate for others as to how they should heal, beyond discountenancing all methods opposed to a recognition of one sole Deity, and inconsistent with the rightful freedom of the individnal, it must always rest with the healer to use or not to use any stated words set down in any book of instructions.

Many Christians believe Jesus to have given his disciples the pater noster only as a model of prayer, and consequently they rarely if ever use it word for word; and if that almost matchless composition of Hillel's which Jesus extracted from the Jewish service of his day was only a model or plan, a guide as to the nature of true petitions, we must surely recognize in this day, when we have no one person so far above his or her fellows as Jesus was above his contemporaries if history be not false, the great necessity of granting the utmost latitude to individual workers in the spiritual vineyard at this hour. If you are to arouse faith in your patient you must carry with you a faith-arousing energy, you must be mentally brimming over with what inspires confidence or you cannot awaken it; and just as a flower makes every one who enters the garden or conservatory acknowledge its fragrance by breathing sweetness on the air, so must you who aspire to awaken confidence in spiritual healing in others carry into their presence an odor of spiritual power which their spiritual nostrils cannot fail to detect.

When Jesus expressed surprise at the incredulity of some who could not or would not accept his offers of goodness he appears to have attributed their failure to derive assistance to an obstinate rejection of proffered aid, not to a simple inability to apply or to comprehend truth.

Such expressions as quenching or grieving the spirit, or blaspheming against the spirit of truth, cannot by any stretch of the imagination be applied to any state of mind other than a culpable one. To close the eye, to stop the ear, to resemble the deaf adder who will not hear is sinful and foolish in the extreme. To choose death and darkness when light and life are offered is the only sin of unbelief of which the Bible properly interpreted makes any mention; and as metaphysical healing must be taught on a purely theological basis, understanding theology to be as much the science of divine truth as geology is the science of the earth you must ever remember you are not responsible for failure resulting from the turpitude of those who want to be saved in their sins and not from them. Such a desire as the wish to have strength to do more evil can only bring disastrous failure to those who desire health and strength only that they may pervert these blessings to unholy ends.

Perfect health and happiness are rewards of virtue. They are never concomitants of crime. You cannot cure an ailment if sin is the cause of it unless you can succeed in inducing your patient to renounce iniquity.

Allow us here a case in point by way of illustration. A man is ill from the effects of debauchery, drunkenness and licentiousness have laid him low, doctors or magnetists may be able to tinker up his body sufficiently to enable him to go out on another drunken spree; they may help to raise him from his bed only to give him the license, misnamed liberty, he craves of again frequenting some abominable haunt of evil where he will spend the time and money he ought to devote to the proper maintenance of home and the payment of just debts; is that a cure which helps a man to commit more sin, to do more mischief? A thousand times, no! In that state of mind he is better ill, if illness incapacitates from further prodigality. As long as he only desires strength to pervert it, you can no more give him what he asks and treat in accordance with truth than you can give a person a draught of poison because he calls out for it and offers to compensate you handsomely if you become his abettor in doing wrong. Morality first, bodily health afterward. Spiritual miracles in the shape of moral transformations first, and then a sound healthy body, and the full enjoyment of all innocent earthly pleasures.

Metaphysicians must deal deadly blows at sin, they must be purifiers of society on a moral plane, not imitators of those quacks in theology or medicine who endeavor to save people, not from the love and practice of evil, but from the disagreeable consequences ensuing from its commission. As long as error is hugged to the mental bosom, as long as desires and thoughts are impure, so long must pain, the voice of the alarmist be heard. Pain calls attention to error; suffering is itself both the effect and remover of wrong.

Thus all endeavors to heal the body while the mind is yet in error and morals are depraved is not only foolish and impossible, but all such attempts are to be classed as malpractice; they are malpractitioners and nothing else who do not make bodily health subservient to morality.

Just as the world is safer when criminals and lunatics are confined and not allowed to roam at large, though no one is the safer for any criminal or insane person being punished instead of reformed or cured, so it is better for all concerned that those who are so fixed in the love of evil that they only crave strength and opportunity to misuse it should remain physically incapable until the angel of moral healing opens the prison doors of their captive minds, and setting them free from moral and intellectual darkness, invites them out into the green pastures and beside the still waters of outward health and comfort corresponding to and resulting from spiritual liberation.

LECTURE XI

HOW CAN WE TRACE DISEASES TO THEIR SOURCE, AND ERADICATE THEIR CAUSE, WHEN THEY ARE PRESUMABLY THE RESULT OF HEREDITARY INFLUENCE?

IN this the eleventh lecture in our present course we shall endeavor to give yet more explicit directions to our students and readers on the subject of hereditary influence than we have yet attempted, and we will here remark that we have chosen for the topic of our present lecture the question, "How can we trace diseases to their source, and eradicate their cause, when they are presumably the result of hereditary influence?" at the earnest request of many who in commencing practice or in the endeavor to comprehend metaphysical instructions have found themselves baffled at the outset by the thought that if diseases can be transmitted from parent to child, from one generation to another even through a succession of centuries, it must be a hopeless task to endeavor to eradicate by a few simple mental treatments what inheres in the very constitution and temperament of the individual we are endeavoring to treat. In our written instructions, originally intended for private reference only, but afterwards sold publicly at a nominal price, the words occur, "Deny hereditary disease." As those instructions are somewhat too condensed for those who have not pretty thoroughly absorbed a general outline of metaphysical principles, we have found it necessary to explain on many occasions that these instructions were simply a condensed recapitulation in very concise form, introducing the fewest number of words possible, designed for the use of those who wanted to keep by them a general digest of the plan of action recommended by us in our classes. As such words as "deny" and "denial" in their metaphysical sense are interpreted and the interpretation elaborated by questions and answers in our classes, it may seem strange to those who are not familiar with the exact meaning of these words in their metaphysical significance to be told to deny hereditary disease. Let us explain something on this score in this lecture. We must admit certainly that in measure on the external plane of thought and feeling all children take after their parents, and often after remote ancestors, while in physical appearance and general outward bearing family as well as racial peculiarities are often distinctly marked; but as the immortal spirit of man, the essential soul or essence of life, is not begotten through proccesses of physical generation, in the highest sense of this most paradoxical phrase you never had a parent, and you were never born. Such an astounding declaration, unfamiliar though it be to ordinary ears, is as familiar to diligent students of Greek philosophy, to say nothing of those who have penetrated into the inner sense of the sacred literature of the East, the Jewish and Christian Scriptures included, as any words which can fall from the lips of the most commonplace conversationalist on every-day topics of interest related to the mundane sphere.

You were never born, but what are you? You in truth, you in reality, are an immortal spiritual entity, an outbirth from the Eternal Spirit. You are a spark of the infinite fire which burns at the heart of the universe, through the countless ages of eternity; you are not a creature of dust and clay, neither are you a creation of mortal mind; you had not your origin in protoplasm, you did not spring from animalcules and gradually wend your way up from matter to immortal spirit. You are an ultimate atom, an essential primary in the realm of immortal being, and what you are as a child of God, an immortal soul, is all we have to consider in the higher metaphysics.

Plato taught the Greek academicians centuries before the commencement of the Christian Era this great truth of man's eternal essence and absolutely immortal constitution. From whence did Plato gain such transcendent knowledge? how did such a thought ever enter the mind of man? from what supernal state of spiritual understanding did a knowledge of the essential ego descend onto the plane of man's outer consciousness so that it could be spoken and written about, discussed in the schools, accepted by the truly wise and laughed to scorn by the materialist? Did such a truth as this come from heaven, direct from the throne of the Almighty as a distinct and definite revelation of truth which God gave in the exercise of his right of simple sovereignty to his specially elect? No. No such view of revelation or spiritual discovery is necessary to account for man's comprehension of himself in truth. God is no more willing to reveal himself to one than to another; there are no special providences in the old orthodox sense. God has no favorites. He is no respecter of persons, and therefore he is as willing one should know the truth as that it should be imparted to another; but a law inheres in the very nature of being that knowledge can be only attained through effort, and the requisite effort can only be made by the living of a specially pure and aspiring life. The entire thought must be directed to the spiritual truths of being; no desire which conflicts with the monitions of the highest principle within us or which appeals to us must be encouraged, the lower self must be forgotten in the higher. The old man of mortal mind and sense must be crucified with all its affections and lusts that the new man of truth and purity may be revealed to the outer understanding, over which it casts a halo of immortal glory and which it purifies and uses as a means for expressing on the external plane of mental demonstration the ever-living truth of absolute spiritual being.

The Gnostic author of the Fourth Gospel, commonly called John's, relating a conversation on the new birth between Jesus and Nicodemus, puts these words into the lips of the great enlightener: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Why does he not say, "You cannot enter the kingdom?" Surely because the notion of going to heaven is altogether erroneous; "the kingdom of heaven is within" you; it is already within you, but most of you fail to discern it. Can ye discern the signs of the times? some of you can more than others; signs there are in the heavens above and in the earth beneath, but can you interpret them? How much have you discovered concerning the nature which lies all around you? how much do you know of yourselves? These are the questions asked by a truly spiritual catechist. Look within, is the command of spiritual teachers, not to some external light. Hug not to yourselves the vain delusion that you can go to heaven after the death of your body, and on making a journey or taking an aerial flight through space reach some other world where you will know what you cannot discover here. Look within your own spirit and there discover the ever-burning light of the divine presence, the shekinah illumining the holy of holies, the ever-burning lamp revealing the altar of God in the soul of man.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," can be interpreted in no anthropomorphic sense. God is everywhere, and superior to every outward form; with external sight no man has ever seen or will ever see the Eternal Being, but as man is not his external shell, but a kernel of immortality disguised rather than revealed by an outer covering, it becomes necessary to rend the veil in the midst of the human temple, and that is accomplished when the son of man dies in you individually, that the Son of God may rise triumphant from the tomb. The whole story of the life, death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus is a spiritual allegory, and has in its highest interpretation no reference to time and place; the events recorded in the Gospels are not in their inner meaning morsels of external history at all; they are spiritual truths concealed in the guise of historical incidents, and while the crude and sensuous view of the Gospels taken by those who consider them as portions of the literature of Solar Mythology can never be accepted as their final interpretation by the spiritually minded, even that view can be pressed into the service of spiritual revelation, as solar myths themselves were not simply astronomical creations; they were figurative characters designed to express spiritual truths veiled pictorially in a fanciful history of the journeyings of the constellations.

In the ancient world, in very remote times, even in buried continents and islands, as we have endeavored to show in our historical and scientific lectures on the ante-diluvian world, there were not a few sages who were so highly illumined with interior knowledge that they discovered facts and solved problems with regard to man's spiritual constitution utterly insoluble in the light of ordinary scientific attainment.

All spiritual questions are the x in algebra to students of nature merely on its physical side. There is far more truth than poetry in the assertion, man has seven senses; five senses can never enable their possesor to penetrate into the spiritual arcana. A sixth sense is necessary to constitute one a clairvoyant, a clairaudiant, or a psychometer, while a seventh sense is required for one to discern the innermost truths of spiritual being. The French academicians, when they investigated what has been commonly called intuition, were many of them in favor of pronouncing it a sixth sense, and what they styled intuition can be thus correctly defined; but true intuition, which far surpasses all clairvoyant, clairaudiant, or psychometric ability is a seventh sense, and for that reason beyond even the scope of the researches of all who confine themselves to ordinary phases of mediumship, perception and occultism. The senses of mankind through long ages have gradually developed, not all at once, but one by one, and it is a noticeable fact that when one sense is dormant or absent another sense is usually almost preternaturally keen. Blind people are often, on the whole, quite as intelligent as those who can see, for what they lack in one direction they more than make up in others; the blind frequently have unusually keen hearing, taste, smell and touch; their hearing and touch are apt to be phenomenally keen by reason of their depending on those senses to compensate them for lack of sight. Deaf and dumb persons are often possessed of unusually quick eyesight, and their senses of smell and touch are also in frequent instances of unusual power. Now why is this? What are senses from a metaphysical point of view, as there can be neither life, intelligence, nor sensation in matter? How can we talk of bodily senses? Senses are merely avenues of perception; they are the result of the endeavor of the spirit to express itself in definite directions.

Senses are in no sense products of the material organism; they are, on the contrary, what Bunyan called them in his "Holy War," "Gates of Mansoul." The spirit itself possesses power of vision; it creates by its own volition an outward frame through which to express itself, and, as it desires to exert its power of seeing through that form which it has fashioned, its action upon the embryo creates an eye, but in order to create a visual organ on the external plane it needs to coöperate with that radiation of spiritual force which in its expression we call light; thus the desire to express the power to see, through a fleshly organism, and the action of light upon the embryonic form in the maternal womb is necessary to the production of a perfect bodily eye.

body; they are merely appliances in the organic structure which the spirit creates, created for the express purpose of giving expression to preëxistent powers in spirit which seek expression in external form; thus, the power to touch, to taste, to smell, and to hear, are all necessary to the formation of organs through which faculties can be manifested, and, as a power must have something to exert itself upon to make itself manifest, odors, flavors, sounds and substances are necessary to the development of the four above-mentioned organs of appreciation. When the child is in its mother's womb, it receives every impression through her consciousness; whatever affects a pregnant woman affects her offspring, and we do not believe any child was ever born whose condition did not register and reflect that of the maternal parent during the term of her pregnancy.

Life is present at the moment of conception; if life did not inhere in the original form there could be no life manifested afterward, for evolution can only unroll what involution has previously rolled up. In the essential germ of life every potency exists which can by any possible contingency be expanded during the period of gestation. There is no such thing as spontaneous generation, all life proceeds from prior life, and the supposition that intelligence commences at a certain stage of embryonic development is a self-evident fallacy in the eyes of all who have conquered the first principles of true science; a reverse view of the matter is not only scientifically absurd, but encourages abortion and other disgraceful crimes too infamous to mention; judged by its fruits of flagrant immorality, materialistic sciolism stands judged, convicted and condemned.

Truth never countenances immoral conduct; error, on the contrary, always palliates and makes excuse for crime. Materialistic views of ante-natal life have done more to sanction and encourage abortion than all other causes put together. Remember, oh, all ye women everywhere, that you are parents from the moment of conception, you are mothers of living children directly impregnation has taken place, and you can no more destroy the life in your womb before its birth than you can commit infanticide without being guilty of murder. Whenever a woman knows she has conceived a child let her take upon herself courageously a mother's duties, and no matter what her earthly lot may be, trust in God to give her strength to bear a mother's part in truth and purity. From the first instant of ante-natal life, the forming mind of the child (for remember the mind is formed from the spirit during its efforts to express itself outwardly) derives all its impressions from the mind of the mother; whatever she desires creates a desire in her child; whatever she loves creates an affection in her offspring; whatever she hates produces an aversion, and so on through the whole catalogue of human desires, attractions and dislikes.

The father's mind influences the child but very slightly in any direct sense, but as in many instances a wife is under the mental jurisdiction of her husband to a very great extent, his thoughts are communicated to the children in a very pronounced degree. It is observed on all hands by those who make a study of heredity, that when a woman is very much under the influence of her husband's mind, her children are liable to take strongly after their father, while, when a mother has been in a self-poised attitude during the gestative period, and her husband has had little control over her thoughts and feelings, the children resemble their mother in the most pronounced manner.

As every influence which tends to fashion temperament and disposition proceeds from mind and appeals to mind, close physical contact with any person does not itself affect offspring to any considerable degree. A woman may live with her child's father on the most intimate terms and scarcely spend an hour day or night away from him during the whole nine months, and yet her child may be as unlike him as possible. She may on the other hand be thousands of miles removed from him in body, yet if her thought continually goes out to him, earthly distance being no barrier to the flight of mind, the child may be what people would call the very image of an absent father.

This conclusion, which we have seen verified in numberless instances, leads us to pursue the thought still further and see how easy it is for children to grow up like people who have gained an ascendancy in thought over a mother's mind, while physically they have never had the slightest connection even to a hand-shake.

Sometimes a woman will feel herself strongly drawn to some man or woman with whom she is not acquainted; they are never introduced, they never pass a word with each other; the one who unconsciously affects the other has no notion that the one whom he is influencing exists; although the other party has been strongly drawn to him, he has never even noticed her so far as to bestow a passing glance upon her in a crowd; still having been powerfully attracted to him, she by means of the law of elective affinity, and that strange and subtle power of selection which all creatures and even inanimate things seem to possess, she perpetually absorbs the emanations with which he charges universal mental atmosphere, and we must not allow ourselves to forget that spiritual science demonstrates the substantial nature of thought; thoughts are things, they vibrate upon the unseen atmosphere and can be attracted by mental volition or unwillingly absorbed through fear. We have hinted at this fact in our lecture on Mind-Reading, Thought Transference and Kindred Phenomena, but it would take many a bulky volume were we to pursue this subject to any depth or at any length; we must leave you to amplify our meagre suggestions through your own study and at your private leisure; all we can now do is to emphasize a law generally unrecognized except by special students of spiritual and occult science. The law is that every human mind gives off vital emanations with which the atmosphere of the globe is perpetually filled; these emanations are spirits or powers of the air, they have form and can be seen by those endowed with clairvoyant vision; "mind readers" are more sensitive to them than other people, but all persons are subject to their influence unless they have risen so high in spirituality that they are proof against all mortal mind exhalations, for these forces in the atmosphere are just as real and influential in the realm of thought as are sounds and odors on the plane of sense.

We must here endeavor to clear up a difficulty which often arises with reference to unconscious mind; strictly speaking, all mind is conscious, all mind has the attribute of consciousness, but all human minds are not so fully conscious of their relations to their entire surroundings as to be able to determine what it is that affects them when they feel affected by something. Science alone can enable you to trace effects back to causes. On the material plane you are often affected powerfully by you know not what; you enter a room and feel exhilarated or depressed, an agreeable or a nauseating sensation comes over you and no matter whether you are improved in health or made unwell by this something which influences you, what it is that influences you remains a mystery until perchance some day you recollect your sensations at a given time, and while reading a scientific work receive light on the reason of such (at the time) incomprehensible sensations, or in talking with a friend you may relate a strange experience, whereupon he informs you of a similar one of his own and proceeds forthwith to enlighten you as to some experiments which have thrown light upon the cause of it. Your sensations, you may discover, were due to the presence of some flower you did not notice or to which you attached no importance, or to some condition of atmosphere or degree of temperature, and as you have all doubtless had many such experiences and can readily follow us thus far, we must now ask your most thoughtful attention as we cross the border and invite your attention to similar experiences on a less external plane.

Just as you experience physical sensations involuntarily, and these reach you from inanimate life, such as flowers, etc., there can be no doubt but the majority of persons suffer excessively from the influence of mental causes entirely unknown to them and purposely directed to them. Thus the unconscious mind of one person influences the unconscious mind of another.

To illustrate still further and break down all difficulty in the way of comprehending this subject, we will ask you to note your sensations on first entering a room or taking up a letter; you may be a perfect stranger in some hotel or restaurant, no one has observed your entrance or bestowed the least thought upon you, but you are conscious immediately of agreeable or disagreeable sensations overtaking you, and these certainly do not arise from visible causes, for often you feel happiest in the crudest surroundings, and most uncomfortable in the most luxurious; not only do places affect you, but you are also conscious of a strange influence either attractive or repellant brought to bear upon you from persons who bestow no thought on you and have not even noticed your presence. Human minds exhale such psychic influence just as flowers emit perfume; the scent of a flower is a result of its organization and condition, its odor may be pleasant to one person and disagreeable to another; take lilacs as an example — the perfume of lilac is most grateful to some nostrils, other persons feel sick if there is a bunch of lilacs in their room.

Our psychic emanations are always true to our condition; they are usually quite involuntary, as comparatively few people deliberately set to work to psychologize others, but so susceptible to involuntary psychology are most persons, that unless they have made especial effort to rise above the ordinary level of mankind they are subject to everything, good, bad, or indifferent, they are like barometers and thermometers affected by every change in the atmosphere which approaches them. Deliberate psychologizing takes place undoubtedly in many instances, and whenever one person wills another to do anything or even strongly desires it, he is seeking to psychologize that other, no matter how little he may know of the art of psychology; but man's usual impressibility is the result of his negative condition to psychic forces as his physically negative state makes him amenable to the influence of all physical exhalations, and we may rest assured, both the outer and inner atmosphere of this planet are crowded with exhalations from every sort of mind and from every sort of body.

Psychometry reveals a great fact when it teaches you by means of exact experiments to read character and incidents in the life of persons with whom you are brought en rapport, by touching some article they have worn or a piece of paper on which they may have written something. Ordinary psychometric experiments, however, often fail because of their not being properly conducted; if a crowd of handkerchiefs, gloves and other articles are forced upon a person of unusual sensibilities on a public platform, definiteness is rendered extremely improbable, as when a crowd of minds are pressing upon you all at once and you are trying to satisfy a mixed multitude, you are in great danger of satisfying no one and greatly injuring yourself, as when you deliberately render yourself negative to everybody's emanations, you are liable at any moment to take on both their vices and their diseases.

Spiritual science teaches you to read psychometrically from a height of superior vision; it teaches you to throw yourself into a superior condition in which you can see what there is round about you without being influenced by it; you are never safe as long as you strive to get down on a patient's or sitter's plane and merge your own identity in his aura, for by so doing you become immersed in the waves of his mental and physical emanations which in the present average state of society are too often disgustingly impure. Diseases are contracted far less by physical contact than most people imagine, though on a low plane of human development diseases are thus taken on; but as close physical proximity usually induces a less earnest and active desire for another's sympathy and co-operation than ensues when friends are separated unwillingly in body by physical distance, we are all the recipients and also the givers of absent treatments to a far greater extent than perhaps any imagine.

The nine months before birth are more important in shaping the disposition of a child than the seven years immediately following birth, which are usually acknowledged as those in which the most permanent impressions are received. Unborn children respond to every impulse of the mother's mind far more than they ever can after birth, as no association can ever be so intimate as that which precedes birth.

Next to ante-natal influence, the influence exerted before the child is weaned is, of course, the most powerful and protracted in its results; and here let us say that those mothers who can nurse their children and do not are guilty of a shameful neglect of duty, as no mother has a right to shirk her natural responsibilities by paying another woman to give her life to her offspring. However, if a mother is very ill or in a frightfully disturbed condition, most of all if she be a woman of immoral habits, the services of a conscientious, healthy wet nurse may advantageously be secured, for remember, it is not the milk which nourishes the body half so much as the psychic force which builds the mind which is of consequence in shaping character; however, it is impossible for any true spiritual scientist to so far disconnect bodily conditions from mental states as to venture the assertion that by any possibility any physical condition can exist which is not a correspondence to a similar state previously attained in mind.

Woman suffrage, though not apparently a distinctly metaphysical question, bears so closely upon our subject that we must say in passing that all true metaphysicians must be woman suffragists, they must be on the side of that movement which acknowledges the equality in truth of man and woman, and though we make no distinction between the two, and do not try to institute invidious comparisons between men and women, we must take the side of those who claim that woman's freedom is more important than man's, and if one sex must rule the other, woman had better rule man than man govern woman; not only because woman is usually more intuitive than man, but because if a man is not free his influence upon the rising generation can never be so powerful for evil as that of a woman who is held in slavery, for the simple reason that man cannot be a mother and therefore can only indirectly through his influence with woman affect the rising generation to any very great extent. Women, love, cherish and honor your husbands, but do not attempt to obey them any further than mutual obedience is desirable and consistent with equality and true spiritual harmony.

No metaphysician can be married at any altar where a vow of obedience is required of her which is not asked of her husband. In the first chapter of Genesis, where an account is given of the creation of mankind in truth, we read, God created males and females in his own image, he created them together, not one after the other; in the beginning they were divinely equal, and so they must be regarded the world over in every state of life if truth is to triumph over error. Man in truth may excel in reason, woman in intuitive perception; man may be adapted to the rougher work of life oftentimes, while the tenderer and more sacred functions of maternity are reserved for woman only; but as today women are as a rule purer than men, as they usually are less addicted to vice and have fewer bad habits, as society demands of them more spirituality than it asks for in the male sex, women must never for a single instant allow their better natures to be crushed beneath the iron heel of man's alleged superiority. All vaunted power and dignity on the part of man claiming to control woman, and all namby pamby sentiment expressing itself in caresses such as a child bestows upon a doll or a pet animal, all prattle about woman as a tender plant to be nurtured and loved but never to be taken into partnership as man's companion in the sober, earnest work of life, is just so much maudlin sentiment invented to cover tyranny in roses and drape manacles in silk.

Let every woman rise to her true dignity as wife and mother if she be a married woman, and if she remain single let her support herself by fruitful and practical industry. Let every married woman regard marriage as a partnership of interests. Let woman's work be regarded as in all things the equal of man's; husband and wife are joint bread-winners when properly united; no honorable, self-respecting man will talk of supporting a woman as the creature of his bounty, and we are sure no right-minded woman will tolerate the thought of marriage as a stepping-stone to a home where she may eat the bread of idleness earned by the sweat of her husband's brow. Marriage in truth is the condition of angelic life reflected on earth, and those women only can be true to their divine mission who resemble the sun-crowned woman in the twelfth chapter of the Book of Revelation, whose head is adorned with twelve bright stars, and whose foot rests upon the changing moon. When the true principles of heredity are understood, it will be easy to see how directly a child is influenced by every thought which passes through the father's mind if the mother is either subjected in will to him, or if through fear or apprehension or aversion she holds him continually before her in the thought of error.

Kleptomania is a disease of frequent occurrence even in the children of the wealthy. The most influential and wealthy persons have often been its victims. Why should ladies of position, possessed of ample means, steal from the counters of the shops at which they deal? why should they take what does not belong to them clandestinely when they have ample means to purchase all they require, and are so shocked at their own dishonesty afterwards that they almost immediately return the purloined articles to their rightful owners? An explanation can be found in ante-natal influence only. A wealthy mother is often denied what she most craves, some secret desire and longing in her breast remains unsatisfied to such an extent that her offspring is imbued with a desire to grasp at any hazard and in any manner what cannot be obtained by lawful purchase, and in cases of kleptomania such as those just alluded to, we can trace the working out of tendencies created by mothers using artifice and deceit to accomplish ends they are afraid of venturing to bring about openly. Pregnant women who frequent honorable places of instruction during their husband's absence from home, because they are afraid he should know of their going to places of which he ignorantly and bigotedly disapproves, are sowing seeds of dissension, dishonesty and misery untold in future generations. From the fear of man which bringeth a snare you may all well pray to be delivered; as long as you let your husbands frighten you into unwilling submission to their tyranny, or into clandestine rebellion against it, you are on perilous ground; you may at any moment succumb or see your children succumb to the most terrible vices and diseases. If men can go to their clubs without their wives' approval, surely women can go to respectable meetings where they meet refined and honorable women without standing in jeopardy of a husband's anger.

Let all girls be educated from their tenderest years to shun tyrannical men as husbands. Before marriage a young woman should prove herself so rightfully independent, so loyally principle-asserting, that her intended husband will know he can never intimidate her into making unwarrantable concessions to his arbitrary dictation after marriage.

Women's Rights and female education are at the very foundation of all reform; woman in bondage enslaves man, woman in freedom is his only elevator.

When you are called upon to treat hereditary ailments, weaknesses, or tendences, to speak more correctly, call upon the immortal spirit of your patient to arise and assert its true power, place before a victim of dishonor a picture of himself in moral health, make him regard himself in the light of a conqueror, strong to resist and vanquish error, and never consider your work accomplished until you have convinced him that all error is of the earth, earthy, a false creation of mortal mind, a reflection of error, the likeness of a lie, no more real than any phantom, no more to be dreaded than the hobgoblins of childish fancy.

All theories of hereditary evil and of obsession have to be boldly met by the affirmation of the absolute power of truth and good. Mortal mind creations are unreal as mortal mind itself. Children of unreality are unreal, like their progenitors. Jesus called disease an error collectively and inclusively a liar from the beginning; when truth was demonstrated in the healing of the sick he saw Satan like lightning fall from heaven.

Mortal error strives to usurp the throne of immortal truth. It vaunts its own empty nothingness into the throne of God, and there as Beast and False Prophet it demands the worship of mankind. It claims to be God and exacts homage under the name of Nature, Natural Law, Necessity, or something else which tickles the perverted understanding of the worldly wise. How can error prevail? How can inherited evil triumph when God is the sole Creator and every soul is God's offspring? Truth says to the foul brood of the serpent error, You are nothing, you are shadows, you are mists, you are shadows flung against the light, and as rapidly as daylight dismisses and annihilates the darkling shades of night, truth crushes error, effectually, once for all, by virtue of its own positive and active moral strength. Darkness and disease are alike appearances, illusions, negations. Thus inherited evil in its last analysis is inherited darkness, inherited negation. Can darkness contend successively with light? Can negation contend successfully with industructible reality? You cannot destroy a reality; you cannot annihilate an atom, or extinguish that which rests on a fundamental principle of being. To say disease is something, a real condition, as much so as health, as ignorant pathologists declare, is to announce in so many words the utter impossibility of its destruction; if disease were a reality as health is a reality, no one could ever cure it or destroy it; all remedies would be useless, as it is impossible to destroy a single particle of the substance of the universe; but if disease is only a phantasm, an unreal state, no more real than the ignis fatuus which lures a traveler to destruction, and yet apparent to sense just as the ignis fatuus appears real, we can then see clearly that truth and understanding, virtue in its own almightiness, can bid disease and devils alike to fly, for both are errors of mortal imagination, lies and the children of lies, and thus the only devil in the universe.

In all your practice you must insist upon the phantasmagoric character of all disorders. You must never for a solitary instant allow yourselves to believe in disease as anything more than the fabulous creation of mortal mind, for if it once gains possession of your thought and you fear it either for yourself or for another, you descend onto the level of weekness and susceptibility which causes illness to appear in you, who when acting on false premises become the victim of a patient's disorder instead of its overcomer. Hereditary ailments are no more difficult to reach than those recently acquired. Chronic cases are no harder than acute ones to deal with except by reason of the greater tenacity with which mortal mind clings to errors of long standing than to those of recent date. There is but one infallible rule which works in every case, and is as undeviating as the rule in mathematics. Pronounce all disease a myth, a phantasy. Trust only in God, and fear no evil.

LECTURE XII.

HOW TO APPLY THE PRINCIPLES OF SPIRITUAL SCIENCE IN PRACTICAL TREATMENT.

MANY persons are heard to exclaim after listening to lectures and reading books on Metaphysics that while everything sounds reasonable enough and the arguments appear plausible there seems no way to reduce the theory to practice, except perhaps in the case of a very few specially qualified individuals. All students of theosophy must have been struck by the statement constantly reiterated in theosophical publications that only in two possible ways can the wonderful works be done which the neophyte desires to accomplish. One must either be a "natural born magician," the equivalent of what Spiritualists call a "good natural medium," or he must have labored, studied, and practiced the most rigorous self-denial, eventuating in that absolute control of mind over sense whereby alone an adept can perform what are termed by the world at large "stupendous miracles." As the word "miracle" is derived from the Latin verb mirari, which signifies to be astonished or to marvel, marvelous works, as we have often informed you, are no more supernatural than the germination of a seed.

Nothing is given by nature to those who do not work for it; nature has her rewards for all toilers, but she sends away empty-handed those who put forward

no energy to attain to honor. In every department of science, indefatigable ardor, unflagging industry is demanded of all aspirants either to fame or knowledge; and is it reasonable to infer that when the geologist, the chemist, the astronomer, the mathematician, yea, and the musician, the sculptor and the painter, have all to work long and earnestly ere they can rise to heights of attainment in their respective fields of operation, that by payment of a little money and the taking of a short course of metaphysical instructions, anybody and everybody can become qualified in a month or so to "heal the sick and cast out devils"? We have no intention of entering into a controversial argument on the authenticity of the Gospels, nor do we care to enquire how much or how little probability there is of Jesus ever having uttered the sentence, but the words themselves, "this kind cometh not forth but by prayer and fasting," embody the whole essence of necessary teaching for those who aspire to heal the sick and dispossess the minds of men of disturbing passions, evil tempers, unclean spirits. What is prayer but aspiration? what is fasting but abstinence from self-indulgence? To alter the phraseology somewhat, no one can ever be a qualified healer of others unless he has first cured himself of worldly ambitions and carnal lusts.

The highest achievements in spiritual science are only possible to those who have successfully resisted every lower impulse; we do not mean to say the lower impulses must necessarily be annihilated, but they certainly must be held in absolute subjection. Rigid asceticism recommended by many schools is valuable only as means to an end; if the end can be reached without asceticism it may well be dispensed with. As questions are constantly recurring with regard to animal food and other hygienic and dietetic matters, it may be well for us to offer a word or two on these matters, although in the opinion of some they relate only to unimportant material conditions. Some metaphysicians affirm they can eat anything, as nothing hurts them; they are therefore totally regardless of all the laws of health, to use a common expression; these laws of health are said to be nothing but laws of mortal mind from which we need to be free, but we think a little closer inspection of the matter will point to a somewhat different conclusion. Mrs. Eddy says the desire for all stimulants and narcotics, including tea and coffee, should be regarded as a depraved taste, and that remark of hers opens up a wide and fertile field of thought and inquiry. Now, if it is of no moment whatever, as some say, whether we eat fish, flesh or fowl, or subsist entirely upon a vegetarian diet, why lay stress, as Mrs. Eddy does in many portions of her book, Science and Health, on the simple table metaphysicians usually sit at; why make any distinction whatever between water and whiskey, lemonade and brandy, or sugar and opium? If all material things are simply nothing, why make any fuss about them? The answer to such questions seems inevitably to be that even though we accept the statement, "all is mind, there is no matter," we are bound to consider things as mental if not physical, and that is all the difference between the position of a metaphysician and a physicist with regard to the external universe.

If everything is mind, as all our perceptions are mental then all we eat and drink and wear is in mind;

all our habits then are mental, our tastes and proclivities, our likes and dislikes are mental states, and our outward behavior is therefore due to a pre-existing mental condition. Being asked constantly for our opinion on outward modes of life and ever-recurring practices, we have perpetually insisted upon the paramount importance of cultivating such thoughts and inducing such mental states as lead to purity of conduct. Kind words naturally flow from kind thoughts, as unkind thoughts inevitably result in a soured visage. Mental changes regulate the appearance of the head and face, not only of human beings but of animals. Thus we can learn the disposition of persons and animals by examining their crania, not because the cranial evidences are the causes of mental conditions, but because these indications are brought about by mental conditions. A person or an animal does not appear kind or cruel, loveable or hateful because of some accident of physical organization, but the organization does most decidedly indicate the temperament and temper of the being who owns it.

You cannot take advantage of phrenology and physiognomy by endeavoring to change externals. You can only bring about external modifications by appealing to the mind of the person or animal whom you are endeavoring to improve. The marked improvements constantly appearing in animals are due to their constant association with enlightened men and women; psychically far more than physically does man rule the lower creation and lift it nearer and ever nearer to his own higher level. There can be no abiding health, happiness, beauty or symmetry of any

There will never be any marked improvement in human manners and customs until a spiritual influence works at the centre of man's being to set outward things straight; from within to without, not from without to within, is nature's order of development. You cannot improve the centre by decorating the circumference; all attempts at making the exterior fair while the interior is sterile is no more genuine healing or reformation than it would be a genuine improvement in the actual condition of a tree for some one to fasten fruit onto barren boughs; though you might possibly deceive some ignorant spectators by attaching fruit by means of wire to barren boughs while the root was still, withered and the branches unprolific.

Under no circumstances should a healer endeavor to change outward appearances as such. What would a physician say of some one who tried to check the manifestation of humor on the surface of the skin by thrusting it back into the blood through denying it outward expression? Quackery often seems to cure because it represses, but instead of benefitting the patient it makes him suffer far more in future; a momentary relief may be gained, and doubtless often is, at the expense of years of anguish. The blood is poisoned, the vitals diseased, as the pimples and blotches are removed from the surface of the body. Proper medical treatment, electric or magnetic treatment if judiciously administered, would assist in bringing the humors to the front and then getting rid of them, which can only be done by strengthening the system and giving general tone to the constitution.

All matters of speech and etiquette must follow upon purer modes of thinking, as a man thinketh so he invariably becomes, outwardly. We have never met a solitary individual whose thoughts were refined whose conduct was vulgar; vulgarity is not due to outward circumstances; it is not brought on by surroundings; many persons are so naturally refined, nothing vulgarizes them, they manifest their innate gentility, as some would call it, wherever they go, no matter what company they may be forced to keep; this gentility is not an assumed mask like the good behavior people put on in company to attract others and belie their real state of feeling. Real refinement is impossible of acquirement through simple attendance at polished seminaries or through reading fashionable treatises on the manners of well-bred people. Only when the mind is free from evil, impure, or vulgar thoughts, will conduct be really polite; only when ill tempers are banished from thought, will pleasant words flow naturally from the tongue, and kindly actions characterize the individual.

Superficial treatment for all manner of ailments has prevailed far too long; we must change the base of operations if we are really to succeed in banishing suffering and distress from the midst of humanity. In treating a case, then, say of the opium habit, of tobacco chewing, of drinking, of frequenting some evil haunt, or any other vicious desire displayed in conduct, place no thought, lay no stress upon the action, endeavor by every means in your power to disgust your patient with wrong by cultivating within him the love of right. Do not take away medicine, tobacco, wine, or anything else a patient craves, but treat mentally, arguing with your patient the utter undesirability of relying on such material props for strength or comfort. Divert your patient's thought from all such means of sensuous gratification by creating a taste for other and purer enjoyments. Give your patient no books to read treating upon vice, and enter into no conversation on topics which are always avoided in decent society.

Truth compels us to say that a vast amount of mischief is done by writing and discoursing on social vices; boys and girls do not require to be instructed in bad habits, nor to have their attention called to their lower propensities, and all reading and conversation which makes the lower passions a subject of consideration tends to inflame them. Children who are brought up to take a constant and active interest in useful pursuits with which their minds are filled to the exclusion of objectionable ideas, have very little trouble in mastering their lower desires, while those who have no useful and interesting work to engage their minds easily fall victims to every lust. The most virtuous lives are lived by those actively employed in something of sufficient importance and interest to keep their minds active in the coronal region of the brain. So work as to direct the bulk of your energy to the front of your head and you will have little difficulty with back-brain propensities. The true spiritual healer so works upon the mind as to divert the thought and resultantly the vital fluids from the base to the front of the head and thereby diminishes the pressure upon the lower organs by stimulating the higher.

You only think about and desire to gratify certain propensities when your thought, not being centered where it should be is free to roam into forbidden channels. Under no circumstances paint pictures of disease, conjure up no horrible pictures of despair and death; do nothing to arouse fear, on the contrary work to quell it if aroused already; for remember, those who abstain from evil courses outwardly through fear of consequences are not reformed, but continuing to love evil are still under its dominion in thought and, being so, may at any moment break out into some ebulition on the surface. If you are called upon to treat a young man for such habits as drinking, smoking, or gambling, if he is causing distress to his parents by riotous living, and you are anxious of inducing him to reform, commence right by setting an excellent example in your own conduct; your own life must be inviolate; you must make no concession to error by allowing yourself even for an instant to take a single glass of wine or even one cigar or cigarette; no end of harm is done by patronizing evil on a small scale and then condemning it wholesale. Life is made up of little things, and you can never afford to do a little harm and excuse yourself because it is a little, for that little is not only enough to prevent you from rescuing its victim, it is also sufficient to drag you down to a lower level. Having set your example of righteousness and continuing to set it, you may, if questioned on the matter of drinking or any other vice, express your own views very decisively; let there be no mistake as to the attitude taken by yourself on such matters, but if you are not questioned work in silent thought to convince your patient that his conduct is erroneous; think toward him what you could not say without being thought unpleasant or fanatical; many persons will not hear a truth in so many words without defying it, while if you convey a thought to them they are at once conscious of an impression conveyed to their mind, and the thought coming to them in such a form that they cannot distinguish it from an impression or suggestion of their own; they are ready to think about it, submit it to reason and often will embrace it, as it satisfies them when submitted to their judgment that it is worthy to be followed.

We have known many instances where silent mental treatment has cured intemperance and many another vile and disgusting habit; one case which came prominently before us a short time ago we will here introduce as a typical instance. A young man a little over twenty years of age had fallen in with bad companions, and being easily led was soon made a victim of drink and other vices, occasioning much pain to his mother, who unfortunately bemoaned his vices without being able to help him to abandon them. A happy thought struck her; a gentleman about forty years of age, of the most exemplary habits, a handsome man, of pleasing manners and generally a favorite with younger people, was coming to the city where she and her son were living, and as he was seeking accommodations in a private family where he might have privacy and quiet for important studies and literary work, she invited him to her home and made a special request to him to accept her hospitality, telling him her painful situation and expressing both a hope and a conviction that he would help her son to give up his evil courses and begin a new life. The gentleman accepted the invitation, but very decidedly declined to say anything to his hostess' son on the subject of intemperance or any form of dissipation; his own conduct at the table and everywhere else on all occasions was of course exemplary in the highest degree; but the young man's mother was afraid mere example would not convert her son, and after two or three days, when she had had, as she thought, time to observe that no change for the better was taking place in his habits, she communicated her feelings very plainly in a private conversation with her guest; to her disappointment all the answer he made to her heart-rending entreaties that he would step in and save her boy, was an offer to take the culprit to the theater or any other respectable place of amusement whenever the young gentleman felt disposed to accept his company. From that day forth, however, matters began to take a decided turn; the young man accompanied his older friend to the theater one night, to a concert another, and so on, returning every evening at a respectable hour, having had nothing stronger than water or a cup of chocolate to drink; he began to appear regularly at breakfast, with no unhealthy flush or pallor on his countenance, no suspicious redness about the eyes, and no distracted manner of any kind. So far his mind and time had been pleasantly occupied in business during the day and innocent amusement at night.

After about a week of this better mode of living the crisis arrived; one evening the gentleman with whom he had been passing his evenings so respectably was unable to accompany him anywhere, as very important business of a peremptory and private nature commanded his attention; with many misgivings the mother saw her son prepare to go out alone, as he had done for so long previous to the preceding week and usually with such disastrous consequences. During the whole of the evening up till midnight, the anxious mother worried over her son and conjured up the most distressful mental visions of his probable whereabouts. Just as she was on the point of retiring to her room for the night, her guest returned and astonished her by uttering in an abrupt and almost domineering tone the following sentence: "Duty compels me to inform you, madam, that if you persist in holding your son in error, he can never be reformed; go to bed and leave him in charge of the Almighty." Without another word except a courteous "good night," her visitor left her to her somewhat startled meditations, and retired to his own chamber. The lady could not sleep; she partly undressed, and then feeling terribly uneasy, attired herself in a thick wrapper and tried to read. Either the book was dull or her nerves too unsteady to permit of reading; the words addressed to her by her guest continued to ring in her ears. But what does he mean by "holding my son in error?" if he were in my place, if he had an only son of his own, ruining himself by evil courses, I venture to assume he would be almost as distressed as I am, unless beneath all his religious and moral exterior he has a heart of stone, callously indifferent to the welfare of all beside himself, ruminated the unhappy woman.

Presently a singular feeling of mingled hope and calm stole over her, she went to bed and soon fell asleep, and throughout her slumbers a vision seemed ever before her of an unseen hand supporting her son in some dangerous place, and at last causing him to dash a glass of liquor untasted from his lips. At breakfast next morning, her son met her with a smiling countenance and gave her indeed a joyful piece of news. "Mother," he said, "last night about twelve o'clock, after visiting a theater with one of my old companions, he urged me as he always does to take a drink; we went into a fashionable saloon and called for iced champagne; he drank freely of it and seemed to think it excellent; what I tasted I thought was bad, whereupon I drank a sip from my friend's glass and he took a sip from mine; strange to say, both tasted equally good to him and equally bad to me; thinking my stomach might be a little out of order I let it go, and not feeling particularly well I refused his invitation to go elsewhere with him and wended my way homeward. On my way home, just for the sake of experiment, I went into another saloon and called for a glass of ale; that tasted even worse than the champagne, and as I asked myself whatever could be the matter with me, I heard a voice, whether in my ear or only in my fancy, I could not make out, saying distinctly, 'You never liked liquor, you never will, you never can; be a man and never degrade yourself by pretending you like what you hate anymore.' Just about that time I thought of you, mother, you came up vividly before me, I seemed to hear and see you and Mr. —— together, you were talking excitedly and I caught the sentence, 'You must not hold your son in error'; directly I got home, I went to bed and to sleep; this morning I woke up feeling completely cured of all my taste for liquor, and do you know, mother, with God's help I feel certain I shall never drink again."

The young man began at once to live up to his good resolution, and there is no need to suppose that he has had any return to his old evil habits.

We have given this little anecdote a place in this lecture, not on account of its singularity, for many and many a similar instance might be quoted, but because it seems to us to embody the entire principle of spiritual healing, and to arouse the very questions we need to answer before we take our leave of each other. Please to observe the method of silent treatment adopted by the metaphysician; he studiously refrained from all allusion in conversation to the silent work he was doing so effectually, and here we have a lesson for all teachers which most of them sadly need to learn; you cannot always tell persons of their faults or remonstrate with them on their doings without being noted as a bore and a nuisance; you arouse hostility immediately you assume the role of censor, but what you cannot say you can assuredly think; the great advantage of thinking good advice instead of speaking it is that by the former course you appeal direct to your pupil's sense of right, and by the latter you awaken opposition, and encourage or at least challenge controversy

Metaphysical treatments are not mesmeric for they are not subjugatory; you do not WILL another person to do as you desire, you do not tell him to obey you, neither do you seek to influence him to follow a blind instinct or impression; you acknowledge in him a reasoning principle, a faculty of understanding, a moral principle to which truth can appeal, and in addressing that principle you do not ask him to agree with you, to take you as an authority; you succeed in showing him the error of his ways by holding up a mirror to him in mind in which he can see the image of truth reflected; he instantly contrasts this picture of truth with his usual course of error, to the advantage of the former and the disadvantage of the latter.

Every one has enough moral principle and enough good judgment to guide him if it is only appealed to, just as the occupants of a theater gallery can always be touched by the portrayal of noble sentiment on the stage; and all good actors know how powerfully they can appeal to the noblest sentiments of humanity by letting goodness make its own way to the hearts of the "rabble." So every true healer who is a sound teacher of morals must understand how to reach the inmost convictions of his pupil and lead him thereby to desist from evil courses, as his own inmost self tells him to sin no more, and shows him how to live righteously in future.

Observe the simplicity in mode of treatment adopted by the hero of our anecdote,—he was on no occasion anything other than an agreeable friend; his influence was exerted entirely in silence; and in these days of mind-reading experiments it should not seem incredible to an enlightened public that a strong, decisive, persistent thought is far more potent and eloquent than any words. Words are addressed to the outermost degree of human consciousness, and therefore appeal directly to the mortal mind which at once raises objections to the truth; this mortal mind is carnal and at enmity with God, it is the serpent of temptation with which all have to contend. Mortal mind uses words and brings forth sophistry wherewith to confound truth; it is the adversary within, the foe in the household, the traitor in the camp with which perpetual warfare must be waged.

To conquer this mortal mind immortal spirit must be appealed to, and this can be far more readily done in silence than by conversation, as talking gives opportunity for mortal mind to assert its claims in a dusty cloud of words which it raises to obscure truth and befog the mind of the one who is proclaiming it. As the cuttle-fish throws around it a stream of ink, blackening the waters all about, and in that inky torrent conceals itself and its own designs, so does the sophistical intellect of man endeavor to hide its fallacies and gloss over its false reasonings by specious sophistry in word. To answer back in thought is far more difficult, as thought without a conversational envelope has to make an impression, if it be a thought of truth, upon a purer and more abiding principle in man than the shifting mortal intellect. Whenever a person like the gentleman we have introduced to your notice as our illustration desires earnestly to reform an erring intellect and lead one who is hastening to ruin back from the brink of destruction to paths of safety and honor, he necessarily feels his only way is to appeal to that side of his companion's nature which can and will respond to the call of truth and genuine reason.

While it is true enough that the carnal appetite of man craves sensuous indulgence, it is far more true, as it will remain true in the case of every human soul forever, that the immortal spirit of man loves righteousness and hates iniquity; to appeal to that within man himself which loves goodness is the only successful plan of reformation. The reason why so many well-written works on physiology, hygiene, etc., often fail to accomplish the good designed by their authors is because of their absolute externalism; they appeal to human selfishness, and selfishness is in and of itself an error of mortal mind, one indeed of the first magnitude. No creature wants to suffer; rats always leave a sinking vessel; but where is the nobility, where the high moral purpose in a mere animal instinct of self-preservation, from which proceeds such maxims as "every one for himself," and "look out for number one"? Such aphorisms are the inevitable outgrowth of self-love; they spring from a development of the instinct of self-preservation without any corresponding development of the moral faculties, and as the moral faculties are the only ones whose development can give to their possessor power to effectually resist and overcome temptation, "hell is paved with good resolutions" arising out of a selfish desire to live purely for no other reason than because a penalty attaches to immorality and folly. To resist the encroachments of the sensual nature, to be strong to resist temptation, comes from an unfoldment of the inner principle of virtue within the life of man; and we care not who differs from us or what opposition our statement may provoke from materialistic minds, we affirm unequivocally, without fear of successful reply from any quarter, no one can live an outwardly virtuous life in all particulars unless guided by some strong moral impulse.

As long as evil desires are allowed to remain in mind, so long will they struggle to express themselves outwardly in word and deed; but reach the seat of the malady, destroy the root of the poisonous plant, and then, without taking the trouble to interfere with the leaves and branches, they will one by one dry up and drop away; as long as there is vigor in the root of a tree it will press its way up and out spite of all obstacles, as trees have been known after they were cut down to force their way through floors and ceilings and destroy property built over their supposed dead roots. Let any evil propensity remain unchecked in thought, let any carnal desire linger in the mind, let the affections continue to cling ever so slightly to an olden error, and you are never safe from yielding to any temptation which may present itself from without.

It is not the saloon but the love of strong drink in man which occasions intemperance. We hate saloons, and are in favor of prohibitory legislation. We look with disgust upon any law which sanctions and legalizes vice, still most certain are we that outward legislation can never abolish an evil. We rely solely on intellectual and moral suasion as our weapons of defense against legalized iniquity. How come the infamous laws to be laws? How come those men into power who can be bought and sold by saloonkeepers? how comes it that the saloon can buy up the votes of loafers? How comes it that the ballot in many a hand is a curse rather than a blessing? Surely the answer is plain. There is a devil in man, or an outside tempter would have no power at all. To fear the devil is to acknowledge the devil within you. Cast out the unclean spirit, the evil tempter within, and we care not how strong nor how numerous the hosts of darkness may be, when any tempter approaches you from without, if there is nothing in you to respond to his appeal he has to retire balked and discomfited.

Demoniacal possession in olden times and obsession in the present day must be exploded as a fallacy in all other senses than the one just indicated. Why should you be subject to the dominion of "evil spirits"? is there not an Infinite Deity? are there not legions of angels perpetually encompassing us? is not evil merely a transitory shadow, while good is an eternal reality? If everything that has ever been said by theologians and magicians concerning evil spirits is less than the truth, if the hosts of darkness are more numerous than the stars in the firmament or the sand grains on the seashore, even then we need not fear, for greater, infinitely greater, must be the power of light than that of darkness, infinitely more numerous the hosts of good than those of evil.

In its old esoteric sense the Garden of Eden legend, introducing the talking serpent as the tempter and seducer of Eve and Adam, only tells the tale of how man is by his own desires enticed. The serpent at Corinth in the days of Paul was the same old wily snake which first led man to transgress the commands of the Most High; nothing in either case but man's lower nature struggling for ascendency over the higher, nothing but inverted love and then perverted intellect led woman and man from pure happiness to misery, from the tranquil joys and restful work of Paradise to the thorny, barrier-bestrewn earth where through constant conflict alone they can reach the haven of safety and repose.

Nirvana, the kingdom of heaven, and all other names and titles signifying a realm of perfect bliss, apply to states rather than to places; we must conquer the desire for sin and then no enemy can hurt us; we must thrust from our affections anger, jealousy and all impurity, and then with nothing to attract whatever evil there may be around us, we shall be untouched by harm in the midst of a million pestilences, and like the three holy children of old, or Daniel in the den of lions, remain secure, no matter how the beasts may rage or the flames mount high around us. As a life-boat breasts the ocean storm, while vessels sink around it, as a cork floats peacefully on the bosom of troubled waters while lead immediately sinks to the bottom of the ocean, so does a soul emancipated from the heavy alloy of mortal passion pass safely through every form of tribulation and disease, fearing neither bacteria nor moral evil. Metaphysicians are often grossly misrepresented by those who have never taken the trouble to study metaphysics, because the mortal mind in error cannot comprehend the truth of spirit. The principles of spiritual science are pearls which neither dogs nor swine can appreciate, and to such creatures they should not be offered. The "dog" is the mortal mind of man, not necessarily evil, but spiritually unenlightened, that state of human consciousness which apprehends sensuous things only, and can form no thought of spirit. The "dog" element in man is materialistic, agnostic, unspiritual, and therefore it is but waste of time to present spiritual ideas to that aspect of human nature; argument is often utterly unavailing because addressed to the mortal mind only; however sound it may be, it is like the sun beating against the solid walls of a building, while the spiritual perception is the only window through which it can be admitted. The "swine" represent a much lower condition still, even a state of deliberate opposition to the truth, a hatred of righteousness, and whenever a healer comes across the "swine" in his patients he can do nothing for them unless he can oust them from their sanctuary and drown them in the waters of endless oblivion.

To drop metaphors and speak so plainly that no child need misunderstand or fail to comprehend our meaning, we forcibly insist upon this one fact as essential to all comprehension of spiritual science, viz., the utter impossibility of healing any in truth, unless you can so touch the divine within them that they themselves arise out of their graves of error, and casting away the love of evil, work out their own salvation.

God is man's ever-present Savior, but God is not confined to any portion of the universe; you come to God when you find your own soul, for the logos within you, the divine nature which you all possess, is the medium of communication between man and the Infinite Spirit. We are often asked if we should advise our patients to discontinue the use of medicines stimulants, crutches, and other foibles resorted to when mortal mind, turning away from spirit to sense, endeavors to find in matter the life which dwells only in spirit. Our reply is, you can only err if you forcibly remove from your patients a prop or leading string before he is ready to walk without it. If you feel your patients are doing wrong in resorting to material assistance, and you wish to break them off entirely from material aids, you must work in mind to induce them to see a just reason for giving up the props on which they have been accustomed to lean. Very often persons return to old errors, taking up again with material remedies because never having lost their faith in their efficacy, though temporarily they discontinued their use to please the healer, they still feel they would be better off with than without them. Never take away liquor, tobacco, bromides, chloral, or any detestable weed, drug, or medicine, but work rather to convince your patient its employment is a degradation. In treating for the belief in the stimulating virtues of alcohol, you must argue down the theory that alcohol is a tonic; give your patients to understand that the exhilarating influence he feels is due to mental excitation and not to the liquor. This exhilarated feeling you can mentally produce; you may give him colored water and let him think it is a powerful medicine just once, but no more, for the sake of a demonstration. When once he perceives that mind, not alcohol, revived him and gave him a feeling of renewed health and youthful buoyancy, the belief in ardent spirit as a builder-up of wasted nerve force is crushed forever.

In treating for the love of tobacco and for belief in its narcotic virtues, let your patient see that when you exert your mind upon him you can produce in him all the feelings he formerly attributed to the weed. This demonstration ought to suffice to prove that virtue lies in mind, and not in a plant. When anæsthetics are in constant use to provoke sleep, when hyperdermic injections are resorted to to relieve pain, you may administer simple water, and the effect will be the same. The hold of morphine, laudanum, or any other drug over the mind will thus be broken and the truth be vindicated that belief, mental action, not matter occasioned the results desired.

When a surgical operation is performed, the metaphysician should be in close attendance to direct the thought of the patient to immortal spirit away from mortal flesh; if ether, cocaine, or nitrous oxide gas can deaden sensibility and thus release from pain, mind can do vastly more than any drug, and if at first you resort to what may seem the subterfuge of presenting a counterfeit anæsthetic to the patient, it will be only for the sake of demonstrating truth that you ever condescended to simulate the practices of mortal error. Bread pills are not honest if constantly sold at an apothecary's, for the only use they are in any case is to prove that when taken in the belief that they are strongly medicated, they produce medical results.

Having once proved the truth that mind alone produces sensation and gives fancied potency to matter, you should never condescend to play tricks with your patient in the futile endeavor to demonstrate truth by acting a lie. If a person gives medicine conscientiously in the belief that it will do good, he is no imposter, and throws out no bad influence. Honest doctors of all schools do some good, but the cunning trickster, who gives his patient bread pills and colored water year in and year out, keeping him always on his hands, instead of being an approximation to a true metaphysician, is a mental malpractitioner, using so-called remedies to gull others, while he knows himself that mind, not matter, is the source whence their reputed efficacy proceeds. If you reveal to your patient the truth of being gradually, as he is able to bear it, making no rash disclosures, shocking no prejudices violently, but working constantly to undermine the foundations of error, you will find that he begins to ask you questions, evidently prompted by the silent treatment you have given. Argue all cases silently at first, and then converse as soon as your patient's mind shows a disposition to talk on spiritual science.

In treating a child or any one who is under strong mesmeric influence, you must treat the mother, or whoever is the keeper of the child's mind, at the same time, working earnestly to unfold the child's individual intelligence; in the case of one who is mesmerized, if you can reach the operator, command him to deliver up his prey; if one is injuring another, hold before them the truth that liberty is the prerogative of all God's children, so as to shame them out of practicing the infamy of mental slaveholding.

In the case of an idiot, idiocy being only arrested mental development, work to dispel fear and belief in mental unsoundness in the minds of all who surround the idiot. Idiots, no matter how many years they may have lived, are only grown-up children, like a character in Dickens, who, though twenty-eight years of age, imagining herself only ten, acted as though she were no older. Begin with an idiot or imbecile person as though you were instructing a child; forget the age of your patient altogether and conscientiously impart instruction as to an infant. With one violently mad, remember violent insanity is brought on by indulgence of the passions, furious temper, and perhaps most of all by the perpetual belief of those around, holding the sufferer in fear and dread.

Whenever you are asked to take a case in any hospital or lunatic asylum, make friends with the officials if you possibly can, do your utmost to secure a bright, hopeful attendant for your patient, and wherever circumstances permit, have the sufferer removed to quiet quarters. Change of air and scene, so constantly recommended by physicians, means only change of mental atmosphere, for if travel produces no distraction for the mind, no benefit can be derived from circumnavigating the globe. When a metaphysician is so situated as to be able to do so, let him take one or two patients in his own house, that they may enjoy the benefits to be derived from living in a sphere of thought which is not loaded with fears and beliefs of disease. When you go out to treat, it is well to treat in your patient's own room, which should always be a quiet, though a cheerful one, not necessarily pervaded by a death-like stillness, which is often anything but beneficial, but removed as far as possible from all discordant noises. Cheerful conversation, agreeable occupation, anything to divert the mind from disease, is good, and everyone who carries brightness into a sick chamber helps to make it well. Nervous people who sympathize with error must never be admited to a patient's room, and nurses above all people must be chosen on account of their cheerful disposition and good moral character. Hospital training is no qualification, for in many instances it either produces careless indifference or else a spirit of predicting evil.

As life is now and ever, in spirit, and as we must all of us wake up some day from our dream of mortal illusions and acknowledge understandingly the simple truth of spirit, death should never be feared or recognized, for we must all drop the mortal body sooner or later, and whenever its work is done let it go painlessly, while the immortal spirit is freed from limitation. God is well and so are we, is an ever-present truth. Truth prophecies no recovery, it deals in no futures, it proclaims to all mankind, You are well, even if you do not know it. The soul is never sick, never sins and never suffers, and we shall be all spiritual throughout eternity, having dropped the mortal mind with all its painful memories.

Whatever is truly good and enjoyable is eternal, whatever conduces to real happiness lives forever. All true unselfish affection is immortal, but whatever is of the shadow and darkness of mortal misjudgment can endure no longer than till the light of truth illumines the understanding, and forever puts to flight the shades of error. Truth is mighty and MUST prevail. Be this our motto; no perhaps about it, absolute certainty of victory, unswerving confidence in the almightiness of truth is the only armor which can protect us in our encounters with evil. If the battle seems long and patience is sorely tried, if relapses occur and the good work seems to make but little progress, we should attribute seeming failure only to our own weakness, and with redoubled energy press on to certain victory. With malice toward none and good will to all mankind, as champions of truth equipped in the love and understanding of it, we may all treat successfully first ourselves and then others; but self-treatment when successful is never selfish, so we must seek first to bless others, and in blessing them we shall assuredly be blest ourselves.

INVOCATION.

ETERNAL and Infinite Spirit, Life, Light, Wisdom, Love, Truth, Justice! Thou Soul of the Universe, Creator, Sustainer, and Enlightener of Mankind, we do not pray to thee because we think that our petitions can improve thy laws or alter thy designs; we do not ask thee to ward off from us any trial, suffering or temptation which in thy wisdom thou seest to be best for us. We would not ask thee to exalt us above our fellows, or make the lands we love the best, the fairest and most prosperous beneath the sun. But we will implore thee to stir up within us all generous resolves and virtuous inclinations; we will unfold the petals of our souls to catch the sunshine, and open the windows of our minds as best we may to let in those airs from heaven which stir us sometimes like mighty hurricanes, and again like gentle zephyrs woo us into newness of life and fuller conformity with thy divine behest. We would welcome the storm clouds of adversity equally with the soft rains of summer days and the gentle dews of summer nights; we would praise thee for the lightning and the thunder, the roar of the ocean and the strife which causes men's hearts to quake with fear, as well as for the sweet singing of the nightingales and the loveliness and perfume of the choicest flowers; for we can trace thee in fire and flood as well as in prosperity and calm, and rejoice to confine ourselves and all whom we love unreservedly into thine all-gracious keeping, feeling sure that in birth or death, in joy or sorrow, in commotion or repose, thou art working for the best good of all thy creatures, and cans't leave one to perish or mourn eternally, away from the knowledge of thy truth and the realization of thy love. We are but frail and erring, and thou art infinitely just and pure. Our perfection can never be like thine, an infinite perfection, but as each separate blossom in the garden or the field may be perfect after its kind and yet resemble nothing but its own species, so may we, each and all, learn so to live that in our spheres and degrees we may be as perfect as all our strength and all our opportunity will permit. May we ever keep before us the noblest models, cherish the loftiest ideas, pursue the heavenliest goals; and may we be content with nothing short of that justice which is as wise as it is loving, and compassionate as it is wise; may we learn to reconcile mercy with justice to our own understandings, and know that to thee they are in eternal agreement. So may our influence upon all with whom we mingle, and whose lives we in any way effect, be an influence for good only, in this and in every stage of our existence, now and in eternity. We ask for every blessing for the sake of that humanity in whose welfare we would find the highest glory.

THE MORNING NOON AND EVENING OF LIFE.

IMPROMPTU POEM.

SUBJECT CHOSEN BY AUDIENCE IN OAKLAND, CAL.

MORNING, when the day grows bright,
When awakes the glorious light,
When the shadows pass away,
When the world awakes to day.

Morning, beautiful and fair,
Your sweet splendors everywhere
Fill us with ecstatic hope ;
Thou the chain of night hast broke.

Thou art sweet and passing fair,
Morning beam and frosty air,
Thou dost drive the darksome night
Far away by thy bright light.

Morning, o'er the distant hill,
We behold thy waking rill,
And we know that noon will come,
But thou first must win thy home.

On the mountain top so high,
Morning breaks o'er all the sky,
And the prophets standing there,
Gazing through the cold, clear air,
See the rising of the sun,—
Day already hath begun.

Those who early wake and toil
Up the mountain, on that soil
Far above the valleys low,
See the day begin to glow.

While those in a lower place
Turn their eyes toward the face
Of the east where day is born,
But see not the breaking morn.

So those holy souls aflame
With the light of love — who claim
To be pioneers of right,
Who stand foremost in the fight,
Those can tell of coming day,
Rolling night's dark cloud away.

They upon the mountain stand,
And across a darkened land
They behold in purple east
Morning's rich and glorious feast.

So, if any soul shall say,
I behold the breaking day,
The glad morning of the truth,
The new coming of love's youth,—

Those who see it first must be Up, alive, and actively Climb where'er the truth doth lead,
To the point where o'er the mead
They can see the coming day Break in glory o'er the way.

Lovely morning all so bright!
Breezes soft and day's young light!
Morn is childhood, passing dear,
Morn is youth, exempt from fear.

Morn brings hope, a sweet young grace;
Knowledge comes — it then gives place
To a brighter, nobler hour —
Noonday shines in fuller power.

Come to morning's hill apace, —
Day grows brighter, new-born grace,
Added light and added love,
Stream from fount of truth above.

Noonday splendor, when thou'rt here
All the shadows disappear;
Noonday splendor, thou art love,
Truth divine from spheres above.

Thou fruition's glorious hour,
Thou midsummer with thy bower
Filled with flowers and beauteous things,
With the stir of radiant wings.

But in distant sky, behold,
After all the glorious gold,
After all the many flowers,
After all the charméd bowers,
After all the light of day,
Evening follows, cold and gray.

For the night again must come,
All the birds be gathered home,
All the flowers must shut their eyes—
Night again with dull surprise Follows with a sleep profound, Hushing Nature's loveliest sound.

Has the daylight been in vain?
Has the turmoil and the pain,
Has the light and heat been naught?
Has the sun its battle fought,
Only to retire at length,
Shorn of all its heat and strength?

Night has come indeed; but we
In the night-time clearly see Million worlds in yonder sky,
Beaming bright, benign, and high.

If the evening ne'er should come,
If the day should ne'er go home,
And the sun retire to rest;
Sinking in the purple west,
Then you would not see the stars
Shining through the empyrean bars.

So when night falls over man,
So when God's mysterious plan
Doth ordain that flowers shall fade,
And your lives in darksome shade
Of bereavement for a while Rest where day no more doth smile,—

Then the many stars in heaven
For the night-time all are given ;
And the sorrow and the shade
Show the heavens with light arrayed.

And the many stars of love,
In their glorious home above,
Shine upon you through the night,
Turning darkness into light.

Then when you've the lesson learned
Which so many hearts have spurned,
When the night-time all is o'er,
Then the morning breaks once more.

You have seen the stars at night,
Then when shines the new-born light,
'Tis the new light far above
Earthly death, and therein love,
Glad new morning, bright new day,
Breaks in light across your way.
Lo ! th' experience of the night
Doth prepare for morning light.

So 'twill ever be on earth,
Alternating death and birth.
So with morning, noon and eve,
Songs of pleasure we will weave.
Treasured wheresoe'er they go,
Life's deep river thus must flow.
Onward, forward to the sea,
To the great Eternity.

Morning, noon and night will lead
Over briars and flowery mead
To the glorious land at last
Where the day is never past ;
Where the sun and all the stars
You can see ; where all the bars
Of your senses, darkness here,
For all ages disappear.

Glorious morning ne'er to die !
Glorious fount of ecstacy !
Beatific vision blest
In that world of perfect rest
And divinest work — where man
At the last, by God's good plan, Shall be perfect ; unto thee
All our eyes turn lovingly.
With the red of love divine,
Wisdom's golden light shall shine
And the blue of truth will blend
With the white, which ne'er can end.
Purity, this is the whole,
This reveals th' eternal soul.

Blue of truth, upon life's flag,
Red of love must never lag ;
But one color yet you need, —
Wisdom's golden light to lead
To the perfect white divine
Of pure light ; in deepest mine
Of affection for the truth.
Wisdom, love with ageless youth,
All our souls must turn to thee,
Eternal One, eternally.

THE EDUCATOR,

CAUSE AND CURE OF ALL DISEASE.

A work of over 700 pages, just issued.

By Rosa Cadman Congar, M.H., and Dr. M. E. Congar.

This work is made up of Twenty-four Chapters, Second Part or Supplement.

CHAPTER I.—Introductory, by Dr. Congar.

CHAPTER II.—Causes: Ignorance and neglect.

CHAPTER III.—Remedies: Innumerable and simple; should be as varied in application as are the faces of the human family.

CHAPTER IV.—Lungs, Stomach and Circulation: These vital organs and their functions duly considered.

CHAPTER V.—Heart and Liver: Their importance as vital organs considered.

CHAPTER VI.—Constipation and Piles: This one chapter is worth the price of the book to every family.

CHAPTER VII.—Baths, Gymnastics and Ventilation: The lessons taught in this division are all vital and important.

CHAPTER VIII.—Hygienic Food: If you desire perfect health, you must make a careful study and live the teachings of this chapter.

CHAPTER IX.—Physiology of Marriage: Advice and counsel that parents should not ignore.

CHAPTER X.—Fevers and Inflammations: Only signals of distress; friends, and not enemies.

CHAPTER XI.—Bowels, Kidneys and Bladder: If diseased, because of bad treatment.

CHAPTER XII.—Sunshine and Shadow: Important, very important health requisites.

CHAPTER XIII.—Dress: The subject dressed as only woman can dress it.

CHAPTER XIV.—Colds, Catarrh, Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma and Indigestion: Causes shown, and simple remedies prescribed which have never failed.

CHAPTER XV.—Useful Recipes: Condensed items; necessities in every household.

CHAPTER XVI.—Health Crystals: Illustrates the power of poetry and gems of thought, to heal and uplift the sick and depressed.

CHAPTER XVII.—Pregnancy: Parturition without pain considered. The subject treated by a mother, having had large experience and observation.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Children, their Care at Birth and During Childhood: Thirty pages devoted to this important subject.

CHAPTER XIX.—Diseases of Women and Children: Women are everywhere suffering from ignorance of the laws of their being. A careful study will be of great advantage to both mother and child.

CHAPTER XX.—Testimony of Fifty Eminent M.D's., Professors and Chemists: We ask all who think they are safe in relying upon medicines when sick, to read this chapter of the "EDUCATOR" before any other.

CHAPTER XXI.—Tobacco and Alcoholic Liquors: We only ask a candid, unprejudiced perusal of this division of the work.

CHAPTER XXII.—Health Hash: A hundred or more brief hints hashed up for the good of all.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Menstruation and Change of Life: Important facts for old and young.

CHAPTER XXIV.—Miscellaneous Diseases, Remedies and Suggestions: The suggestions will uplift and strengthen your lives. Read every word of this closing chapter.

SUPPLEMENT OR PART II.

TWELVE CLASS LECTURES

BY THE EMINENT TEACHER OF BOSTON,

W. J. COLVILLE.

SUBJECT:

METAPHYSICAL HEALING.

No advanced student of science can ignore these teachings. Believer or doubter will be well paid for a careful perusal of the Supplement.

THE EDUCATOR is just what every practical metaphysician should study.

Popular Fallacies Concerning Mind Cure

By JOSEPH L. HASBROUCKE.

HN64 .C72

THIS is an exceedingly able and lucid treatise by a well-known New York journalist, who writes from the basis of many years' experience in examining and testing the efficacy of Metaphysical methods of healing. It is entirely impersonal and impartial in its treatment of this most important subject, and makes its principal tenets perfectly clear. It shows the self-evident absurdity of the various fallacious opinions that have arisen in the popular mind mainly through misunderstanding of the subject, candidly admitting and honestly defending the scientific character of the movement intelligently considered from the basis of the facts of demonstration.

We believe it will be a source of more light on the subject, and do more good among "sceptics" who have not before had the subject properly brought to their notice, than any similar work yet published.

It should be distributed in hundreds by every one interested in any phase of Mental Healing. Special rates for quantities for sale or distribution made known upon request.

The Birth and Being of Things:

CREATION AND EVOLUTION.

By ALEXANDER WILDER, M.D., F.A.S.

THE problem of existence has always a place in every thoughtful mind. Why? Whence? Whither? are questions that everywhere arise. The endeavor of the author of this little book has been to help to a satisfactory solution. Following a method of reasoning and illustration peculiarly his own, yet seeking to confirm his propositions by abundant reference to other writers of every shade of sentiment, Dr. Wilder has succeeded admirably in the attempt. Accepting the hypothesis of evolution, instead of an arbitrary fiat of Divinity, this treatise disregards the agnostic rule to inquire no further, but resolutely yet reverently proceeds to declare the Cause. The author holds that creation does not date with a beginning in time, but is a process in constant operation. His book should find a place in every library.

REGENERATION VS. DEGENERATION.

CHAPTER I.

AMONG the varied signs of the day may be noted a tendency on the part of some writers of ability to enlarge on the most depressing aspects of our fin de siècle civilization. Granting that it is perhaps too artificial to be really healthy, and that certain evils undoubtedly exist, still it is not thereby proved that we are actually retrograding.

Popular literature is frequently morbid, and many declare that, though sad indeed, even the darkest pictures are all too true. But are these views correct? To be true to life a picture must be many-sided, embracing features which frequently seem paradoxical. Do the pessimists and deteriorationists ever present other than the darkest side of life's picture? The expression, "a fool's paradise," is constantly on the derisive lips of those who seem determined to see nothing but the plague-spots of society; but may there not be "a fool's inferno" more foolish than any highly-colored Paradiso, which is at least a beautiful folly?

In this objective state, no observing person can truthfully say that all is fair, and sweet, and honorable; therefore no faithful artist can paint all things as they actually exist couleur de rose. But if art in all its forms be rightfully an incentive and aid to progress, then it is the duty of the true artist—painter, sculptor, musician, poet, littérateur, or dramatist—to select healthy and ennobling subjects in preference to those which tend to increase sorrow by turning hope into despair.

The chief object of this article is to counteract in some measure the baneful effects produced by a too vivid and incessant contemplation of disfigurements and grievances, a practice which has unhappily become prevalent in many quarters. Some writers of decided talent (though probably of little genius) untiringly depict the woes and sins of humanity, as if the world were rapidly going to destruction and they were specially commissioned to advise us of the fact.

Plays, novels, and magazine articles teem with direful proofs of certain and rapid deterioration, and we seem to be regarded as participants in a mad race toward death, or as mere puppets of a fate designed by a blind and vague monstrosity known as the "Law of Necessity." Heredity and environment are the catchwords of this pessimistic cult. By means of a fatal heredity we are forced downward, it is said, and a diabolical environment only accelerates our fall. If science, instead of nescience and sciolism, were brought into court to testify to the true nature of heredity and environment, we should be told that both are largely under our own control, and that nothing is too strong for the all-powerful spirit of man when once he recognizes his innate potency and determines with all the energy of his essentially god-like nature to compel fate to serve him as he wills. Hereditary tendencies undoubtedly influence us at the outset of life, and no kindly person thinks reproachfully of those victims of an unhappy physical origin who, being as yet unaware of their own spiritual possessions and capabilities, are held in the vice of inherited proclivity to abnormality. But no fate is hopeless; no human existence is so fettered by infirmity or hedged in with error that it cannot extricate itself, though possibly not without assistance from more "fortunate" neighbors.

There are two kinds of optimism—one totally laissez faire, and the other practically stirring and vigorous. The doctrine of regeneration—the new and second birth of humanity—as understood by science, is by no means synonymous with the religious tenet that man at his birth is totally sinful and depraved, and can only become a child of God by a complete change of nature. There is doubtless a great esoteric verity underneath that dogma, but the truth is so obscured by assumptions that it is difficult to find. The New Testament, however, is quite clear in its teachings, notably the third chapter of the Gospel of St. John. The new birth is but an introduction to a higher realm of consciousness. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." The word see is highly suggestive here, as it unmistakably refers to spiritual vision, or interior apprehension of reality.

The true optimist, working for the regeneration of humanity, acknowledges that the present state of society is imperfect; but he denies that it is rotten at the core and is constantly drifting from bad to worse, as the opposite school asserts. It can surely never be otherwise than healthful and of use to search for the finest passages in literature, the grandest and sweetest strains in music, the most symmetrical figures in sculpture, and the most harmonious blending of form and color in the painter's art. The critical spirit of the times is responsible for many of the very tendencies which are brought so prominently to the front in the painful scenes depicted in the literature of to-day. Is it healthful to be forever contemplating empty skulls, while so many active minds await examination? Need we perpetually interrogate closet skeletons and force open private cupboards to prove the unwelcome ghosts of the dead, while the fields of the living are filled with summer blossoms and the air redolent with their sweetness?

The vice of criticism is the bane of modern civilization; and the sensational interviewers and reviewers of the period seem to close their ears against harmonies, so intent are they on listening to discords; and to shut their eyes to purity and honor, so eager are they to retail the latest scandal to the highest bidder. Newspapers certainly do good, but they might do more good and inflict less pain on their readers were they to devote paragraphs to vice and crime and double-leaded columns to virtue. "But," say the alarmists, "were you to make less of evil, people would soon indulge in it even more unblushingly than at present; and were you to lessen in any degree the condemnation meted out to the guilty offender you would loosen moral restraints already lax, and in consequence assist the wicked world in its downward course!" In reply to these arguments, the thorough-going optimist may simply say: You are leaving completely out of account the immense force which proceeds from real virtue.

It is the growing conviction of workers in reformatory causes that there are two sets of foes to be encountered, and that the most difficult to cope with are those who consider themselves pre-eminently the friends and promoters of "righteousness." It may safely be said that the best minds—the soundest, cleanest, and healthiest, the world over—rejoice in manifest progress; but there are depressing features, discouraging to all save a few interpreters of the signs of the times who feel sure that the present days are mentioned and foretold in the Great Pyramid, and that we are now in a narrow passage leading into a King's Chamber, where all is light and liberty.

If we are at this moment in a specially transitional state, then many signs which would otherwise be depressing may be positively encouraging. Swedenborg has much to say of vastation, which is only purification by means of an outlet for whatever is distorted or inverted and has therefore become infernal. Swedenborg, with characteristic realism, teaches that the heavens and hells in the universe stand feet to feet—the heavens erect, the hells inverted heavens—so that the soles of the feet of the heavens meet those of the feet of the hells. This curious imagery, which is, however, quite in accordance with the Hermetic doctrine of the Great Man, serves as a vivid picture of what evil really is. When we recognize it as simply an inversion of good, we shall speedily learn how to cure the otherwise incurable. Were there in the universe a devil from the beginning—an eternal spirit of evil, co-equal of God, who is Goodness Absolute—then the everlasting reign of evil would be a certainty; but even Milton's tremendous Satan and Dante's legions of the Inferno lend no countenance to such a supposition. A fallen angel who was once upright, and therefore in the nature of things capable of recovering from the deepest fall, is the worst conception of either of the great dramatic poets who gave to Europe its Satanic Majesty.

A mediæval legend concerning the devil shows how keenly alive were the thinkers of even that darkened period, and how truly and practically metaphysical were their ideas concerning the regenerative influence of elevating suggestions and the deteriorative trend of pessimistic inculcations. The story runs that during the Middle Ages the devil frequently donned the habit of a preaching friar; and when officiating as a zealous monk in a church pulpit, the arch-enemy of souls (or one of his emissaries) had but one theme of discourse—the horrors of hell and the tortures of the damned. So fiery were the words and so declamatory the style of the intrepid exhorter that the listeners imagined they could see the flames and hear the shrieks and groans of their fellow-sinners; but tradition says most truly that by depicting such nameless horrors no one was led to live a worthier life. To adapt a phrase from a poet's version of St. Anthony's sermon to fishes, "Much frightened [not delighted] were they, but each went his own way."

But there is quite another side to these tales of the Middle Ages, for the same tradition says that sometimes a bright and glorious angel disguised himself as a preaching friar; but when he ascended the pulpit, his heart being full of the love of God and the raptures of saints in heaven, he could discourse upon no other theme, and as the sermon proceeded hard hearts melted, sinners were converted, and souls were saved from error and its consequences—all through the agency of an appeal from first to last to that pure love of godliness which, though it slumber profoundly or be deeply concealed, is never absent from a single member of the human race.

It is to be regretted that many gifted writers, some of them women of genius, should lessen their own glory and trail the garments of literary art in the mire in order to paint in glowing colors (and not with evil intent) the most flagrant short-comings and perversions of the least sanctified elements of society. The plea is often made, as was done in many stirring temperance lectures by John B. Gough, that the wretched spectacle of the inebriate served to deter youth from taking the first plunge into the sea of drunkenness; but would the effect upon boys be good were their preceptors constantly to assail them with graphic, portrayals of such degradation as the confirmed toper exhibits? Surely the constant companionship of high ideals, noble examples, and virtuous suggestions is worth infinitely more in building up stalwart, unimpeachable manhood than all the vice exhibits which could possibly be concocted.

Whatever is pure is purifying, and whatever is depraved is corrupting—so far as the influence of either can extend. It is on this declaration that metaphysical activity in a regenerative direction is based. The subsistent idea is that human nature is surely rising, even though its upward career be by way of a spiral pathway rather than up an inclined plane. We apparently retrograde, while actually advancing. We fall in rising, and rise after repeated falls to heights we could never have attained had it not been for the experiences gained while travelling from the primitive Eden of nude innocence to the sun-clothed state of knowledge which goes hand in hand with purity. It is but rarely that we find moralists discriminating as they should between innocence and purity. Virgin innocence may be likened to a pearl, white but lustreless, while purity is like the dazzling diamond, which flashes forth a thousand scintillations from its facets' radiating surface.

The two sons in that sweetest of all anecdotes, the parable of the "Prodigal Son," distinctly represent two conditions of humanity — the one remaining in its original, undisciplined, inexperienced self-complacency; the other displaying the ultimate result of conquest over every temptation. The battle of life is a struggle for higher existence. Mere perpetuation of race by multiplication of species could never fulfil the end of evolution. We are indeed potentially all that we ever shall become; but our gifts lie dormant, and we are satisfied to doze before awakening to the glorious realities of living, by the wand of all that trying experience which is only a testing and educating process.

CHAPTER II.

STUDENTS of Oriental philosophies state that a Kali Yug, or great year, covering about five thousand years of earthly time, will come to an end about the close of the present century, and every reader of the mystic Hindu books knows that abundant predictions have been made by Oriental sages that when this cycle shall end great disturbances will be followed by an era of peace and enlightenment—to the astonished delight of those who, unaware of the sure predictions, imagined the world was rushing to destruction at a constantly increasing rate of speed.

From this stand-point the phrase fin de siècle becomes intelligible as signifying but the end of an age. Objection is frequently made to the use of this phrase, it being contended that there is no warrant for dealing with the age of a century as with that of a man. Centuries, it is said, are not born in helpless infancy, to pass through an adolescent period before they reach maturity, at length to descend into the valley of doting old age. Though there is apparently much reason in this contention, it can scarcely be forgotten by any student of history that the last twenty-five years of every century are invariably its most remarkable period. The results of seventy-five years seem to culminate in the concluding twenty-five. It was at the very close of the eighteenth century that the French Revolution occurred, and what was the spirit of that uprising but a violent protest against superstition and tyranny? Piously brought-up people, who from childhood have been taught to look upon Voltaire, Robespierre, and other heroes of the revolutionary epoch as fiends in human disguise, are wonder-stricken when they discover accurate excerpts from their writings breathing the kindest and gentlest spirit of love to man, and even professing devout faith in a Supreme Intelligence which is essential virtue and goodness—the very opposite of the tyrant of Bourbon theology whom the people naturally sought to dethrone.

Revolutionists are doubtless mistaken in many of their methods, but their motives are not necessarily evil. Difficult though it doubtless is for the dispossessed nobility of Europe and the millionaires of England and America to see the hand of Divine Goodness in what denudes them of their earthly possessions, and equally hard though it may be for the rank and file of the law-abiding citizens of any republic to see aught but iniquity in anarchy, yet the true philosopher is he who looks deeper than the surface of events and studies their inherent and essential cause. All peace-loving people are agreed that anarchistic methods are false; but blind condemnation of actions, without seeking to know the source whence they proceed, is equally erroneous. Fruit ripens in due season, appearing as a completed product; tares grow slowly in the field, and as they reach maturity the wise student of agriculture seeks to know how they grow, and from what they spring, in order that orchard, field, and garden may henceforth be kept free from noxious products.

A period of revelation may appear like one of unmitigated calamity; natural results may seem almost like visitations of evil; and some are always quick to decide that every expulsion of disease from the body which is accompanied by frenzied symptoms is an unfailing sign that a new devil is entering, while in truth an old one is being cast out. The wealth of meaning contained in many biblical similitudes is so great that even should the "higher criticism" completely undermine the merely historic elements in the sacred canon, the Bible would be more useful than ever as a symbolic portrayal of the perpetual connections between causes and effects. We are living in a law-governed universe, not in a domain given over to the caprice of chance; therefore we must seek to become philosophers—lovers of wisdom, as the word signifies.

The puerilities of pessimism are due to its shallowness. On all sides it is utterly superficial, impatient, and circumscribed. Pretending to be scientific, it is nescient; assuming to trace everything to the action of immutable law, it takes but a hurried glance at appearances and thereby ignores law. All the sciences symphonize. Astronomy, geology, botany, anthropology, etc., prove the leisurely processes of Nature, and all indicate that there is a place for seeming retrogression coincident with progress. Instead of looking upon the dark side and preparing for the worst, it behooves us to see the bright side and anticipate the best, for only thus are we capable of taking active part in the working of regenerative order.

What is regeneration, but a higher and better truth? What is a birth, but an epiphany or manifestation? If all blind eulogy and harsh condemnation were set aside, and the facts of nature laid bare before our vision, we should understand many things which now seem obscure. Society is a Prodigal who is fast nearing the limit of his resources; but when he reaches poverty he will arise and return home a better, braver, wiser fellow than when at the earliest dawn of manhood he strayed from his Father's House.

Many people have been determined to see what they call "the world." "One world at a time," they say, is all they can pay attention to. And this may fully absorb our practical interest; but if we are investigating one world we are surely entitled to see all there is to be seen from the stand-point of that world. Two men pass down a country lane arm-in-arm. They are not blind and their feet do not stumble. One says to the other: "How brilliant are the stars; how beautiful the fleecy clouds hanging like soft drapery about the moon! I wonder if we shall ever visit those distant orbs?" His companion replies: "I was just thinking how many worms there are in this neighborhood. I have counted over two hundred during the last five minutes." The first speaker then remarks: "And while you, my friend, have been counting the worms which crawl on the earth, I have been counting the stars which shine in the heavens, and during the same space of time I have counted more than five hundred." Verily there are worms and there are stars. If our glance is directed downward, our world is peopled with the former; but if our heads are erect and our eyes turned skyward, the same earth is an observatory for higher things.

Are we retrograding? Yes, from the point of view of the worm-hunter. Are we progressing? Yes, to the vision of the star-gazer. Everything depends upon the point of view and condition of the beholder. The cynic—whose painful attacks of indigestion aggravate the mental distemper which gave them birth—sees with jaundiced eyes, as through a thick black veil; to him, consequently, the earth is black. Pessimism is a disease. It is also the child as well as the parent of disease. Because it is fatalistic and hopeless it cannot be prophetic, for prophets are invariably exhorters to righteousness, and to exhort to impossible righteousness were a sheer waste of energy. Christ condemns and destroys iniquity; and there is in every one an essential Christ. Self-accusation traced to its origin is self-glorification. Contrition for sin—a painful sense of weakness and unworthiness—comes from a glimpse of the indwelling Divine Spirit, who seems to upbraid for lowness by telling of possible highness. As with individual, so with collective, human experience. The race is engulfed in error, and weighed down more or less with a sense of its shortcomings; yet this load of humiliation is not a crushing burden, but a removable incubus which no one would attempt to lift unless he realized the power within him. Hydraulic pressure in the moral world is supplied both from without and within. We cannot lift ourselves unaided, but all the beneficent agencies of the Infinite are at our call if we but make use of our prerogatives.

Now that the degenerationists have a literature and a propaganda, it is time that their philosophical opponents, the regenerationists, should assert themselves. Assertions are too often permitted to go unchallenged; gauntlets are thrown down and no one picks them up. A challenge is offered by the negationist school, and it behooves affirmationists to embrace the auspicious moment to demonstrate the fallacies of pessimism. There is work to be done; divine science is demonstrable; the power of thought exerted for good can be displayed. Despite the current fad for depressing plays and literature, the great heart of humanity hopes for the best. It would rather believe that all things are working together for good than for evil.

Heredity and environment are thrust forward as the all in all. Let us, then, accept the challenge, and show how the very action of hereditary transmission can be exerted solely and powerfully in the direction of a higher generation; for if bad traits can be transmitted to offspring, so also may good ones. Moreover, if surroundings are of such importance, are we to understand that influence must be evil in order to be effective? that environments must be vile if they are to produce results? Through the avenues of the pessimistic school regenerative influences must show that good, not evil, is supreme in the universe. There is an exaggerated sentiment of kindliness which causes much saddening error. Many kind-hearted people spend their lives in over-rating the misery in the world, and such perpetual harping upon woe only depresses the singers of lachrymose songs, and often increases callousness in the very people against whose cruelties the sentimentalists protest.

The very names of well-meaning institutions might be altered with exceeding profit. Instead of societies for the "prevention of cruelty," let us have organizations for the promotion of kindness to animals and children. There is much in a name, for it offers suggestion of no mean value. A "home for incurables" cannot be expected to cure any one, for the title seals the doom of the inmates as they enter. A "home for inebriates" cannot cure a drunkard, for he is labelled inebriate, and expected to remain below the reach of moral suasion. A school for ragged children forbids their appearance in decent clothing, for were they properly attired they would be trespassers upon the name; and so, through an interminable list of misguided titles, the world's progress is often hindered by its would-be helpers.

The lesson for reformers of every sort is hard to learn, but if truly sincere they can soon compel themselves to learn it. Logic is relentless. If your neighbor is to control his passions, you must control your feelings; if your patient is to grow amiable, you must not see his irritability. To see the kingdom of God is to become regenerate. The good which lurks in all awaits the sunshine of a smile of recognition to call it forth. Away, then, with the self-righteous methods of those who wail over degenerate tendencies, and on with the new metaphysical methods of reform which shall render sin impossible through the establishment of righteousness!

The True History of Mental Science

By JULIUS A. DRESSER.

PAPER, 20 CENTS.

This is a revised edition, containing extracts from the unpublished MSS. of P. P. Quimby. It gives the plain facts concerning the discovery of metaphysical healing, and should be read by every one interested in mental therapeutics.

REINCARNATION:

"Metaphysics in India."

By SWAMI VIVEKANANDA,

Hindu delegate to the World's Parliament of Religions.

PAPER, 20 CENTS.

An important treatise on the fundamental tenet of Hinduism, making liberal quotations from Western writers in support of the theory of re-embodiment now rapidly becoming popular among liberal thinkers throughout the world.

THE POWER OF MIND.

By EZRA NORRIS.

PAPER, 15 CENTS.

An interesting examination of the laws governing mental operations and their physical results. It is comprehensive and conclusive, and should be read by all interested in the science of mind.

OUT OF THE DEEP.

Pen Pictures in Prose and Verse.

By EDITH WILLIS LINN.

PAPER, 25 CENTS.

A delightful collection of original sketches in which poetry and essay alternate in uplifting the mind toward the Divine that is immanent in all things.

The Religious Training of Children.

By ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

CONTENTS:

CHAPTER I.—"Our Heavenly Home."
" II.—"Restraint and Guidance from Within."
" III.—"The Divine Indwelling as a Dependence."
" IV.—"Our Human World."
" V.—"What is it to LIVE?"
" VI.—"A Few Home Suggestions."
" VII.—"The Ideal and the Practical."
" VIII.—"The Influence of Ideals."

THE chief purpose of this book is to aid in freeing children from theological falsities, and to give them the true scriptural idea of an Infinite Presence as immanent in each and all. The value of right thinking in the religious instruction of youth cannot be over-estimated. In this work the necessity of correct ideas is pointed out in the clearest possible manner; and the responsibilities of the home in regard to the individual, and through the individual to the State, are considered in a new light and methods suggested.

The author is President of the Woman's Educational Union of Boston, and is a writer of note well fitted for intelligent treatment of this important subject. Her book should be read and studied by every mother and every educator in the land—indeed, by all who are charged with the care and instruction of the young.

HEALTH FROM KNOWLEDGE,

OR,

THE LAW OF CORRESPONDENCES AS RELATED TO PSYCHO-THERAPY.

INTRODUCTION.

The following course of Lessons has been prepared in response to the urgent request of many students in various parts of the world, who, having read with interest and profit many works on Spiritual and Mental Healing, have expressed a fervent desire for some added statements concerning the most effectual way of making the general theory practical in special instances.

The subject of Correspondences is now attracting great attention in many circles, and as we are thoroughly convinced that it is a very rich mine of wealth for all who are willing to diligently explore it, we have set ourselves the task of attempting to reason out, in as simple and logical a way as possible, some of those obvious correspondences between inward and outward states which only need to be impartially investigated to be rendered plain to the general perception of humanity.

The days of willing ignorance and of blind devotion to ancient renderings and established precendents are happily fast drawing to a close, so that now, instead of submission to accepted limitations, the human family is clearly bent on acquiring mastery over all those conditions which are ignorantly denominated Fate.

Science is proclaiming through its votaries everywhere, the immutability of Order, therefore Scientists of every ilk are growing daily more and more prepared to welcome any system of teaching which is founded upon the rock of unmistakable sequence, while they are properly distrustful of whatever is even partially based on the sand of partiality or favoritism.

The Oriental word Karma has now become a recognized addition to the English language, and we have occasionally employed it in our lessons because it conveys such an abundant wealth of meaning in the space occupied by only five letters. The definition herewith given (viz., sequence,) is the chief meaning the present author attaches to it. We therefore request the reader, before going further, to fully master this definition. Karma signifies the unvarying, unalterable relation, perpetually existing between Cause and Effect, consequently our Karma can never be anything other than what we have brought and are bringing upon ourselves through our own action on one or more of the various planes of our existence.

There is no such thing as good and evil Karma. But we must not fail to live up to the essentially sound doctrine that it is just as legitimate that we should pay the penalty of error as that we should reap the blissful results of righteous conduct.

Deliverance from error there is, but escape from penalty there is not; however, the first step has not been taken along the path of genuine spiritual progress until the student of Truth has fully grasped the blissful assurance that every result of every action is the best possible result that could proceed from that particular act.

The system of healing elaborated in the following pages is strictly based upon the axiom whatsoever a man sows that shall he individually reap.

Sympathy with effort is praiseworthy, but to sympathize with distress is unscientific. As ignorance of universal law excuses no one from penalty, sufferers need not be sinners, and as penalties are invariably educational and essential to progress they cannot be remitted because they are necessities.

The aim of this text-book is to help people to help themselves and others, not to evade consequences or shirk responsibilities, but to so govern their thinking, speaking and acting, that through constant sowing of good seed, and naught other, harvests of good and pleasant fruit may be inevitably secured through conscious, intelligent co-operation with universal order.

THE LAW OF CORRESPONDENCES APPLIED TO HEALING.

Lesson I.

THE LAW OF CORRESPONDENCES.—THE PROBLEM STATED.

The word Correspondence is one which must not be confounded with such a term as allegory, or interchanged with any expression which denotes something arbitrary or fanciful. Correspondences are exact; they are true to nature at every turn, and can be exactly interpreted by a study of the unalterable relations between the seen and the unseen, or the subjective and the objective, which inhere in the changeless constitution of the universe.

No student of the Bible, and no careful reader of any section of Oriental literature, can fail to remark how very frequently natural illustrations are employed by the wisest of teachers in their method of setting forth spiritual truth in human language.

To follow out all the obvious correspondences in a single book in the Bible would be a lengthy task, while the attempt to explain every natural similitude would necessitate years of work and the publication of numerous bulky volumes.

There are four distinct groups of correspondences to which we desire to call especial attention, as we shall need to refer to them frequently in this series of Lessons:

First; The various parts of the human body;
Second: Sun, moon and stars;
Third: Animals, vegetables and minerals;
Fourth: Utensils manufactured by man for his own use.

The first and second of these four groups are universal. The third is less than universal, though wholly natural. The fourth is artificial.

The first and second divisions of correspondences are so closely allied that the ancients were accustomed to class them together, and the tendency to do so still is obvious in the writings of many modern Mystics, Theosophists, and others who speak of the human Zodiac with its twelve manners of people, and who teach Astrology from an Esoteric standpoint. No matter where we live, or to what nation we belong, as members of the human family we are all possessed of human bodies, which are alike in structure the world over.

The unity of the race is nowhere so clearly proved as in structural anatomy and physiology; for when the human shape is once comprehended, its parts known, and their functions described correctly, the student of the human organism has grasped information of universal import and value.

Ascending in thought from a contemplation of the single human person till we take in the idea of the Social Organism, we are never called upon to change our anatomy, physiology, or psychology, only to enlarge the field of their application.

When we contemplate the wonders revealed through Astronomy it is the same; the order is threefold in both instances. Spiritual, intellectual and personal in the one case; solar, planetary and lunar in the other. Stars are grouped in galaxies; worlds are constellated in systems. Everywhere there is plan or order, and this is threefold. Wise philosophers, including Ralph Waldo Emerson, have exclaimed, "Man is his own star," and profound students of stellar science, who have favored any astrological theory, have boldly pronounced the thrilling words, "The wise man rules his stars, the foolish man obeys them."

The whole difference between the wise and the foolish on earth is that the former are governors of the world around them, while the latter are governed by it. Self-government is the first step; government of exterior conditions is the second, on the road to abiding victory. A careful analytical study of the human shape reveals the fact that it contains an exact correspondence with everything existent in the ample domain of nature external to a human personality.

Sun, moon and stars are all within as well as without us, and the same is true of all varieties of minerals, vegetables and animals.

Students of Esoteric philosophy, whose desire it is to make practical use of Esoteric verities in Exoteric relations, soon come to clearly perceive that there is nothing outside of a man which can affect him, either for weal or woe, except through the outworking of the law of correspondence. There are absolutely no limits to the truth of this statement, but, because of its axiomatic character and far-reaching significance, it is repudiated by many, because its very accuracy renders impossible the magical phenomena which many superficial inquirers into Occultism desire instantaneously to produce. So many treatises upon the Occult are written in the hieroglyphical style of Paracelsus and other distinguished alchemists, that the general reader is bewildered rather than enlightened when he endeavors to make practical use of the "jargon of the initiated."

Whatever may have been the reason, in centuries gone by, for purposed concealment and predetermined mystification, or for the employment of a terminology translatable only by members of secret fraternities, the time has now come for rending the veil and putting forward the deepest truths of mystical philosophy in the clearest possible language. But, though clarity of expression is a desideratum, the fact remains immovable as ever, that no one can initiate his neighbor; though anyone who is already in the possession of knowledge can impart it to all who are willing to apply themselves faithfully to the learner's task, which is to appropriate information and demonstrate its usefulness by actual employment thereof.

Once let an individual soul, here embodied for terrestrial expression, grasp the truth that soul is master and flesh is servant, that individual has found the mystic key which can unlock every door in the universe which needs unlocking before the embodied entity can stand forth in that sovereignty of dominion which rightly pertains to divine offspring. The 8th psalm is one of the finest lessons in Divine Science or Universal Theosophy to be encountered anywhere, but even that majestic shout of exultation has been perverted by false theology, and pressed into the service of a contemptible view of human nature. The greatness of humankind is emphatically declared in words which can be correctly rendered. "How great is man that Thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that Thou visitest him; for Thou hast made him but little lower than Elohim, and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou makest him to exercise do-

The lower or earthborn man, the result of fleshly generation, contains all the animals, birds, fishes, reptiles and other creatures which are mentioned in this psalm, and only as the higher, spiritual, God-derived nature dominates this inferior sense-creation, can any human being really know what it means to be truly human. We are not animals, but we contain all animals. The human shape is integral, embodying the whole, while all animal and other fractional shapes express less than the unit, albeit, whatever they express is contained within the unit, the fullness of which is expressible only in a human body.

All attempts at fighting fate or struggling against surroundings are worse than useless, for such pugilism only brings a sense of weakness, defeat and disappointment in its train. But some are sure to ask, "Do you mean to tell us that we are to make no efforts to reach the goal or win the prize? You surely cannot mean that victory is gained without conflict! Are there no foes to fight, no enemies to subdue. ere we can reach perfection?

As such questions are very common, and not at all unnatural, we seek to reply to them in an unmistakable manner.

Victory or triumph is gained by encountering necessary material which is far from being inimical, as it is truly that out of which our highest artistic product is to be fashioned. The potter and the clay, or the sculptor and the marble, will suffice at this point as an adequate illustration.

The statue is made out of marble, and the various vessels which pay tribute to the potter's skill are fashioned out of clay. No marble, no bust in the sculptor's studio; no clay, no beautiful vessels in the potter's workshop. Can the marble in the one place, or the clay in the other, be bad, evil, wicked, or anything to be fought against, when those very materials are necessary to the work which the artist is determined to accomplish? "No cross, no crown" is exactly in line with what we are teaching. The cross may be composed of iron and be hard to carry; the crown is made of gold and is worn as a symbol of victory. The one grows out of the other, therefore the latter could not be if the former had not been.

Viewed from this standpoint there are no crosses which we are justified in rebelling against or calling evil, for the very idea of a cross is the blending of two lines of equal length, one perpendicular, the other horizontal. There are two forms of a cross true to nature. The one (anatomical) is the Christian theological cross; the other (astronomical) is common to all arts and to all sciences. The Christian cross is the human cross, and as such, needs to be interpreted entirely apart from those special meanings which have been assigned to it by dogmatic theologians. The human body can be perfectly measured only by a scale of twelve, and the twelve distinct portions of the human anatomy correspond to the twelve signs of the Zodiac, therefore it is quite easy to strip many ancient mysteries of their profound occultism and talk in plain language of the smaller individual body and the larger Social Organism. The twelve tribes of Israel, twelve apostles of the Lamb, twelve manners of fruit growing on the tree of life, twelve gates to the Holy City,—New Jerusalem, twelve foundations, etc., etc., all refer to the perfect structural organism of humanity, an organization which when perfect is exactly the same on the largest as on the smallest scale.

In further pursuance of the study of anatomy we discover that the height, length and breadth of the human figure are equal, as a perfectly symmetrical human body measures exactly the same from the crown of the head to the ball of a heel, as it measures, when both arms are extended, from the point of the middle finger of the right hand to the extremity of the middle finger of the left hand. The measure of the perfect man, or angel, is the sign of the cross. In hoc signo vinces is therefore susceptible of an expressly anatomical interpretation. Instead of denouncing or deriding the cross as many shallow would-be "liberalists" are accustomed to do, it is highly important that sincere students, imbued with the spirit of scientific scrutiny, should give to the world a truly irrefutable answer to the question, What do you mean when you say the Master bids us take up our cross (each one his own cross) and follow him?

The Master, or Messiah, is whosoever has taken up perfectly his own cross and is therefore capable of making a perfect demonstration in the eyes of others of the way of so doing. Readers of the Gospel narratives would do well to bear in mind that in many places we are informed by the Evangelists that the teacher told his students or disciples that they must take up their cross, before he intimated to them the slightest probability of his literal submission to the Roman mode of punishment meted out to capital offenders, and as no explanation is vouchsafed in any one of the evangels, it is but reasonable to decide that the writers took it for granted that the expression needed no interpretation, it being self-explanatory.

As a cross can only be perfectly made of two beams of equal length pointing in opposite directions and collectively to the four points of the compass, the symbol of the square is also suggested, and the perfect circle encloses the figure when the diagram is made complete.

As these correspondences are completely true to nature, and are absolutely universal, they rank first in the order of importance, and ought to be carefully studied and well comprehended by every student seeking to become proficient in the theory of Divine Science, a theory, by the way, which is absolutely practical as it can be perfectly demonstrated to human understanding, and made the all-efficient basis of a system of healing which, as the word implies, is making whole.

The more deeply we study into the beauties of pure anatomy and physiology the more do we see how very helpful it is to have a clear idea of the human structure in health and perfection. The study of disease or the so-called science of pathology is a drawback instead of an advantage to a Metaphysical practitioner, because it tends to corrupt the visionary faculty, and scientific mental healing includes the presentation of mental pictures of the right sort to the sub-self of the patient. Of course it follows that outward representations of like character greeting the physical eye can be of great service, especially in cases where oral suggestion is found to be a valuable adjunct to silent treatment.

As there are very many garbled notions afloat as to the mental attitude which a healer should sustain to a patient, and further, as denials are often nauseating and tend to spread the very maladies they are intended to destroy, we deem it imperatively necessary to formulate for the widest possible circulation a brief catechism which, though by no means exhaustive or complete in detail, is, we are convinced, not only correct in outline, but highly suggestive of a great deal more than could possibly be condensed into a few paragraphs of ordinary essay writing.

Our catechist is a typical new student who has no very clear idea of the Science of Healing, but wishes to faithfully study the matter, though suffering somewhat from confusion of thought engendered by hearing and reading indistinct and incoherent references to the modus operandi of mental therapeutic practice.

Querist: What is your first object in the study of correspondences as applied to practical healing; how do you discover the disease from which the patient is suffering, then having discovered it, how do you treat it?

Teacher: Pardon me, my friend, for telling you plainly at the outset that you are laboring under a total misapprehension of the theme. Doubless you will be surprised to hear me say that I never look for a disease and never treat a disease; on the contrary, I do my best, quickest, and most enduring work when I am in total ignorance of the malady which is being destroyed through the action of regenerative thought within, as well as upon, the patient.

Querist: What then do you treat if you do not treat maladies, and how can you remove effects unless you know the causes whence they spring?

Teacher: I treat men, women, and children. My aim is to help them to self-knowledge. Those who come to me laden with disorder are ignorant of the true way of life; they need instruction and I seek to give it them. But mark well these words, I seek to discover the special need of whoever seeks my assistance, and to that need I minister to the best of my ability.

Querist: But have I not read in various books on Mental, Spiritual or Divine healing that you must name a disease in the act of denying it away? Suppose now, a person is suffering from Asthma, and you are totally ignorant of his complaint, how can you treat him?

Teacher: I do not presume to deny what you may have read in certain books. All I undertake to do is to elucidate, as far as I can, the system which I uphold and practice, and which I find to be the best in its results. Were you suffering from any such disorder as the ailment you have mentioned, I should treat you for perfectly free, easy, copious breathing. While I do not wish to know from what complaint you are suffering, I sit silently with my visitor and quietly affirm that I shall discover his special necessity and intelligently minister to it. Had you told me that you were afflicted with Asthma and requested me to treat you for it, I should quietly have reasoned with you, and asked you to so far change your language as to put the request for treatment into a logical, concise and affirmative sentence. Had you permitted yourself to think the subject out, you would readily have complied with my request and told me that you wished to breathe freely and easily.

I should then have treated you with the intention and expectation of your doing so, and had you responded to the treatment, you would very quickly have begun to breathe more easily.

Querist: What do you think of denying the existence of the body and of the material world in order to detach one's thoughts from sublunar vanities, that they may be fixed on the realities of Spirit?

Teacher: As I teach the exact, orderly and necessary correspondence between the outer and the inner, I could not be guilty of any such folly, which amounts to intellectual stultification, and which, instead of forming the basis of rational healing, involves the most bewildering mysticism and the wildest contradiction in terms. To deny disease is plausible because we wish to be rid of it, and we all seek to fight it until we learn a better way of conquering it.

But to first deny the existence of the body and then point to an improvement in that body's condition as a result of a denial of its existence is self-evidently absurd.

It is wise and well to affirm the real existence of the spiritual body and then declare that the physical shape corresponds perfectly to this ideal form. My eyes are perfect; my ears are perfect; and many sentences of similar import, are legitimate affirmations, because the ideal organ must be pronounced perfect in order that its exterior correspondence may become perfect. Affirmative statements can be made from the standpoint of interior realization, will, and expectation.

The mental picture of a perfect organ, and then the outwardly spoken word declaring such to be a true picture, is an effective mode of healing, and includes useful auto-suggestion when it is a self-declaration.

Querist: I begin to comprehend, I think, that your system of healing is something like this: you make a mental picture of health and suggest it to your patient either silently or aloud; or first silently and then aloud, or vice versa; you then expect that in consequence of a decided change in the object of mental contemplation a corresponding change will be naturally induced in the flesh?

Teacher: Precisely so; and we go so far as to apply this mode of practice to vanquishing all obnoxious habits, even to the regeneration of society at large, on the basis of the ideal being the essential real, the so-called real being merely a correspondence to the ideal. We look upon the relation between outer and inner, or subject and object, as between form and shape, number and figure, image and likeness. The form, number, and image are spiritual or ideal; the shape, the figure, and the likeness are external or physical. Both are good, but one must precede the other in the logical sequence of the evolution of what is involved.

Suggestive methods of healing, no matter how materialistic or agnostic may be the theories of some doctors who practice them, are efficacious in the degree that they consist of reasonable appeals to the individuals treated; and they prove ineffectual to the extent that they are based on some other conception of humanity than that human nature is good at root and core.

The essential cross is the blending of love and wisdom, which are truly one in real being as light and heat are one in fire. Fire is revealed in light and in heat, so is divinity revealed in affection and in intellect.

To be a genuine healer one must be lovingly wise and wisely loving, justly merciful and mercifully just. Equity, equipoise, and equilibrium are three kindred words, finally expressive of health, harmony, and order. Seek harmony and persist in seeing it as already consummated within; by so doing you will soon learn the law whereby its outpicturing is rendered certain. Healing and harmonizing are one, therefore to the extent that you succeed in producing states of harmony you are a successful healer, but never any further.

LESSON II.

SPECIFIC CORRESPONDENCES. — PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS FOR HEALING.

It is never easy to enter deeply into the subject of this essay, except we undertake to trace our theme far back beyond those obvious appearances which—because they are intensely real to mortal sense—are looked upon as genuine realities by multitudes who have not yet grown to peer beyond effects into the deeper realm of causes. The reason for the difficulty mentioned is that so many people are afflicted with ailments for which their personal errors seem to offer no sort of explanation, and we naturally rebel against any interpretation which enthrones injustice, while it dethrones every noble attribute of Deity in our philosophy.

If people suffer, but do not bring sufferings upon themselves by positive sins or palpable faults, to what shall we turn for a solution of this very perplexing problem, if not to the teaching conveyed in the gospel words concerning the man who, though born blind, received sight as a result of the healer's word and touch. We are all born blind, and in our blindness we make mistakes and suffer for every one of them at some time and in some manner. This suffering, though it is penalty is not punishment, for it proceeds not from divine anger or human displeasure as such, but arises of necessity in the course of our scholastic career as an educational chastisement or discipline; words which mean nothing harsher than cleansing and teaching when traced to their origin.

We are, it must be remembered, traveling toward the goal of perfect self-conscious individuality, and on the road thereto we have much to experiment with, and many of our experiments are conducted ignorantly. We must have the experience of the penalty which grows out of all imperfect or mistaken acts, or we should not attain self-conscious growth (in the attainment of which, racial or general, as well as individual, private and particular conditions must be taken fully into account) before we shall have reached a position where we are sufficiently lifted up on the heights of understanding, to be able to look down and over the field occupied by mortal sense so as to account for all that occurs in that lower and less enlightened region.

It is never easy to isolate or separate one person's life wholly from that of others, because we are in family clusters and communal societies, sowing and reaping, jointly and collectively as well as privately and particularly. When people are afflicted with disorders which appear foreign to their own state, they are frequently reflecting in the precisest possible manner, the errors of those about them; people in whom they are greatly interested, whom they intensely love or fear and upon whom they in many ways depend; while in the case of young children and extremely sensitive people of both sexes and all ages, the source of a malady is clearly traceable to the influence, consciously or unconsciously exerted by a parent, teacher, or intimate friend. With many persons who are not palpably sensitive in so pronounced a degree, we are compelled to look further and deeper into occult influences, or we fail entirely to account for what we actually behold.

Among those interested in Astrology or Solar Biology, it is well to point to the obvious fact that the twelve manners of people sometimes classified according to the Zodiac and sometimes according to the Tribes of Israel, are respectively liable (until they have overcome their specific liabilities) to succumb to the disorders which particularly belong to the domains they occupy in the Grand Man. Where we can be strongest, there we are apt to manifest our most pronounced weakness, because the seat of greatest susceptibility is the zone of temptation with every individual.

Aries, which is the head of the Grand Man and the first of the fiery signs, gives to its natives tendencies, which if rightly used evince great strength in the region of the head. Such people are pre-eminently adapted to do what we agree to call "head work," but we all discover that these are the very people who often suffer most with headache, and when intensely excited are liable to brain fever. It is useless to ignore natural differences or seek to treat everyone alike in a blind sort of manner. These heady, headstrong people are often found in a singularly headweak condition, out of which they can only be brought as their qualifications and temperament are recognized, and dealt with by an orderly method.

Brain workers, usually highly intellectual people, find everything flying to their heads, so that bad news or any disturbance in their surroundings quickly makes itself felt in head distemper of some sort. We find many of this type suffering from dry, hot heads, their eyes wild looking and abnormally protruberant, with every indication of incipient insanity, though the actual annoyance which they have suffered and which serves to bring about so frantic a condition may seem to persons of widely different temperament utterly inadequate to produce such direful results.

Such people are generally talkative in the extreme, and though it would be the height of unwisdom to increase fever by still further exciting them by argument, they need to be quietly and patiently reasoned with. They are impatient and acting unreasonably, for that reason we must, if we are to serve as true healers, or even temporary relievers of their distress, go to them and reason with them in an imperturbable spirit of calm. We make a mistake if we abruptly contradict them or appear to make light of their afflictions which, though often very light in our eyes, are very great in theirs. We must be prepared in such cases to listen as well as talk, and even should there be a tendency to incoherency or raving, it will not do to try and prevent it by a command; it must be reasoned away in the calm presence, and through the firm quiet agency of one whose own state is unruffled, and whose normal pulse and unfevered temples give evidence that peace reigns within on a stable throne.

These head troubles, as they are often called, lead at first to seeming and then to actual insanity—a state which can be brought about by unintentional mental malpractice. All head difficulties are greatly relieved by marked decision in statement coupled with sincere demonstration of interest in a patient's welfare. Whenever there is a belief that any occupation which employs the mental facualties unduly taxes them, it is wise to suggest, both orally and silently, that mental employment is the natural work of such an individual, and that in the doing of it, not in its avoidance or relinquishment, may health be expected. This is where the extreme practicality of mental treatment is made manifest; it does literally "take the bull by the horns" and makes the bull a servant; it does "agree with the adversary quickly," and it does follow out the precept "love your enemies." But all this it accomplishes in a manner far removed from the way suggested by conventional misapplications of such divine precepts.

The so-called "adversary" or "enemy" is not such in reality, but only appears to be such until its real nature is understood; then, when it is seen to be not adverse or inimical but friendly, having agreed with it, it can no longer disagree with the individual to whom it really stands in a truly friendly, though hitherto misconceived and consequently apparently unfriendly attitude.

Nothing is unfriendly after one has made friends with it. "Blessed are the peacemakers" is a saying far too seldom expounded in the light of its luminous significance. Peace cannot be kept or maintained unbroken save in places where it already exists, but where it is now absent it can become present, it can be induced, created, and so firmly established on the basis of a right understanding of mutual relationships that the elements which formerly yielded chaos, can be henceforward welded into cosmos.

We may readily understand the position taken by the practitioner of Spiritual or Divine Science who, going into the midst of strife, breathes forth the spirit of peace. Well-balanced intellectual people are needed to reach ill-balanced intellectual people, because harmony needs to reign in the teacher in the special domain where discord prevails in the scholar. To evade a fact through ignorance of its nature and existence, is not to heal; healing being a result of deliberate, enlightened grappling with a trying situation to the end that discord is vanquished because harmony is induced—we cannot always say restored—because there are many places wherein disorders have prevailed from before the birth of the sufferers we are called upon to relieve.

Hereditary discords can and must be mastered in the same way that such discords as have been acquired after birth are overcome. There is no truer statement than "every limitation can be cast aside," but errors are vanquished only by applying to their destruction the truths to which they are exactly opposed. Here comes in the law of correspondences in the killing out of error. If falsehoods have been told only the tongue can be the fitting instrument of restitution, therefore true words must be spoken to destroy the influence of false; kind words must be spoken to nullify the effect of cruel. The same members must be employed which have been misemployed; for on the plane where wrong has prevailed, there must the contrary right much more prevail. This doctrine of correspondences is not unfathomable, but it is profound; though deep it is not obscure; for it teaches us to look for the remedy in the use of what has been perverted and thus diverted from use to misuse.

Conversion or turning around, is re-directing a stream into its proper channel; introducing a river to its native bed from which it has been turned away by some crooked device. We cannot rationally explain wrongs, for they are unreasonable; but the right, which is to destroy wrong is clearly explicable, and we are not concerned so much with the cause of the malady as with the method of release therefrom.

Here is one of the most vital points in all truly practical metaphysical teaching! Intelligent practitioners do not think it necessary to flounder about in the mud or wallow in the mire of sensual causation to apply the only true and lasting antidote to sensuality, which is to strengthen innate love of purity. It seems scarcely credible that any one should be qualified to do this who has not felt within himself the thrill of an awakening consciousness that a virtuous life is not only possible and right, but much more than this—the only really satisfactory and truly enjoyable life.

When we have to deal with high-strung and overstrung natures, we need to be cautious, lest we present truth in a way calculated to antagonize rather than attract. But this caution differs widely from nervous carefulness. When this is made clear, many difficulties of long standing vanish. Caution is the accompaniment not only of discretion, but of kindly solicitude in place of rash thoughtlessness. A cautious, discriminating temper is never one that coldly calculates after it is warmed with love, though without affection it is indeed pure and cold like ice or marble. We need fire as well as ice, and though the cool hand is very welcome at times, oftener the warm, glowing heart of love must be behind it, or its touch will chill but cannot heal.

Very many elements go to make up a perfect character, and we see these varied elements so wondrously combined in the portrait of the manifested Christ, that we can scarcely fail to see why and how it is that Jesus healed all manners of sickness and disorder, and assured his disciples that they should do the same proportionately as they ate and drank of that interior nature which should eventually shine forth in them as it already shone forth in him.

If we look upon the head as the seat of authority and say that those individuals who are in the province of the head are the chief thinkers and intellectual leaders of the world, and that these are more likely than any others to suffer from head troubles, we shall have struck a keynote which will enable us, as we follow its suggestions, to reach a conclusion applicable to all other parts of the human anatomy; for no sooner does anyone gain real insight into the nature and working of the law of correspondence at one point, than he finds himself able, by a little study, to apply it at any other point in the entire organism; the rule of application being the same fundamentally in all instances.

Headaches proceed from intellectual difficulties, mental embarrassments; to conquer these, we see at once that denials alone are useless. Affirmations only are conclusive. Take as a sample illustration, the following common case likely to crop up anywhere at any time, and witness the application of the theory of correspondences we are seeking to elucidate.

A patient comes to a healer with the complaint that everything is going wrong in his affairs and he is feeling so bewildered, he knows not which way to turn. Everything is going right with you concerning all your affairs, is a good, concise, comprehensive statement to make by way of rightful suggestion. Such a sentence is a pure affirmation, the suggestive value of which is exceedingly great, because it diverts thought immediately into an entirely new and highly profitable channel; it cannot therefore encourage confusion; if it works at all it must aid in the evolution of harmony.

If the patient is of a very questioning turn and wishes to clearly apprehend the truth of what you declare in an intellectual manner, you should be prepared to say to him, "I wish you from this moment forward to realize that a decided alteration has taken place in the current of your affairs. From the instant you came to me and requested me to give you a treatment, you put yourself in a receptive attitude toward a new line of mental influence, and this new thought must ultimate itself progressively in a corresponding change in both departments of your affairs—the inner and the outer. Your trouble has been twofold; you have suffered in your own person and also in your business or domestic environment; do not blindly expect the change to begin in things outside your personality; changes begin within and proceed in orderly sequence to without. You are within yourself feeling brighter, better, cheerier, and in consequence of your having absorbed and assimilated the healing thought offered you, which you voluntarily came to seek, you are henceforward in a healthier attitude toward all about you than before."

We have no intention of formulating a series of stereotyped sentences and urging that they should be used verbatim et literatim on every available occasion, but only seeking to suggest the kind of statement which is generally wise to make when explanations are sought by persons who do not immediately understand what you are saying to them. Remember when you are dealing with that section of humanity which seems to occupy the province of the head, you must be particularly ready with definitions and explanations, for they demand them and will not be satisfied without them.

The head has its rights as well as the heart, and where doubts and difficulties are pressing and intellectual satisfaction is required no treatment suffices to heal which fails to supply the needed mental pabulum. We know there is a side to the doctrine of the utility of denials which deserves respectful consideration, but as we proceed to explain this as we understand it, we shall clearly see that the chief difference between the two modes of statement is technical rather than intentional, though the distinction is nevertheless important.

Miss Charlotte Hawes, a well known American teacher of music, and composer of many stirring melodies, has given us a beautiful song opening with these words:

"Set the world to music,
Haunt it with a song;
Hide this wisdom in it,
Nothing can go wrong."

If everything goes right, nothing goes wrong, but though the latter declaration is legitimate and helpful, is not the former the stronger of the two?

Specific Correspondences

We are simply calling attention to major and minor benefits likely to accrue from differing phraseology. Let the tired, worried woman, who has been incessantly fretting and fuming over trials and discords, take up her parable in the words of the song and sing during her work "Nothing can go wrong," and she has taken a great step forward and will soon prove the relative wisdom of her course by seeing difficulties vanish and weariness depart, but when she goes much further in the correct use of language and exultingly exclaims, Everything goes right," she will be a far greater power in her household, for her diction will be confined to the vocabulary of heaven.

Take these two mottoes, "Nothing can go wrong" and "Everything goes right" and place them on our walls. We must be careful in the one case, lest we let some one sit where he will see the word wrong staring him in the face, but with the other we need exercise no caution, for there is not a word in the sentence which can possibly exert a baneful influence as it appeals to consciousness through eye or ear. Sit where you will in the class-room, let any pillar hide a portion of the text from your vision, and the purely affirmative motto can exercise no pernicious influence; while the other, good though it is as a whole, may inadvertently suggest nothing but wrong, while the former in the same position could suggest nothing but right to those who were so seated that they beheld only the terminal word.

Discretion is often the better part of valor, and nowhere do we need to be more discreet than in the presence of sensitve, nervously active, ill-balanced persons, who are among the first to apply for mental treatment; because in their cases more frequently than in any others, regular physicians and everybody else are apt to declare that mental treatment may prove effective.

The orderly work of mental healing carried on in accordance with an understanding and application of the law of correspondences is a beautiful, healthful undertaking—a work in which the most delicately organized maiden can well engage, but when the questionable method of denying disease, after having ferreted it out and called it by name, is introduced, we will not answer for the effect produced by such a course upon highly sensitive and intensely imaginative temperaments. St. Paul said, all things may be lawful, but all things are not expedient." There are questionable and unquestionable modes of mental practice; without condemning the former we confine ourselves to positive advocacy of the latter only. Affirmations are useful at all times, in all places, and on behalf of all people. As we grow more and more into an understanding of this, we shall see our way to a plain, logical, and effectual settlement of many a mooted question which comes up again and again as a vexed problem in the path of the mental practitioner.

There is a correct answer to every conceivable question, and that answer agrees always with the Golden Rule, which we have no right to twist and travesty until it appears to mean one thing for us and something altogether different for our nieghbors. We never really offend people by appealing to their highest and best, but we often give needless offense to others by dwelling in our own thoughts upon their supposed delinquencies. One of the most pitiful blunders ever made is setting up hideous scarecrows, veritable "men of straw," between ourselves and those about us, and then practicing and advocating an elaborately impertinent system of mental treatment, justified only on the pretext that our effigies are real flesh and blood humanity. We know of so many cases where this error fatally prevails, that we have no hesitancy in pointing out its thoroughly erroneous character for the sake of suggesting the much needed remedy. We make it our invariable course never to refer to what we see to be a mistake except in connection with a practical plan of remedy. If people would only consider that their views of people and things are not necessarily correct, a great forward step would soon be taken out of the desert of discord into the good land of harmony, which we can all possess if we will but march steadily forward, leaving Egyptian beliefs behind us while on the road to Canaan.

When we come to perceive that the real entity is everywhere the same and that it can always be appealed to, we learn to look with disfavor upon mental treatment "for disease" or "for discord," because we know that the very mention of the name of anything conjures up its reflection before the mental vision, and we cannot afford to be looking constantly upon ugly pictures if we would save ourselves and help to deliver others from the shadows which now entomb them.

There is so much in accepted Christian phraseology that can be pressed into the service of Divine Science, that it is quite unnecessary to coin a novel terminology when working among people who are used to the sound of certain phrases, which are as music in their ears; especially when these very phrases are full of sound, healthful suggestiveness. Uncompromising loyalty to truth does not demand iconoclastic procedure, except where there is a "golden calf" or other molten image to be broken up; and while we hope to be ever ready to demolish idols, it is our sincere desire to preserve and glorify whatever is of help and service to humanity. Take for illustration the words of a beautiful hymn:

"O, eyes that are weary and hearts that are sore, Look off unto Jesus and sorrow no more."

The conception is beautifully ideal. Eyes are wearied and sight is wasted with gazing upon what is hideous and repellant. Deliverance from the manifold afflictions brought upon us by gazing upon what is unlovely, is to be accomplished only as we obey the wise injunction: "Whatsoever things are excellent and of good repute, think on these things."

Any attempt to divert attention from the nauseous and fear-inspiring must be abortive, unless there be placed before the gaze of the sufferer a new and better subject for contemplation. A very interesting anecdote runs as follows: A little boy had disturbed his mother, who slept in a room next to his chamber, by counting aloud the pattern of the wall paper incessantly morning after morning. The tedious repetition could do the child no good, and it was tiresome to the ears of the mother, who, being a wise woman, found no fault, but supplied a remedy in the form of a pleasing picture which she hung on the wall exactly opposite her son's bed. The little fellow was so delighted with this mural decoration that he quite relinquished his former habit and soon developed a real taste for fine engravings and paintings of worth. The action of that sensible woman contains a practical lesson for all who would wisely practice suggestive therapeutics or any form of mental healing.

Divert attention from the undesirable by presenting the desirable, and just as this is readily done outwardly when we have the handling of material things, it must be done equally, and in precisely the same manner, on the psychic or subjective plane when we are handling spiritual things. The law of correspondences works inversely. As it is above and within, so it is below and without. There are no two orders in the universe; there can be but one order. A word to the wise is sufficient, but the unwise may require many utterances before they are influenced to forsake error for truth, and be it remembered that no one can reasonably be expected to share your mental attitude until he understands it and sees it to be reasonable. Be not impatient and be not officious. Seek to propogate truth, but though a propogandist, be not a proselyter, for proselytes blow hot and cold, and are only creatures of temporary sensationalism.

It is only by steady, persistent holding of right thought that error can be displaced. If you are not at once very successful in your work (so far as appearances go) remember faith develops as a grain of mustard seed unfolds. Do not say or allow yourself to believe that you can do nothing because as yet you can do but little. Small faith is living faith and holds within itself the seed of gigantic faith—faith so great and so potential that it can remove obstacles comparable to great mountains.

Forget not the injuction "Heal thyself," which means immeasurably more in its interior spirit than in its apparent letter. To heal yourself so as to prepare yourself to be God's instrument for healing others, is not at once to lay finally aside the last vestiges of some lingering physical appearance; it is to purge the thought-realm of those interior disorders which are the real diseases, outward effects of which are all that is perceptible on the external plane of observation.

There must be the right thought concerning others in your own consciousness, before you are ready to step forward and proclaim yourself a healer. Failures and disappointments will continue just as long as you inwardly maintain the belief that you are right in holding on to a carnal estimate of your neighbor. Our Swedenborgian friends, who make more of the doctrine of correspondences than do any other company of people, are quite right when they say, do not fight evils, but let the Lord overcome them in you.

We must open ourselves to divine influx; we must welcome goodness into our affections and truth into our understanding. As we keep our spiritual gaze riveted upon the heights, we shall obtain light and our countenances will shine so that those who are in the depths will see the light, which is God's universal radiance reflected through us to those of our brethren who stand in such relation to us that it is orderly that we should be unto them torchbearers and light dispensers.

Finally, everyone must accomplish his own regeneration through inward acceptance and assimilation of truth, each for himself. We are not wells or fountains to our neighbors, but we are guides to the fountains, to the wells and rivers of salvation. Let us be faithful guides and our good work will prove itself in harvests of benediction, to be shared equally by us and our companions. The clear air of neighborly affection is beneficial to all who breathe it, while the fetid atmosphere of exclusive interest in self is stifling to all who inhale it. It follows, therefore, that the very states of mind which enable us to bless our brethren are largely conducive to our individual well-being on every plane of our existence.

LESSON III.

ASTROLOGY AND MENTAL HEALING.—TWELVE MANNERS OF PEOPLE.—THEIR PECULIARITIES AND LIABILITIES.

Astrology has its roots in the Science of Human Expression, and, when rightly understood, helps very many people to a clearer understanding of themselves and others; but as the topic of Astrology is beset with many dangers, it is well to clear away rubbish by positively affirming certain fundamental propositions in the clearest possible manner.

First, let it be admitted that Equality is the cardinal watchword of Divine Science. We are equal in that we are all offspring of Deity. If one is a child of God, so are all the rest; therefore, all souls are alike unto the Eternal, who is no respector of persons.

Second, we must note that Variety is a prime characteristic of expression, and it is through differences (not disagreements or discords) that essential equality is to be revealed.

Third, Inequality is surely noticeable in the external world, but this pertains neither to the essential nature of human kind nor to the specific nature of a particular soul, but only to the degree of development reached at present by some and not by others. The family example is always in place. We are sons and daughters of the same parents, but some are elder and some are younger children.

In social position we are equals by birth, but in a measure of attainment we are unequal. Elder brothers and sisters can teach the younger, so do we come to learn that in some mysterious way we are related in the great Human family as we are related in the smaller groups which constitute our private households. Brotherliness and sisterliness must be ever the keynote to enduring harmony, but fraternity does not displace schools and teachers, for it does not blindly assert that all are at present equal in any other than the primal sense—that all are members of one great family and God is the parent of us all.

When we get behind all phenomena and consider ourselves as Divine Offspring only, we are confronted with so glorious a vision of our inward perfectness that we can but exclaim with Emerson, "I, the imperfect, adore my own perfect." But in that immortal sentence have we not a distinctive acknowledgement of the two—the perfect, which is eternal, and the imperfect which is temporal; it is the latter, not the former, which needs teaching, guiding, healing.

We all of us appear first as Adam, then as Enos, later on as Noah, and after some great transition in our experience (likened to a flood) as Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph successively—till at length we reach the Messianic height and know ourselves as we truly are. This involves a long process in evolution, and as we journey along this continuous way we can all help each other. We must be equally willing to help and be helped if we would progress truly.

The twelve sons of Jacob, titled Israel, as they are enumerated in the 49th chapter of Genesis are clearly of the earth earthy. They are there described as tribes of Israel, but their father is not God, but Jacob, and they partake of mortal qualities. They have great destinies to fulfill—twelve distinct kinds of destiny within one all-including divinely appointed destiny. Strength and weakness, innate qualities of power and liabilities to weakness are all enumerated by the patriarch as he addresses his twelve assembled sons before bidding them a final farewell as to the state in which they then beheld him. Let us see how he addresses them, what message he has for each, and then turn later to the twelve tribes as we find them enumerated in the 7th chapter of Revelations, where we shall discover them in regenerated order. In Genesis we are introduced to Jacob's offering in their unregenerate, or first Adam condition; in the Apocalypse we are shown these same twelve types of humanity regenerated into the likeness of the second Adam, who is the octave note, the eighth tone, the first in the new ascending scale of ever upward and onward progress.

In our first estate before we are born anew, we are liable to all sorts of disorders which come to us in different ways according to our diverse temperaments; but after we have conquered the flesh, by subduing its appetites, having gained full mastery over the passions which formerly rode rampant in us, we have come first into the sight and then into the very heart of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Regeneration must follow generation as an orderly process; we must be born a second time into a new and higher consciousness than came with our earlier birth. A first birth need not be sinful; it may indeed without being miraculous, be immaculate, but even if it be so, it is to be followed by a higher, nobler, fuller realization of life; therefore, the Christ is ever saying, "I am come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly." Taking this advent of the Christ into human consciousness in any sense we will, it is always the inrushing of a wider view, a sense of more glorious possibilities, a realization of a measure of freedom and degree of power hitherto undreamed of. It is a new revelation made possible by all that went before it, a crown placed upon a head which was without a diadem until it had evolved for itself an aureole.

Jacob and his twelve sons are in our midst to-day.

Such characters are both mythical and actual; they are far more than historical, for they are living among us; they are us and we are they. Reuben, the first born, is a remarkable type, as he is shown forth in all the excellency of physicial strength and dignity; but he is as yet only conscious of the exterior aspect of his power, therefore, though possessed of might, he is unstable in the exercise of it. Jacob is a prophet, so he points out to his sons what shall come to them in their "last days." This means that through the exercise of the faculty of seership one is able to confidently predict what will be the certain outcome of any course of thought and corresponding action steadily pursued. We make mysteries of prophecy; we cast discredit on the seer and vaunt ourselves that we are scientific because we are agnostic (a scholarly synonym for ignorant), but when we have drank a little more deeply from the well of knowledge, we no longer sneer at the well of Jacob, for we become Jacobs, then others may sneer at us, for we are in our turn among the prophets.

Verily there is a continual evolution of that which is involved in every one of us; let us, therefore, be ever on our guard against suppositious finalities, for there are no finalities but axioms of truth, and these can be increased in number, though never altered in reality. Jacob sees the future of Reuben as a gardener sees the future of the seeds he has sown and the slips he has planted. All growth is one growth; there is but one order of growth, therefore, as plants grow so men grow. It is from the standpoint of this knowledge that we can interpret the law of prognosis in addition to diagnosis; for he who prognosticates or fortells the future must be acquainted with the present and the past, with the law of sequence that has brought the present from a past, and will surely bring a future from a present.

Jacob is a clairvoyant, psychometric, intuitive; he understands the underlying principles of astrology and chirology as well as of phrenology and physiognomy. Twelve young men stand before him and he can read their heads, faces, hands, and more — he can penetrate below their surfaces and detect what is going on within them. Jacob is on a death-bed, he is dying to an old state and rising to a new condition. He is not declining or perishing, he is enlarging, expanding, and as he is taking his departure to the next rung of the ladder of conscious existence he is melting into his successor; he will be a Joseph when in the future we re-encounter him. Shall we recognize him, or will he be unknown to us then unless he re-enter in appearance his former lower state? That depends upon how far our spiritual eyes are open, or how nearly we are blind.

On a deathbed people are wont to be honest, and their words are apt to be treasured through succeeding generations. Dying people are going away and they have nothing to fear, to gain, or to lose by outspokenness; because of this they are apt to be unusually lucid in their delineations of the characters of those about them. Honesty impels foresight and insight, and the two are inseparable; without the one, the other cannot be. Strong points and weak points are seen together, and both must be mentioned, that the weak be strengthened and the strong rendered stronger still.

We can hardly read the whole of the frank utterance of Reuben's father to his firstborn without being appalled at the glaring contrast it presents; but Reuben is with us to-day, and we must face the modern situation, however little we know of ancient history. Reuben may come to you any moment for advice and treatment; can you give a clairvoyant examination, or what is better, an intuitive diagnosis of his case? This proud, dignified man occupies a high position in society; he is much looked up to and respected, and he deserves much praise for some of his conduct, for it is excellent; but there has lain hidden somewhere a grievous wrong —an injustice—a breach of honor, some disloyalty to a trust and that disloyalty has been the secret worm which has gnawed Reuben's vitals. How surprised his companions would be if they only suspected what they need never know, for the offense may be of a private nature and should not be mentioned beyond the confines of his home.

It is well to tell the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well, that she has had five husbands and is now living in adultery, but it must be told in a private interview, and so told that she will be led to enoble her own life and bring others to the feet of truth because of the telling of it.

Verily Jacob's couch and Jacob's well are telltale institutions; you must beware how you approach them if you do not wish your secrets to be made known. Seership holds no terrors for the virtuous, only the vicious are afraid of extended perception. Thought-reading is terrible to him or to her whose thoughts are evil, while to the man or woman whose thoughts are pure the thought reader is as a savior. Whenever thoughts are read well nigh universally, the premium so long placed on deception will be removed. Let us pray and work that Jacob's well may become universal, but then we shall be ready to die to it by passing beyond it to a nobler well which is within us. Death-beds are seats of judgment! When we are dying to old conditions and passing on to new, we judge our own past and we help others to greater self-knowledge. We must not be afraid of a revelation, for so long as we shut our eyes to causes, we cannot effectually bid effects to cease.

Simeon and Levi are brethren, "instruments of cruelty are in their habitations." Here we have mentioned a second and a third type of humanity, two types closely allied; no better and no worse than the first, but different altogether from it. Reuben sins in secret and his vices find him out openly; while two of his brothers sin in public and they suffer in silence in consequence of open transgressions. How fierce are the denunciations of the father upon the iniquities of the children, and yet he eventually pronounces his blessing over all. He does not say cursed be they, but, "cursed be their anger for it was cruel."

Warriors are not an accursed race; among them are to be found noble patriots and faithful champions of right, but warfare is itself cursed. Swords are to be melted into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks; garments are to be sold that spiritual weapons may be provided, but he who lifts his hand to slay his brother with a carnal weapon shall himself be slain. Weapons of warfare are still in your habitations, Oh, ye of the tribes of Simeon and Levi, but they need not be such weapons as guns and pistols! they may be warlike thoughts which "dig down the wall." You have undermined your constitution by thinking angrily of others; you have warred against your brethren with your tongues though not with your fists, and worst of all, you have wished to undermine them.

You have strength but you have misused it; acknowledge your strength as a blessing; use it henceforward for the good of all, but no more abuse it; such is the counsel given you by a faithful instructor.

Concerning Judah it seems that no words of praise can be too extravagant, and yet this fourth type of humanity is not faultless, though it is indeed beautiful. Judah may become intemperate, and when his "eyes become red with wine" he may be guilty of manifold indiscretions. Judah people are very kind hearted, very handsome and very capable, but they may bring trouble upon themselves through excesses, and while they are among the natural rulers of the world, and they rule through inward greatness, they will be shown wherein they have misdirected power when the time comes that they too must suffer affliction.

Zebulun, the fifth type, is given to travel across deep waters; he is of maritime disposition and loves to dwell by the seaside. Such people are liberal, broad, prosperous, enterprising and progressive; they rejoice in wide outlooks, but as it is by the water that they dwell, their danger is from the water. Zebulun may be a "haven for ships"; he is kind, considerate, liberal-minded, but he may get beyond his depth, and when he is found sinking, it is beneath the very waves which are his proper delight and the means of his promotion.

Issachar, a sixth type of humanity, is a burden bearer, and when he is at the height of power, he is like unto "a strong ass couching between two burdens." Here we have a suggestion of those who are naturally servants; they love to do those things which others would consider burdensome if not degrading. Just as it is in the animal world where some animals display characteristics which other types do not manifest, so is it in our human economy—we are so adapted to differing pursuits, that situations which would prove extremely depressing to some, are the natural habitat of others. Becoming "a servant unto tribute" does not sound attractive in an age which boasts of liberty, and in a land which shouts the praises of freedom. Possibly at this point we shall discover that while haughtiness and egotism are causes of some disorders, undue servility will be found the wellspring of equal, though widely differing, troubles in another type of persons. As the haughtiness of some people needs toning down, so does the humility of others need toning up. How wise indeed does a conselor of many need to be; how versatile in understanding should be he or she who attempts to reach helpfully great varieties of temperaments!

Reuben may call at your office in the morning, and during the afternoon of the same day you may be called upon to prescribe for Issachar. Reuben may be a proud millionaire who comes in his carriage attended by a troupe of servants, or he may summon you to his palatial home. Issachar will very likely be one of the underlings in Reuben's kitchen, or the old, tired, oppressed man who runs the elevator in Reuben's magnificent place of business. When you treat them both you must remember they are alike spiritually and physically from the same primitive source. If the same Lord is the father of their souls, the same "Jacob" is the father of their bodies. There is but one Lord and but one Jacob, in the broadest sense. When you remember this, you are not likely to be puffed up because Reuben sent for you, nor are you disposed to treat Issachar as though he were but a beast of burden. If you reach both so as to be a help to both, you must induce Reuben to be less haughty and Issachar to be less servile. The ailment of the former is probably head trouble—the difficulty with the latter is doubtless a wasting disease and general lack of vitality.

Dan, who is numbered seven, in this classification, is the most troublesome to deal with of all the sons of Jacob, for though he shall judge his people he is, while unregenerate, like a serpent in the way and an adder in the path; he biteth the horses' heels and causeth the rider to stumble and fall backward." Clearly Dan is the Scorpion of the Zodiac; his promptings are sensual, in him sex power and its lusts will reach their maximum. You must be very uncompromising with him; you must be unto him as Elisha was to Naaman —a stern prophet who orders seven bathings in Jordan, and will not tolerate continual indulgences in sensuality, nor hold out to him any hope of recovery so long as former courses are not abandoned. Dan is very prominent everywhere; a word to the wise is sufficient to suggest how he must be dealt with. The whole problem of sexual regeneration,—of conquest over the oldest of serpents who ever tempted mankind, is here suggested; and this is a case which needs firm though temperate handling. Dan, as we have formerly known him, will be no more seen or heard of when we read the names of the twelve tribes of Israel clothed in white raiment, standing before the throne of Divinity, unabashed in presence of the spotless Lamb.

Gad, the eighth type, is one who has much to overcome; but though at first he appears vanquished, he will prove a conqueror at last. Gad is sore pressed oftentimes; he has fits of "the blues" and days of despondency. Circumstances about him appear untoward in the extreme, and he believes he must succumb to his adverse fate and submit to the cruel blows of universal misfortune. The troubles of Gad are many; he is tormented with a legion of tormentors.

When you question him, or look into his affairs, you will soon discover that the whole head seems sick and the entire heart faint. You cannot enumerate all the troubles of Gad,—he is a veritable Job in his afflictions; all you can do, if you are to help him, is to assure him of final victory. Read the book of Job in the ears of Gad, and if you can interpret some of it in the light of your own experience, so much the better. Gad has met the Accuser; Satan has buffeted him and a host of perplexities are overwhelming him. You will know him directly you see him; we need not describe him further. When he comes to you, or you are summoned to his presence, let your word be one of assurance that light shall spring out of darkness, that out of apparent evil shall actual good proceed. Don't tantalize the poor fellow whatever you do; don't twit him with what you imagine to be his shortcomings; don't tell him he endures no anguish and feels no pain. You must be very sympathetic with Gad, but your sympathy must not be the mawkish sentimentality which pays atrocious "visits of condolence;" it must be stalwart, fearless, faithful and prophetic; it must point to certain victory. You must not dismiss Gad till you have made him feel convinced that though a host of difficulties have encompassed him, and he has seemingly been conquered by them, he shall overcome at the last. Your fate is in your own hands, Gad, you shall conquer your manifold oppressors and out of your trials you shall come forth as gold purified by fire.

Asher, a ninth type, finds the world for the most part going smoothly with him; he has delicacies to spare and, perhaps, "money to burn," but in spite of his general well-offness, he may be sorely afflicted at times through a surfeit of delicacies; for dainties often clog and banquets have been known to destroy the fleshly tabernacles of emperors. Asher may also be surfeited with the goods of the intellect, and though he yields "royal dainties," he does not always know how best to make use of them.

A tenth type is Napthali, an orator; an eloquent speaker whose words are goodly; he is a fine preacher, a brilliant conversationalist, but he is like "a hind let loose" and sometimes he is thrown down and wounded by his impetuosity. Napthali may lack caution; he may be too exuberant and get into trouble through that very tongue which is his glory. Indiscretions in speech often cause sorrow; so the tongue must be guarded, controlled, but not silenced.

Words fail to describe Joseph, he who is the eleventh brother, for he greatly excelleth all the rest. Jacob has given to Joseph a long-sleeved coat of many colors, and it has aroused the ire of his brethren. Joseph is the brightest, the finest, the most intelligent of all the family; you cannot readily mistake him; he is so gifted a person, so much of a genius that his very greatness attracts to him the envy and malice of those who have not risen near to his altitude. Joseph writes great books, paints glorious pictures, sings heavenly songs, speaks with silver tongued eloquence golden words of wisdom. He is a seer, a prophet, and his father knows it and looks up to him with reverence. Poor old Jacob! his gray hairs had been brought down with sorrow nigh unto the grave, because of the maltreatment his beloved Joseph had received at the hands of the other lads!

We all love Joseph if we know him; he is so wise and so handsome, but he excites, more than any brother of his, the cupidity and hatred of lesser persons, who think their smallness is due to others' greatness. Disregard for the tenth commandment, "Thou shalt not covet anything that is thy neighbor's," may lie at the root of a thousand maladies which we foolishly, blindly, and often blasphemously attribute to widely different causes. Joseph is truly great and he knows it! he has a vision and does not disguise the fact; messages come to him from heaven for his parents and his brethren, and he is indiscreet enough to tell of his dreams and not keep silent concerning his visions. Greatness is irrepressible; worth must show itself. You are but a poor hypocrite if you try to appear small when you know you are great; but greatness saves no one from persecution, therefore you need not envy Joseph, for his heart is often sore; he has a very loving nature, and his brothers smite him in his most vulnerable spot.

It cannot be hidden from Joseph that, though not the first born after the flesh, he is the highest born after the spirit. The earthly man-made law of primogeniture cannot be permitted to prevail. Estates cannot be everlastingly entailed! worth, not age, merit in place of legal claim unbacked by excellence, must and will assert itself in final triumph. Joseph may appeal to you for help and succor; he may be sometimes found in a pit or sold to Ishmaelties. Say unto Joseph that his blessings are most abundant even in what has brought him bitterest suffering, viz., separation from his brethren. Joseph as a child is often in tears; Joseph as a young man is often stung with insults, but in the heart of genius lies the seed and certain promise of completest victory, and of this, Joseph in his youth needs to be assured; in his age he will not need to be told it, for he will have abundantly proved it.

The twelfth type, Benjamin is dismissed with short comment; all that is said of him is that he resembles a wolf; he is not a character that stands out very prominently alone; wolves hunt in packs, not singly; so they are symbolical of strongly social natures which dislike solitude and are strongly convival, though not always amiable in disposition.

The twelve types stand thus in Genesis: First, Reuben; second, Simeon; third, Levi; fourth, Judah; fifth, Zebulun; sixth, Issachar; seventh, Dan; eighth, Gad; ninth, Asher; tenth, Napthali; eleventh, Joseph; twelfth, Benjamin. These are the twelve tribes of the scattered Israel (which is both Jew and Gentile) dispersed over all the world to-day. What are the meanings of these twelve names? We require to understand these various peoples, for understanding is the only cure for misunderstanding, mismating, and all other mistakes which are our diseases, the remedy for which is to be found only in understanding life aright.

Reuben signifies a son who is an evidence of God's mercy; an answer to a father's earnest petition. Simeon is one who is heard or who makes a noise in the world. Levi is the crowned one. Judah's name declares that he shall receive praise. Zebulun denotes one who provides for himself and others a habitation. Issachar signifies one given to laughter. Dan is a judge. Gad is a fortunate person. Asher has a happy disposition. Napthali is given to contest. Joseph will ever make additions. Benjamin is a son of the right hand, an executive person, not an originator.

In the 48th chapter of Ezekiel, the twelve tribes are classified on four sides of the city of Israel, the capital of the great projected commonwealth. Reuben, Judah and Levi are at the North; Joseph, Benjamin and Dan are at the East; Simeon, Issachar and Zebulun are at the South; Gad, Asher and Napthali are at the West. Here is evidently intended far more than a plan of a literal city.

The twelve tribes of Israel are clearly twelve manners of people; we are all included among them. Happy are we if we succeed in so finding ourselves and others that through the blessed ministry of divine healing (harmonizing), Science, Philosophy, Religion and Art may, like four sides of a square, exemplify on earth a state of perfect harmony, patterned after the celestial model which can be nothing short of the arrangement of angels in the upper heavens, whose perfect order will yet be made manifest on earth in an ideal social state, completely actualized, significantly foretold as the new and universal City of God, the abode of peace—New Jerusalem, the Holy City which, once established, will never pass away.

LESSON IV.

HEALING OF THE NATIONS AND REDEMPTION OF THE TRIBES.

Having considered the twelve tribes of Israel as they have been introduced to us in Genesis XLIX and Ezekiel XLVIII, we now turn to the 7th chapter of the Apocalypse, or Book of Revelation, to see how differently they appear in their new order from the manner in which they were presented in their earliest arrangement. Twelve tribes of Israel, be it remembered, signify all the distinct varieties of a "chosen people."

We need to inquire deeply into what is meant by an "elect nation," a "holy seed," and other expressions frequently encountered in Holy Scripture and elsewhere,—sayings which, though they contain a great wealth of instruction for the intelligent reader, are very frequently so misread that they become stumbling blocks and rocks of offence.

Partiality is not a divine attribute; special priviliges arbitrarily conferred on some and withheld from others, regardless of merit or demerit, can only awaken sentiments the very reverse of grateful and reverential. We dismiss, therefore, as utterly unworthy of regard, all theories of election which teach a partial God and a celestial order opposed to our highest and ever-expanding ideal of equity, which is perfect righteousness. God's ways are higher, not lower, than our ways. When we are asked to tell how we can judge as to what is high and what is low in moral order, our reply invariably is that in the course of moral awakenment, we all grow further and further away from favoritism, and nearer and nearer to a demand for rigid impartiality in all disbursements. When Whittier was challenged to defend some of his grandest utterances concerning the universality of divine goodness, the gist and essence of his stalwart reply to every critic is to be found in the following lines:

Which evil is in me."

God's will is mirrored in our human sense of righteousness, and as our mirrors grow clearer and clearer, we come to see more and more of divine order. It spoke well for President McKinley that his favorite hymn contained the words:

"But we make His love too narrow
By false limits of our own,
And we magnify His strictness
With a zeal He will not own."

It is noteworthy that those words came from the Roman Catholic priest, Faber, at a time when the harsher views of religion put forth by lesser lights, were in the ascendant, and the milder doctrines of the greater fathers of the church were being overclouded.

"Many are called but few are chosen" is a stumbling block, unless we open our eyes to its obviously practical meaning; then it becomes luminous. Joseph receives a long-sleeved coat of many colors from his father, Jacob, who has received the title of Israel. Joseph's brethren are much incensed against him and also against their father, because of this act of seeming partiality displayed by their common father toward one of the lads. Envy, jealousy and all such hideous emotions make life wretched—destroy physical tissue and are behind more diseases than perhaps all other base emotions put together.

Envy and such abominable feelings as jealous dislike of our neighbors, are all products of senseless ignorance. They all spring from a false estimate of what constitutes and what makes for success. So long as we are blind enough to believe that one's downfall promotes another's rise, such emotions will stir in our bosoms as have from time immemorial disturbed the peace of the various sons of Jacob, who were enraged against Joseph because he was more highly endowed than they.

In the regenerated state of humanity depicted in prophecy as a condition to be reached, a goal yet to be won, we find twelve tribes sealed and twelve thousand sealed out of every tribe, so no tribe yields more nor less than any other. Here is equality, and here also is variety, but inequality has vanished. Still Israel, for a time, is distinct from all the rest of humanity; but eventually the multitude, innumerable by human calculation or mortal arithmetic, shares Israel's position, and stands a larger Israel, including the smaller, before the "throne" and before the "lamb." These wonderful correspondences open to us measureless continents of spiritual territory, inviting us to explore and explore and explore, till we have at last discovered enough to afford us a plan, a perfect model, for the upbuilding of a terrestrial city in harmony with a superterrestrial design.

Pain, sickness, sorrow and death are to be finally abolished. We are not told that they came into the world on any particular day in any calendar, but simply that they came in consequence of certain inharmonious relations between members of the human family, and that they must disappear whenever the causes which gave them birth are no longer operating. "The day and the hour knoweth no man." Chronological and geographical definitions are never interpretations, but becloudings of a sacred text. Zion is wherever holiness prevails; Jerusalem is wherever peace is regnant. These two cities are to be married;

they are divinely appointed bride and bridegroom. When their nuptials have been celebrated within our human consciousness, the result of this interior wedding will appear without in all that pertains to individual and communal welfare.

People speak of divine science, spiritual science, spiritual philosophy, as though it were all a matter of abstruse theory and bewildering technicality, when the very core of it all applies immediately to everyday needs and hourly necessities. Metaphysical hobby-riders achieve few and poor results because they do not expand their ideas till they take in the universe. As we must synthesize before we can correctly analyze, so we must take a broad, deep, high comprehensive view of life ere we can intelligently apply a theory in any branch of special local practice.

If you would be a skillful oculist or aurist you must first be a general anatomist and physiologist, for you cannot understand the mechanism of eye or ear or any other organ, save as that organ is related to other organs in the organism we call the body. Leave out the brain and of what use is the eye? omit the heart and how is the ear to be supplied with blood? Local treatment is usually farcical, because based on fundamental ignorance. Take skin for example; what causes soft, healthy, beautiful skin but good, pure, wholesome blood? Absurd, then, is it not to seek to make perfect the outside of the personality except you are determined to do so as a result of first purifying the within? There is war within before there is war without; so there must be peace within ere there can be peace without. By peace we do not mean compromise, but harmony. No truer or nobler words can well be spoken than those attributed to a truly valiant hero, "We will have peace at any honorable price." Where there is no honor there is no peace, though there is often found its crafty substitute, unholy compromise.

The sword precedes the advent of the Prince of Peace. When he comes, whose right it is to reign over all the nations of the earth, the new order of peace is established for the first time in the history of the cycle. It is so with the individual also, for human experience in general is nothing other than an extension or enlargement of human experience in particular. Peacemakers are to be specially known as children of God. To as many as receive truth into their affections and thence manifest it in external conduct, is the beatitude applicable, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

It is the nature of light to shine and of salt to circulate, therefore are the words true, "Ye are the light of the world," and "Ye are the salt of the earth." Mark well the language, for in both instances the phraseology is precise and cannot be altered without defacing the original conception or changing the root idea. It is a small thing comparatively to carry a light about with you, a kindled lamp that might at any time be extinguished by a gust of wind; it is also but a small thing to carry a bag of salt with you which may soon become empty or be knocked out of your hand. To be light and to be salt is intensely significant, for that which you have may be taken from you, but that which you are is yours by right of such possession as results solely from well-earned development.

As a cycle approaches its close (one is closing even now and melting into its successor) those who are the light and the salt are drawn mysteriously together; they are attracted to each other through the subtle agency of some compelling power, or better, some impelling force, which brings into the same assembly those who are especially fitted for each other's companionship. The many apartments in the one Father's house are revealed as distinct, but not as separated, societies of souls. Distinctiveness is beautiful, but separation is the cause of all the jealousies, hatreds, and murders which have ever been committed or ever can be known on earth.

Separateness is death. Distinctiveness is revelation of that marvelous fullness or copiousness of life which inheres in the great I AM and is manifested through the countless entities, which are but expressions of the infinite eternal EGO.

We have, each one of us, all the twelve tribes in us; we even contain the number thirteen, and the still greater dual number twenty-six. There are twelve tribes, but there are twenty-four elders, for male and female must be equally expressed by every individual before the Golden Era stands disclosed . Though we have all the tribes, male and female, (twenty-four) within us, and also the Master, who is both male and female (two) making the mystical twenty-six within our own economy, each one of us will be found in a perfected social and industrial state, in a specific place, engaged in a specific work. There will be eleven tribes dormant and one active in each one of us at any time when we shall be found in the Israel state, which is the enlightened condition for all humanity.

All sorts of experiments will be tried, all sorts of nostrums will be administered through the agency of experimental sociology and political economy; all sorts of plans and projects will be discussed and stated, people will rush hither and thither to find a supposed Christ in a wilderness, on a hill-top, or in a secret chamber; but all these attempted constructions of an Ideal Commonwealth or Republic of Heaven will be vain in the sense that they will fail to accomplish what they set out to fulfill. But they will not be useless, because by means of them many people will gain a measure of experience required by them as they journey forward to a higher and far nobler realization of their hopeful dreams.

Everybody who is seeking to establish a republic of harmony on earth, will do some good and get some good, but the final ultimation of harmony will not take place till palliative measures are abandoned for radical reform. "Ye must be born anew," or you cannot be healed, though in your old state you may be cured. There is a vast difference between these two —curing and healing, a difference sadly overlooked by the majority of practitioners, regardless of whether they are dealing with the body politic or only the corporeal frame of a solitary individual who applies for mental treatment.

Though astrology, chirology and other branches of occult science are not necessary to highly intuitive natures, we always advocate their intelligent consideration at the hands of the general public; because there are two distinct ways in which they can be made helpful in rendering individuals and communities healthier and happier.

First, let us consider that indications may reveal destiny without in any way suggesting fate, for, as Mrs. Ursula Gestefeld and other able teachers affirm, fate can be conquered as destiny is made known. Destiny is to be unfolded from within through the agency of faith and industry. Fate is to be conquered by the unfolding of destiny. The term "fate" properly covers everything circumstantial or incidental which would thwart the fulfillment of our destiny, but when rightly dealt with, it constitutes a portion of that which we employ in the building of the fabric of our personality.

The twelve tribes of Israel in the Apocalypse are as distinct, each from the others, as when they first appeared in Genesis, even though they have become regenerate. They are now like unto precious gems, cut and polished and freed from all alloy. Sapphires do not lose their blue, nor rubies their red light by polishing. Emeralds are still green after the lapidary has expended his best skill upon them; so it is with the redemption of the tribes and all that this expression signifies.

In the Temple which is humanity, there are all manners of precious stones and they are enumerated to signify distinctiveness in individual work. If your light shines and you are like unto a sapphire, you will not shine with the particular glow which would be yours had you resembled an amethyst; but you are all equally precious in the sight of the wise, though the foolish will esteem some of you highly and treat others with disdain.

to-day, say there is no science of healing of the nations or of indivduals, because they have not as yet discovered the science of health. Honest you may be and yet ignorant of science, as you may be a good man and yet not know how to solve a simple mathematical problem; furthermore, there may be some problems which you can solve now and others which you cannot solve yet, but all are soluble, and not only soluble per se, but by yourself individually, as you grow into a knowledge of how to solve them.

Division of work is orderly, therefore ideal society is divided into groups, but not into factions. There ought to be only one church and one political party; but there will surely be a number of churches and parties until wisdom is sufficiently revealed to unite the sundered, heal breaches and abolish dissentions of every kind through understanding of fundamental unity.

Extraneous authority belongs to an early stage of human growth. Paternalism antedates fraternalism in the evolution of governmental order. So long as a few are enlightened, it is but right that the enlightened few should rule, and it will be so in spite of all your protests, for rulers rule from the same cause that cream rises to the top of the milkpail.

Hereditary rulership is a farce. Put a weak man on the throne and a strong woman will be the ruler and he the figure-head. Place a weak woman in the place of authority and a strong man will hold the reins of government behind her, and though the people see her figure, they feel his hand of iron. Let a strong man and woman occupy a place of influence together and, as in the case of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, a joint exercise of authority is felt for the good of the whole community. Weakness always betrays itself in fault finding, while strength is ever self-reliant.

Strong people need capable assistants and they get them, for they have the organizing power which first attracts, and then firmly holds what it has attracted. Great individuals know their own place and keep it; they are consequently never fussy, intrusive or meddlesome. They have neither time nor inclination for gossip, nor are they cast down nor rendered unhappy by the misery and sin around them. They are above sin; they overcome sorrow; being lights they shine into darkness and darkness exists no more; being salt they enter into tainted places and preserve the social fabric from decay. Far too active are they in the accomplishment of good work to spend much time or many tears in bemoaning iniquities. A Master weeps before the resurrection but never after it.

Ascension and glorification represent states beyond tears. Tears there cannot be save in those conditions of humiliation where the soul is for a while perplexed and bewildered and has not yet finished its victory over all that is meant by Golgotha and Calvary. There are tears on Olivet, but none on Tabor. Transfiguration is too bright to allow of sadness; thus when a life is seen transfigured, its glory is so dazzling that those who have not yet come to know the meaning of transfiguration are smitten down with wonder, so amazed are they at beholding not only another's glory, but a forecast of their own

The twelve tribes in the Apocalypse have come up out of great tribulation (a word derived from the latin tirbula, a thistle), or as the passage is otherwise translatable, "out of continual friction," a process of long time irritation. How strangely are we reminded everywhere of the career of Job; we meet that ancient worthy at every turn and we find that he is us and we are he. Where are you in the book of Job? (you are going through it and you are somewhere in it) is always a very pertinent enquiry.

Divine Science and Spiritual Philosophy are expressions; what do they mean? Divine Science is knowledge of how to live! It is biology, anthropology, psychology and theology all rolled into one. The theologian would study God outside of Man; then he needs a Henry Ward Beecher to tell him that his creed probably begins at the wrong end; he must be an anthropologist or anthropologian, he must know Man before he can know Deity. Some physiologists ignore the psychic body, and some psychologists ignore the flesh. Small fractionists, every one of them! Good meaning people, doubtless, and by no means altogether useless, provided some larger fractionist (lacking integrality) can select the pieces of the various cults and weave them into a beautiful mosaic.

The Pentateuch is still a mosaic, even though "higher critics" should declare that no man named Moses ever wrote any portion of it. In their unillumined state, the twelve sons of Jacob are envious and contentious, and in their unregenerate degree the twelve specially chosen disciples of Jesus are rivalrous. There is a strife among them as to which shall be considered greatest, but so idiotic is the strifeful temper that the mother of the two sons of Zebedee positively requested the Master (though she would be horrified had she understood the import of her words) that one of her sons should be numbered among the goats on the left, and the other among the sheep on the right hand of the Judge of all mankind. It is only ignorance that asks favors in such a way as to implore that one son should sit on the right side and the other son on the left side of a monarch; for the two sides of an earthly monarch are unequal—the right hand ranking higher than the left.

In the celestial state there are no better and no poorer positions. The heavenly state is a condition of harmony, wherein all are fellow-workers; and but one spirit breathes through all, though there are diversities of gifts, all good gifts are equal. Health and harmony are everywhere inseparable. You are a healer exactly in so far as you are a harmonizer, and not a fraction of an inch further, and you are a harmonizer exactly to the extent that you are a comprehensionist and not the least step further.

You must then, if you would heal, study individual peculiarities and eccentricities, not to blame them or eradicate them, but to point to the highest use of all of them. Let there be no shadow of a mistake here; vices are not peculiarities, diseases are not eccentricities, therefore they may not be included in the list of normal differentiations. The cabbage differs from the cauliflower, but the worm in either is a blight. There must be no mildew on any character, no canker eating into any type of servant or service, as you are wise to perceive differences, you will be bold to rebuke iniquities.

All types are redeemable, but in the regeneration the ass remains an ass, but it has become white, and the horse remaining a horse has become white also. There are four horses mentioned in the book of Revelations, but only the white horse is worthy to afford a seat for the Son of God. In the order of evolution the ass is redeemed first and the horse later, but both are finally regenerated. We can accomplish larger works and subdue stronger appetites only after we have done lesser things and controlled feebler appetites.

In the external or manifest order of the universe, there must be an ingathering of tribes, one by one, till at length all are gathered; for some are elder and some are younger brethren, but no brother is a brother's superior, all are equal. The enumeration of the twelve tribes in the 7th chapter of Revelations is as follows: 1, Judah; 2, Reuben; 3, Gad; 4, Asher; 5, Nepthalim; 6, Mannasses; 7, Simeon; 8, Levi; 9, Issachar; 10, Zebulun; 11, Joseph; 12, Benjamin. Mannasses is the new name for the twelfth tribe now that Dan has departed. There is a great secret in all this, and that secret is the secret of regeneration, even the redemption of the serpent and the restoration of Satan to the state of Lucifer.

Man falls through sensuality, but through transmuted sensuality he rises. Millions of addresses will be given and thousands of books will be written during the next few years on this very question. It cannot be balked or dodged, for the heart of health is in it, and the understanding thereof is the restoration of the "lost word" of the Master, which will heal universally when spoken with faith and understanding of its mighty import.

Regeneration must be complete even to the transformation of Dan into Mannasses, of Judas Iscariot into Matthias, of Satan into Lucifer. Verily there is no evil in reality, but so long as discord exists evil will be present with us in appearance. Redemption is a new thing; the plan of it is to us a novelty. The scheme of salvation is a geometrical design; the plan of redemption is as a sum in mathematics. The example is set by the exampler, but each individual soul must work out its own self-contained salvation. Dispute no longer over the mystery of atonement, for it is now being clearly revealed to all who have eyes to behold and ears to hearken to the unveiling of an age-long mystery.

There must be demonstrative teaching of truth and there must be also dissemination of good through the agency of living influence. "How is it that ye do not understand" are words yet addressible to multitudes who claim to be teachers—not merely disciples in the school of truth. No intelligent observer can fail to see that, though there are myriads of smaller ways, there are but two really great methods through which humanity can be brought to a knowledge of the Law of Life. One of these methods appeals to understanding, the other to affection. One without the other will not work, because we are dual and our needs are correspondingly dual. We act through our intellects, but from our wills, consequently the love of right precedes right action, but the latter invariably follows close upon the former.

The mistake made by so many practitioners of something they elect to call divine, spiritual or mental healing is, that they look for the correspondences of disorder; and how can it be possible to find the cause of health in the dustbin of disease. It is as reasonable to analyze foul sputum swarming with baccili, expecting to discover therein the remedy for tuberculosis or any other affliction of the lungs or chest, as to hunt amid the symptoms of disorder for the antidote to disease. Because we have transferred a false method from the objective or physical plane of action, does not render the search any less barren of desired result.

As many people are more familiar with astrological than with Israelitish terminology, we will mention ere we close this lesson the twelve kinds of people according to the Zodiacal classification in consecutive order as they are usually given:

First—Aries, the head. Special aptitude for headwork—liability to disease being found always in the region where sensitiveness and susceptibility are greatest, head trouble is brought on in this type of person whenever undue excitement is permitted or disturbance of any mental variety occurs.

Second—Taurus, the neck. Executive ability is the general aptitude of this sign. Throat more easily affected than rest of body

Third—Gemini, shoulders, arms and hands. Chief characteristics; manual dexterity and versatility. Parts of the body indicated by the sign weakest or strongest, according to use or abuse of those organs.

Fourth—Cancer, the breast. Inclined to secret, silent, motherly occupation; conservative in temperament and apt to slowness in motion. Region of the breast most sensitive section of the organism.

Fifth—Leo, the heart. Strong love nature; emotional, adapted to reach the many or the few through geniality and sympathy. The literal heart in persons possessing such a temprament acts very quickly and is more easily thrown out of gear by excitement than any other organ.

Sixth—Virgo, the solar plexus. A synthetic and rational type of mind given to delight in things of the understanding more than in sentiments of the heart. Such natures have intellectual perplexities and for them rational mind cure is the only cure.

Seventh—Libra, the hips. Chief disposition is direction of analyzing, weighing and measuring all things. When such people have become disturbed, equilibrium is most readily restored by looking at both sides of a subject, presenting contrasts and showing unity where there cannot be uniformity.

Eighth—Scorpio, the reproductive system. Highly nervous and active temperament, given to passing judgment quickly; standing more in need of caution than any other variety of mankind.

Ninth—Sagittarius, the thighs. Directness of aim and general decisiveness is the strength of this division of humanity; its weakness consists in liability to push ahead onesself regardless of the rights of others.

Tenth—Capricorn, the knees. Persevering, climbing; of ambitious nature, needing to transmute personal ambition into universal aspiration. Such people easily bend, but never break; they are natural burden bearers; their chief weakness is a too materialistic tendency.

Eleventh—Aquarius, the ankles. Capable of affording support to others; not so originative as disseminative; inclined to teach and to water the sown seed; chief liability to disorder through sense of cheerlessness and lack of appreciation of their own and others' efforts.

Twelfth—Pisces, the feet. Adapted by nature for the seemingly lowest services of life; capable of glorifying small activities and doing final things well. Chief tendency to disorder arises through fussiness and careful anxiety concerning petty details. Such people need to see through their actual work (which is often small) to the ideal which it is serving to externalize in an often humdrum, monotonous, and enigmatical manner.

You will find all these varieties of people among your patients. Remember they are all good, useful, necessary, all equally so, but they need special words adapted to their particular functionings. The work of the wise teacher is always to discriminate and adapt the word of universal truth when dealing with an individual, to the specific needs of that individual, hence the particular value of private and personal, in addition to public and general ministrations.

LESSON V.

ENIGMAS CONFRONTED IN HEALING.

Though we can often very clearly trace the connection between an outward condition and its inward producing cause, there are many cases frequently presented to our notice where it seems incredible that any correspondence whatever can exist between the phase of disorder afflicting a chronic invalid and the mental disposition of the afflicted person. A frequent example is that supplied in cases of gout, rheumatism, stiff joints, etc., which are commonly attributed to stubborness and selfishness. "They are a stiff-necked and rebellious people" is a very old complaint made concerning Israel by Israel's greatest seers and prophets. Doubtless the originating cause of such ailments as these just enumerated, and many others of similar nature, is rightly defined as stubborn obstinacy and undue self-seeking in thought, if not in action; still there are many occasions when we meet with apparent contradictions of this general rule—contradictions so flagrant that we feel almost tempted to quote the old fallacy, "Exceptions prove the rule," and offer it in explanation of what is seemingly otherwise inexplicable.

Such a subterfuge, however, is thoroughly unscientific; for we know there are no exceptions to the rule in mathematics, and unless our metaphysics are in strict accord with mathematical reasoning, we are in a sorry plight; it will not therefore do to plead exceptions to the rule, for a true rule is undeviating. Another explanation offers itself which is far more worthy of sober consideration, viz., hereditary tendency; and still another yet worthier of our regard, viz., present susceptibility to surrounding influences.

Mrs. Gestefeld in her admirable book, "How We Master Our Fate," has a chapter on "The Power and the Powerlessness of Heredity," in which it is clearly shown, that on the sense plane of our existence, heredity holds us till we have overcome hereditary tendencies. The word tendency is a correct one, for there are no hereditary virtues, vices or diseases, but only tendency or bias toward a particular expression of strength or weakness in a given direction can be inherited. This inheritance is vanquishable; nothing being invincible except the divinity within us which is sure to assert itself triumphantly at some time, somewhere. Hereditary dispositions are seemingly unconquerable in many instances, because no effort is put forth to conquer them; it seems indeed that inherited weaknesses are tacitly admitted to hold sway, and the plea is made for them that they are inheritances, therefore we must give in to them, no matter how we may detest them or how earnestly we may long to be delivered from the burden of them.

Mistakes of the most radical and wide-reaching character are made in connection with heredity, which is only "original sin" in a pseudo-scientific instead of a would-be religious dress. Inheritances can be thrown away! Because you have inherited property does not mean that you cannot get rid of it. If property has been left to you you are responsible for what you do with it, but you need not allow it to do anything with you. Here we come to revoking the inheritance,—cutting off the entail,—attaining to the commencement of the regenerate state,—breaking with our past and letting the dead past bury its dead.

Do not deny the fact of mortal heredity when conversing with patients who are suffering through bondage to it, but explain to them the way of escape It bewilders people most unnecessarily to deny the existence of what is, to them, self-evident, but no conversation is so helpful as an encouraging talk which shows a way out of the mire on to solid rock. When a special weakness oppresses the unselfish child of a selfish parent, remember that the son need not continue to bear affliction in consequence of the father's iniquity. Show as clearly as you possibly can how conditions are subjectively perpetuated and objectively revealed; and then at once proceed to apply your statements to the case immediately in hand.

Reason somewhat thus: Your mother may have been obstinate and unyielding to conviction, a very trying person in many ways, but you have seen from early childhood the error of that way, so that instead of walking in her footsteps, so far as they were erroneous, you have resolved to be gentle, patient, considerate of others and generally unselfish. Your affliction springs from not having broken loose from the subjective family bondage in which you are held. You have never freed yourself; you have not yet severed the cord which still binds you to your unhappy ancestry. You must free yourself, but a healer can help you to do it.

Here comes in the most vital gist and application of the law of healing science; and there is a healing science, not merely an art of healing, though in their ignorance of the law whereby healing is rendered scientific, many practitioners stop short with a half demonstrable theory.

In conquering hereditary tendencies it is absolutely necessary to affirm your own power over what would continue to exercise sway in your organism did you not rise above it. Hereditary tendencies work secretly in many places where we least think of them as residing, and because of their deeply veiled character they render manifest conditions enigmatical, but not therefore insuperable. Our present access to the boundless reservoir of divine strength must be confidently and persistently affirmed till the limitations of ancestry drop away one by one, till at length they have all departed. But always remember they are not going to depart because you tell them to go; on the contrary, the more you think of them the more vigorous they are likely to become. Denials of the common sort resemble shaving off of hair, which certainly is not its eradication, for everybody knows that the more frequently a beard or mustache is shaved off, the stronger the roots appear to become; therefore shaving is often recommended for increasing the vigor of the hair.

As natural law is the same on all planes and in all varieties of expression, disagreeable tendencies are aggravated and intensified in consequence of the attention called to them by mistaken formulas for treatment. "Whatsoever things are excellent and of good repute, think on these things," is indeed a wise counsel, and we need not longer wonder at the seemingly miraculous cures effected by Paul and his brother apostles in the first Christian century, as compared with the meagre results attending the practice of so many practitioners of a later day, when we consider the great insight into law displayed by the few really great healers of olden days, an insight which stands forth in glowing conspicuousness in such magnificent sentences as the one just quoted.

There is nothing excellent and nothing of good repute in asthma, catarrh and a host of other abominable ailments, with which no one would ever be afflicted if we did but learn and practice a correct system of breathing.

A wise healer might reason as follows: "I do not pronounce you free from bronchitis or any other malady when I give you a scientific treatment, for I never allow myself to dwell on a word which expresses an idea of which I desire to rid you. I know enough of the law of correspondences to turn the tables on the enemy by employing suggestion in such a way as to suggest to you that you can and do breathe freely and perfectly. I declare to you that your entire vocal anatomy is perfect." Exactly at this point comes in the necessity for enforcing the often neglected fact, that when one who is treating another suggests to that other that he should breathe correctly, the two must breathe together who formerly breathed widely apart.

Whenever a company of musicians breathe together, they play far more correctly than when they fail thus to harmonize in breath. The patient does not inhale the healer's breath, nor does the healer inhale the patient's breath, which would be far worse; but the healer suggests to the patient that they shall breathe together, and as the healer is already breathing in a far more wholesome and scientific manner than is the patient, it begins to come to pass that the invalid breathes away his invalided condition through commencing to inhale and exhale scientifically, i. e., in harmony with universal order.

Some cases are harder to deal with and take longer time to cure than others, not because the type of disease is any more serious in those cases than in others, but because of the leech-like tenacity with which many people clutch beliefs which they have inherited and of which they are personally unconscious. Unconsciousness of this sort is simply thoughtlessness.

It is surprising how much we take for granted, or as a matter of course, which we should never think of accepting as reasonable or true were it proposed to us as a new suggestion. New suggestions which are destined to take the place of old fallacious mental substrata must appeal directly to reason in the clearest and most convincing manner. New thoughts compel attention! new ideas command either respect or opposition; they never pass unchallenged. No preacher, lecturer, or author ever gives a new idea to the world but he challenges attention which is friendly or unfriendly according to the nature of the idea presented, and the temper of the people to whom it is presented. Chronic invalids and all people suffering from hereditary distemper are sorely in need of new thoughts; and if they are shocked and enraged at first, we should never be alarmed or disturbed, because excitement follows a stirring appeal to dormant consciousness.

Hereditary leanings show forth in the most trifling as well as in the more important groups of habits, and it is often difficult at first to trace any connection between so simple a habit as the obvious one of concession to prevailing customs and the deep seated weakness which is holding a victim in chains who might otherwise be free from all fetters. Some people have inherited a belief that they can eat only certain kinds of food; that they must rise at a certain hour, say seven o'clock every morning, and that they must be in bed at ten or eleven, or some other definitely prescribed hour, otherwise they will lose their "beauty sleep" or something else vainly imagined by people who are in total ignorance of the law of thought expression. Now these errors would be hardly worth challenging and refuting were it not for the fact that they cause untold misery to many honorable persons who, because they entertain them, are bound by them.

A night clerk at a hotel, a printer, reporter, night editor or some other person obliged to be up all night and who must therefore sleep during the day, need not be ill or any less well than his neighbor who works by day and sleeps by night. But many people will naturally enough enquire, are there not fit times for active exercise and legitimate periods for repose? Certainly there are; but different people engaged in varying occupations can be equally healthy provided they conform their thoughts to the activities in which they are engaged; and further do we contend that if one kind of work and place is really better suited to some special individual than another would be, there is force or potency enough in well sustained silent affirmation to bring about the identical change in outward circumstances, which will render such most desirable from the standpoint of that particular individual.

Heredity is greatly over estimated. It is a sign of the highest culture of the present age to largely discountenance belief in it and turn toward the more liberal and wiser philosophy now happily increasing in vogue—of maintaining the right of the individual to choose his own career regardless of the position supplied by forefathers. Such hereditary names as Baker, Miller, Taylor and many others, prove that we have well-nigh outgrown that servility to heredity which formerly reigned almost supreme in every part of Europe and which still prevails in some sections of the East. We are introduced to a Mr. Brewer and then to a Mr. Butcher and we find that one is a clergyman and the other a district attorney, and we express no astonishment at the incongruity; but had we lived two or three hundred years ago, we should have met with no Bakers except their occupation justified their title, and we should have taken it almost as a matter of course, that the son should follow commercially, as well as otherwise, in the footsteps of his father.

If there were really such a law of heredity as many affect to believe in, we should certainly see its operation exactly where we do not find it. Strongly individualized children are very apt to grow up so extremely unlike their parents and all their near relatives, that it is difficult to believe that they do indeed belong to the family into which they were born.

No theosophical tenet of reincarnation, or of the effects of Karma accumulated in a previous existence, is anything like so dumbfounding as the conventional belief in heredity, which voices itself in the stale platitude, "Like father, like son." A much wiser proverb reads, "The boy is father of the man;" this latter may be accepted and acted upon, as it affords a spur to exertion in youth under conviction that manhood will reveal the good results of noble preparation for maturity.

What passes for heredity in many cases is only the outcome of multiplied suggestions which take very great hold upon sensitive dispositions, though less susceptible natures are often but little affected by them. Here comes in a good word for "unruly" children, many of whom are only protesting instinctively against the unwisdom of blinded parents who are too bigoted, ignorant or domineering to respect the right of a child to individual expression. The most rebellious child in many a family is by far the healthiest and grows up the finest, most useful and successful man or woman. Why is this the case? We do not place a premium on rebelliousness, but we do maintain that when a system of training is anti-educational,—its effect being to repress instead of to unfold,—healthy children are neither naughty or lacking in natural affection, because they honor their native instinct of self-protection and try to show their elders the mistake they are making in trying to force children into unnatural grooves.

Selfishness frequently revenges itself upon the unselfish, provided these latter are weak and unresisting; and here comes a much needed solution of many of our hardest problems. Selfish people exact services from the unselfish, which the unselfish have no right to render, and in the rendering of which equity is outraged, and no one can outrage equity without having to pay the penalty, even to the uttermost farthing. Society is benefited, the progress of the human race is assisted by justice and benevolence, therefore universal law or order, which ever makes steadily for righteousness, necessarily opposes all weak truckling to error, and instead of rewarding the knock-kneed sycophant who bows to tyranny and practices self-abnegation, this uncompromising law deals its heaviest blows on the poor, weak, trembling creatures who are ever ready to immolate themselves upon the altar of unrighteous concession to injustice.

Now we have a clue to the origin of the selfishness expressed in unselfish Aunt Jemima's rheumatism, and self-sacrificing Sister Lucretia's stiff neck and unbendable finger joints. You dear, misguided women, are reaping what you have encouraged others to sow, and though your intentions were excellent, your judgment was lamentably at fault. You must remember in future that the selfishness you are catering to in your brother Tom or your niece Jane is quite as detrimental to the welfare of the social fabric as though you practiced it yourself. Remember, we implore you, that whoever assists another to develop any trait on encourage any tendency, is held responsible therefor, even as though he were himself the active, actual culprit.

Correspondences are not so difficult to trace when this torchlight blazes the path of their discovery. In examining any case that may come under your immediate notice and demand attention from you, it is always essential that you should carefully discriminate between embodied and reflected conditions. Because so little of this needed discrimination is commonly employed, much confusion obtains concerning the slow development of the process of healing in one case and the almost instantaneous relief effected in another, even when two cases are apparently of equal long standing and gravity, and equally faithful treatment is given in both instances.

Swedenborg has wisely told all who will listen to him that thought gives presence, but only love brings conjunction. Were people to discriminate closely between these two important words, presence and conjunction, they would see daylight where darkness now reigns. The presence of a disorder, as to its symptoms, is often due exclusively to one's participation in the thought of another, and we all know how many people in these nervous times are intensely susceptible to each other's mental state and physical conditions also. Epidemics spread through the contagion of sympathy even where there is no conscious fear and where there is no other predisposition to attack, save the very prevalent one of yielding to the thoughts and beliefs and adopting the practices of one's neighbors unreasonably.

If people are conjoined in a state of discord, i. e., if they are in the affection of an inharmony, they cannot possibly be substantially benefited unless or until they are emancipated from the clutch of that misguided affection. Positive, moral, educational work needs to be done in such instances, but in the other group of cases referred to, where only reflected conditions are present, an emancipating word is all that needs to be spoken, and provided it is spoken it matters very little, if at all, how it is spoken, whether silently or aloud, or first aloud and then silently, or vice versa. Any reader of the foregoing pages who is disposed to give careful thought and earnest attention to the work of healing, will quickly be able to make use of the hints already given, but to emphasize the leading points as forcibly as possible, we shall throw the remainder of this lesson into the form of a brief catechism which will be found extremely convenient for ready reference.

The following questions are in susbtance such as are most frequently put by earnest students inquiring along this particular line of study. The answers are in substance replies which have given much help to many questioners who have found themselves able to practically apply the suggestions therein contained.

(Q.) Do you teach that separate phases of disorder, such as gout, rheumatism, sore throat, etc., proceed from some definite state of mental confusion or inharmony, and that there is a specific formula (if we only knew it) for the eradication of each distinct variety of disorder?

(A.) Such a conclusion is warranted by research and observation, but only so far as the first cause or origin of such distempers is concerned. Very often the first cause of the disorder is far back of the person now suffering from it; therefore, though you are always right in giving affirmative treatments declaring the reality of the exact opposite of the manifest distemper, you are not just to your patient if you universally insist that one who is now afflicted in a special manner, has brought that particular affliction upon himself by indulgence in the error of which the disease is a phenomenal outpicturing.

(Q.) But if what you have just declared is true, how do you account for the presence of a disorder in a person who has not begotten it from his own thought? how did he contract it,—from others?

(A.) Yes, and through weak susceptibility to their erroneous states of thought and action. The question becomes quite pathetic at this point, and still more so as we follow it to its logical conclusion; for having to face facts we are compelled to admit that persons who abhor sensuality are often victimized by what they detest, and persons whose own dispositions are toward temperance in all things are vic-

(Q.) But are not many cases, according to this view, hopeless? how, for instance, can a wife, husband, child, or parent fail to be deeply concerned over the wrong doing of so near and well beloved a relative? Do you advocate callous indifference to those around us? is unconcern for others the only way of salvation for ourselves?

(A.) We do not advocate callousness or indifferentism, but we do insist that there is a far higher way of dealing with people who are engulfed in error than the method usually adopted, which is to try and deal with the error. Correct practice deals with the individual whom the error has temporarily overcome, in order that he may rise to a sense of his own innate nobility and voluntarily arise out of subserviency to lower desires to mastery over every lust or appetite which wars against the soul. You must heal yourself in so far as this, that you are no longer afflicted as you once were by the degradation of those about you, for not until you can truthfully say, "None of these things move me," will you be able to help others to move the things out of their path which are now moving them in wrong directions. Master and servant to the same thing at the same time we cannot be. It stands to reason that if you are being mastered by the errors with which you are surrounded, you are one of the victims of those errors. While you remain a victim, you cannot effectually pose as a conqueror, however brave the words may be which fall from your tongue, for they do not express the feelings of your inner nature.

(Q.) But what are people to do when they are forced by circumstances to live in an atmosphere of perpetual discord, and are even bound to associate in the most intimate manner with persons whose lives are impure?

(A.) It is necessary to teach that the only inevitable circumstance which surrounds anybody is his own occult atmosphere or aura, and when this affords protection, he is safe no matter where he may be. The entire question of susceptibility and non-susceptibility is wrapped up in the open doctrine of theosophy. The neophyte who becomes a hierophant, becomes such exactly in proportion as he learns how to gain control over his personal emanations. A MASTER is one who has built for himself a wall of protection around his personality which shuts out all intruders. Whilst you are building your wall, you are of course less capable of resistance to adverse conditions than after you have fully constructed it, but if anyone sets to work in real earnest to build this psychic parapet, he is sure to eventually succeed. Success is always gradually obtained, but it is promoted by taking note of even the smallest victories and refusing to dwell upon even the largest defeats. Victories are real. Defeats are simply negative expressions, showing that triumphs though winable are not yet won. To give in to the thought that you must submit to anything, hinders progress and hampers growth, while to determinately affirm that the mastery is in your own power, and that you can and will rise superior to every limitation, is the sure road to final victory.

(Q.) But granting all you say concerning our own protection, how are we, on such terms, to help our brethren on to higher levels of attainment? Are we to selfishly protect ourselves and leave those nearest and dearest to us to suffer the direful consequences of their transgressions?

(A.) There are two ways only whereby we can truly help others; one is by silent influence, the other by good example, and in both these ways shall we prove inestimably useful to those around us, so soon as we have conquered our weakness which cannot uplift others and certainly does depress us. When you are strong in your own might, you are a tower of strength to those about you, for virtue goes forth from you, and as people who are easily led astray are highly susceptible, your quiet, persuasive influence in their vicinity causes them to feel a leading or prompting in a new and higher direction. Just as temptations to wrong doing are silent and insidious in many instances,—and the silent foe entraps the victim unawares by stealth,—so are temptations to righteousness stealthy and insidious also. As evil thoughts are insinuated, so are good thoughts insinuated through the medium of a common communicating atmosphere. Remember that the tremulous ether all about us is the unseen medium by means of which all conceivable varieties of mental impressions are conveyed from place to place, and it depends upon what you give the breezes to bear, as to what freight they will carry for you.

Then as to oral suggestion, outward example, and all that pertains to the objective theatre of existence, no good ever comes from raging or weeping, or as people say, "carrying on" and showing that you are "feeling badly." Strength, not weakness, imperviousness, not a state that succumbs, furnishes healing pabulum; therefore the words "heal thyself" and "when thou art converted strengthen thy brethren" call for much wider and wiser commentary than they usually receive. It is weakness and weakness only, in nine case out of every ten, that is the cause of seemingly unmerited suffering; therefore the "sinful" theory of the origin of disease needs modification, or at least explanation, for though true at root, it is very often pitiably misapplied, and misapplication may do a cruel wrong to a tender sensitive nature. Discrimination sees the distinction between grieving over another's sin and thereby getting some of the effect of it yourself through dwelling upon it, and indulging in your own mind the error you condemn in another; also between living a selfish life for purposes of personal gratification, and a protest against weak yielding to the exactions of others and allowing yourself to become particeps criminis in their offence.

(Q). But does it not seem hard and unfair that we should be punished for the sins of others, especially when we are self-denying enough to forego our own pleasure for others' happiness?

(A.) Just at that point the world makes the greatest of all its mistakes and falls into the most grievous of all its errors. The truth concerning this matter, hard though it may sound to unaccustomed ears, is that we richly deserve to pay in our own persons part of the penalty which inevitably falls upon those who are our partners in guilt; for we cannot be guiltless when we encourage wrong in those about us. Truly we are not their judges, but we are our own; therefore, though we have no right to condemn them for doing what they may not see to be wrong, we are culpable the very instant we participate in and minister to their blunders. The idle girl who wastes her time in the parlor while her mother is slaving in the kitchen ought not to be encouraged in such shameful indolence, and it is fully as much, if not more, the fault of the silly parent than of the stupid girl that the latter is in such an immoral condition of dependence upon the toil of another. Those who encourage wrongs are themselves wrongdoers, and though you are not called upon to condemn your neighbors because their standards of morality differ from your own, you cannot be other than negligent and crime-fostering if you yield to unrighteous demands upon your own time and energy. Fearlessness is absolutely essential to health and all high ethical attainment.

LESSON VI.

OUR BODIES, WHAT ARE THEY? HOW SHALL WE DEAL WITH THEM?

The general impression among those who are just beginning to look into any phase of mental healing, is that the physical body is sometimes in need of special treatment, and that in order to remove ailments which are manifested by means of it we must do something to the body in the way of directly treating it.

Such a position is utterly unsound and illogical from any metaphysical point of view, because it introduces into mental practice methods which rightly belong only in the field of physical medicine. We do not discountenance the honest efforts of the medical profession, because doctors of materia medica administer potions and powders in a physical manner which is consistent with their avowed claim that it is the physical structure which needs to be dealt with, and according to their theory, the disease which needs overcoming is lodged there.

Mental healers, to be consistent, must take the opposite stand and declare that men and women, themselves, not their physical shapes, need treatment, consequently I give you a treatment or you give me a treatment, but I do not treat your physical body nor do you treat mine, if we are truly and intelligently engaged in the work of mental treatment.

A great deal of the opposition to mental suggestion with healing intent, which has long prevailed, and (though in far less degree than formerly) still prevails in the popular mind, is due to the fact that mental therapeutists themselves have not made sufficiently clear statements as to the nature of the work they are seeking to perform.

When some demurrer rises to object to my treating his physical body with my thought, what can I say to him? I answer that I should never attempt to do anything of the sort, but that were he to apply to me for a mental treatment and I saw fit to respond to his request and give him one to the best of my ability, I should treat him to a lesson in the exercise of self-control over his body.

Self-ownership is very imperfectly admitted and very poorly comprehended, most people seeming to think that all power is delegated to somebody or something other than themselves, and that they get all the benefits they receive through the action of external agencies, therefore if they are to recover or improve some outside agent must work on their behalf. This undeveloped theory of substitution is an error from the start and needs the most complete refutation ere we can reasonably hope to see rising up around us a new and healthier race of humanity. My body is my property, and your body is yours, therefore you have no right to run my organism for me nor have I any right to run yours for you.

When one is suffering from physical decreptitude it is an evidence that his psychic force does not sufficiently permeate his physical frame. The sleeping soul needs awakening out of sleep. The call must be made to the dormant energy of the sleeper. Longfellow must have keenly realized this when he wrote those memorable words:

> "For the soul is dead that slumbers,
> And things are not what they seem."

This sleeping psyche is in a deathlike trance and needs to be awakened out of sleep. "The soul that sinneth it shall die," is to many readers and commentators one of the most difficult passages in the entire Bible, but it is not difficult at all when we take the hint from Columbia's representative bard and meditate upon the philosophy embodied in his "Psalm of Life."

The poet far oftener than the scholastic theologian throws light on dark sayings and mysterious parables, for the poet is apt to be a seer and seers are prophets. Prophets have the gift of interior discernment, and discernment is insight which peers below the veil of the temporary letter and discloses the immortal spirit of all true teaching. The sleeping psyche is a "dead" or "lost" soul, but death and loss are only appearances; there are no real losses and no genuine deaths in the universe. Read thoughtfully Whittier's poem "A Lost Soul" and remember Edna Lyall's definition of lost—not yet found.

When we realize that all disorders mapped out in the physical body are simply registrations of inward states, we shall see that to arouse is to heal, and that there can be no healing where there is no arousing of dormant consciousness to intelligent activity. To vivify and to revive will stand correctly as descriptive of the two distinct portions of the work needed to be done. My physical organism has no power to say or do anything. I who own it must operate it, and if I am too ignorant or thoughtless to operate it aright I need lessons in the proper management of the machinery I hold in charge.

Healers who are not teachers are very shallow benefactors if benefactors they be, for they do but stave off a crisis which is sure to come sooner or later. As to those intellectually lazy people who want to get well and yet remain utterly ignorant of the science of health, can we be conscientious or sincere if we cater to their false wants, and go on encouraging them in their pet delusion that they are in no wise to blame for their sicknesses, while they go on believing that their ailments are all due to some force over which they can exercise no control but which controls them most effectually?

We must face the issue boldly and meet the adversary of false belief in hand to hand encounter wherever we discover it, but let no one say that this course of action means resistance to error by the employment of another kind of error. Such a doctrine is pernicious in the extreme and cannot be made to harmonize with any correct view of healing ministries. Truth and falsehood are contradictories; the one extinguishes the other, for they cannot possibly occupy the same ground together, their very natures being diametrically opposed, the one being the child of light, the other a creature of darkness. Let in light and darkness is no more. There never was any such entity as darkness, as there never was any such entity as weakness or poverty or any other negation which is but a name given to a nonentity.

It ought not to be difficult for any rational child to understand the basic principle of mental healing, for it is quite as simple as A B C and its very simplicity makes it peculiarly acceptable to the unsophisticated child-consciousness from which there is no mass of established false belief or strongly intrenched error to be removed.

A child may complain of weakness which only means lack of strength, and directly a child does thus complain he is ready to receive not only a mental treatment but a practical lesson in self-healing which is only self-training, self-enlargement, self-improvement, self-elevation or whatever else of that sort you choose to call it. Weakness is manifested in the physical organism, but weakness is an evident lack of conscious spiritual strength, and how shall we seek to arouse this weakling to a sense of power if not by an orderly course of suggestive treatment? Suggestions even though sometimes called hypnotic, are by no means necessarily connected either with natural or artificial sleep, therefore the word hypnotism (from the Greek hypnos, sleep) is not always a well-advised word. It is, however, very often used by people who are satisfied with simple suggestive treatment, but do not insist that sleep should be induced during treatment, though it must be confessed that natural sleep is not only a great aid to recovery of temporarily lost energy, but is a gateway through which much knowledge can flow subjectively for subsequent objective externalization.

Sleep of the physical organism is often wakefulness of the soul, while sleep of the soul is contemporary with intense bodily wakefulness. There are two sides to every one of us, an outside and an inside, and we have all two kinds of sight, outsight and insight, but very rarely do we find a seer like Swedenborg who can see and hear subjectively and objectively at the same time. Our physical organisms are two-sided, and we all know from experience that internal disorders express themselves outwardly in course of evolutionary processes, unless they are overcome before they have progressed so far as to become visible on the surface of the physical structure.

The theatre of all vital activities is within, therefore internal remedies are admittedly superior to external applications. Not what you rub onto the skin but what you take into the stomach is of chief importance from the dietary standpoint. All the benefit that can ever be derived from outward applications is that what is outwardly applied may soak in and eventually reach the vitals. Disorder being only the contradictory of order, proceeds to manifestation—just as its opposite, order, proceeds. Health is first an inward possession realized by the individual as his inherent birthright, then the entire external responds gradually to this indwelling force, and at length to the very surface of the skin is health made manifest. Disease also commences behind the physical scenes, on the other side of the screen we call the body, and eventually the body succumbs to the undermining process which is kept up in secret till at length the secret is out and the body tells the tale of woe in its every lineament.

To many people there seems a breath of falsehood in the statement, "I can see even though I appear blind" or "I can hear even though I appear deaf," and many kindred sayings, but no deep reasoner can object to such affirmations when he realizes that there must first take place on the unseen plane whatever is to be ultimately manifested on the physical or visible plane of operation. No one objects when he is told that roots of teeth must grow unseen before projecting molars pierce the gums, and no one denies that roots of hair must develop below the scalp before the head can be covered with hirsute adornment. If, then, the order of nature's working be thus far admitted, why not go still farther along the same line and allow that we must realize inwardly that which, later on, we shall express outwardly.

We limit nature's operations by our impertinent interferences with her beneficent activities. Every word of hope is an assistant, every iota of expectation on the right side of a question is a help. We can at least refrain from making discouraging statements, and even though some of us may be prepared to grant less than others on the score of a complete remodeling of a wasted physique by mental methods, we can all at least afford to consider the advantages which must certainly accrue from mental treatment, even though the exterior results be not immediately forthcoming.

How would you treat a person suffering from blindness when expert oculists have declared there is no chance of his ever regaining sight? is a question often put to mental practitioners. Our answer is at least twofold. Our first concern would be to affirm spiritual sight, (clairvoyance if you like to call it so,) and adhere strongly to the declaration that sight is a spiritual power. The psychical side of the faculty of sight, which does not depend on material orbs of vision, is then instantly appealed to, and there is no opposition manifested on the part of the average patient to a statement which transcends all phenomena to which oculists and opticians are accustomed to refer.

We need not disguise our real sentiments, and we are less than honest if we seek to evade issues we are in honor bound to face. One of these telling issues is the question of how far we are justified in insisting that material sight will necessarily be gained or restored, as the case may be, through mental treatment. We have known of cases where there was every reason to believe that the optic nerve was entirely destroyed, giving evidence of such remarkable clairvoyance that they could safely go about alone in the most crowded parts of busy cities, as this "second sight," as it is sometimes called, entirely made up for total absence of external vision. The very best conditions for recovering physical sight are afforded when the mind is at rest, the patient having ceased to feel anxiety, or to indulge in worry over exterior benefits or the lack of them. That wonderful force in nature, Vis Medicatrix Naturae, which is always working in the direction of healing is something we can never wholly define, but we know we are giving it the freest opportunity to operate when we have ceased to interfere with its beneficent activities.

If persons can only be led to discontinue all thought about their "poor eyes," "poor ears," "poor lungs," "poor stomachs," those poor members will soon grow richer. Though we cannot intellectually coincide with so absurd a statement as "you have no body," "you have no eyes," or any other unscientific jargon, which must appear ludicrous to the majority of moderately intelligent people, we can readily conceive that out of experiences of a beneficial sort accruing (at least in seeming) from such strange denials, may be evolved a rational philosophy of at least a single department of healing practice. The physical body does not need the amount of treatment it ordinarily receives; it is indeed far better off when let alone and "left to nature," than when perpetually irritated by some one's excited mental action brought continually to bear upon it.

Some people are so peculiar in their mental make-up that they are only reached at first by extravagant statements which, later on, they come to regard as unscientific and absurd, and as a vast number of people who are capable of doing rudimentary work in the field of mental therapeutics are feelers rather than knowers, sentimentalists rather than rationalists, they are in no way deterred by incongruous expressions; on the contrary they revel in them, regarding them as the language of a noble cult altogether superior to the commonplaceness of accepted terminology. Deliverance from fear concerning the physical organism is the object sought, and in order to gain this end recourse is sometimes had to mirth-provoking language, a circumstance we are inclined to deprecate because it occasions needless confusion and arouses in the popular mind much preventable hostility.

To be redeemed from all fear of physical distemper it is necessary to take all thought off those organs which have heretofore been affected parts; therefore, if one shall simply affirm "I am spiritual, my real body is spiritual," such a statement is of great help, and it certainly does not imply the absurdity contained in the denial of the existence of the physical body or any part of it. We have specially remarked upon these aspects of the question, because not only the medical profession, which is now taking quite kindly to "suggestive" treatment, but many outside the ranks of medicine are interesting themselves in showing up the fallacies and inconsistencies of a form of diction which some people actually think is an integral part of mental treatment, while it is only a vanishing idiosyncrasy.

Deafness is a very persistent malady and is almost inevitable wherever stubborness is fostered and aggressive self-will is extolled. Deafness proceeds mentally from obstinacy, also from severe mental strain. The great musical composer Beethoven with all his excellencies was, according to his most friendly biographers, of a very stubborn disposition even from earliest childhood, and though he suffered from various other ailments in addition to deafness, it was his hardness of hearing which caused him his chief distress as it hampered most his career as a musician. To say that he rose to sublime heights, despite this painful limitation, is not saying that the limitation was no defect, and when we look still closer into this great man's career and further analyze his character, we find that another of his grave defects was indiscrimination, as evidenced in his foolish spoiling of his youthful nephew upon whom he showered every advantage, and who turned out as badly as over-indulged children are apt to do. It may seem to some of Beethoven's enthusiastic admirers little short of sacrilege to thus daringly allude to weaknesses in the nature of so truly exemplary a man, but his innate nobleness of temper caused him to urge upon his dearest friend, that should his biography be written his weakness, as well as his strong points, should be exhibited. We ought not to censure or to harshly criticise the petty weaknesses, which cast small shadows across the great and noble lives of the world's illustrious heroes, at the same time we are guilty of no ingratitude or irreverence when we seek to learn needed lessons even from the frailties of those we most admire and love.

As conspicuous virtues are examples and inspirations, so are the limitations of others warnings to us that we may avoid what is unhandsome in our own behavior. Two rules should always be observed by those who seek to heal: One is that no error may ever be condoned; the other is that no weakness may ever be held up to ridicule or shame, so as to depress the very people we are most earnestly seeking to deliver out of darkness. Speak your word bravely on the side of the particular aspect or phase of strength which any manifest weakness opposes, but on no account allow that weakness to form the subject of the treatment. We need to be very rigid in the use of words, remembering that the following noble texts contain no idle threats and no empty promises: "For every idle word that men shall speak they must render an account in the day of judgment," and ,"By thy words thou shalt be justified and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."

Nothing can be further from salutary than the mistaken theory that diseases are to be treated mentally, yet we frequently hear persons of good average intelligence inquire, "How do you treat catarrh, asthma, or some other malady," as though it were necessary, or even permissible, (which it is not) to treat a malady at all? Correct expressions are such as these: "I am treating Harry for perfect hearing, George for perfect sight, Charles for perfect digestion, James for perfect breathing," and so on through the entire list of legitimate and desirable special treatments, while beyond all specializations and specifications there is a general treatment applicable to everybody, which can be mentioned in such phrase as: "I am treating Hannah for perfect health."

The two sets of phrases above mentioned are both correct, but the latter is greater, because more inclusive and universally appropriate, than the former. Perfect health and its enjoyment must include sight, hearing, breathing and all else that goes to make up a satisfactory and harmonious condition. We always dwell particularly upon this greater, fuller mode of treatment, not only because of its wide inclusiveness, but because it is often very difficult to determine what particular good thought needs sending out to a special patient. Specific treatments are, of course, lawful, where the felt or manifest need is for the cultivation or enlargement of some special excellence, such as patience, gentleness, firmness or any other quality which may be insufficiently expressed.

Irritability of temper produces skin eruptions and gives a general burning, itching sensation on the surface of the body.

Moles, warts, corns, bunions and all sorts of annoying little disfigurements, which are sometimes painful as well as unsightly, show plainly the effects of worry over material trifles, which do not always, however, appear trifles by any means to the worrier, who has so exaggerated the importance of petty details that molehills have become mountains in his esteem. "Don't worry" is an excellent motto, but so fine a piece of advice is difficult to follow, because it is couched in negative language. The words "don't worry" suggest worrying, for you are using the name of the very fault you are seeking to help yourselves and others to avoid when you organize a "Don't Worry Club," useful as such an organization, in some respects, undoubtedly is, until the public grows to the employment of better language.

So long has the world been pestered with "don't" that it seems almost impossible at first to confine oneself to a scientific, which is an exclusively affirmative, vocabulary. "This is the way, walk ye in it." "This do and thou shalt live." "Wash seven times in Jordan," and all such commands (not prohibitions) are healing formulas because they point out the right road and do not suggest the wrong, though they clearly reveal error to be error by proving truth to be truth. No one ever recites the Multiplication Table correctly without refuting every false statement that can be imagined in connection with multiplication, therefore the Multiplication Table is a universal healing formula and can be successfully introduced everywhere.

We are interested in the formation of Metaphysical Societies, the members of which recite the Multiplication Table with definite intentions. Very great good can accrue from so doing, because we find therein a common ground of agreement between Jews and Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants, Spiritualists and Materialists, and all denominations besides. When there is a way open to us for proving the power of benevolent thought we ought not to refuse to take advantage of it, and when it comes to the recitation of the Multiplication Table with a common intention and expectation combined, we can none of us object provided we are in sympathy with the end for which it is recited. Both public and private recitations are beneficial, and to test their efficiency it is only necessary to fix upon a laudable object and repeat the tables with the intention and expectation that good will result, not from a monotonous, parrot-like repetition of words, but in consequence of united desire and expectation. With most people some tangible aid to concentration seems desirable, if not positively necessary, and as you may ransack the archives of the whole world's literature and fail to find any philosophical or religious sentences which everybody will agree upon, we have fallen back on mathematical certitudes.

As we are positively centered in our conviction that there is a science of health and a purely scientific mode of mental healing, we are especially glad to introduce into our own work and recommend to others a set of statements belonging to what is universally acknowledged as exact science. We are not seeking to enforce a restricted method of working upon any of our readers; we only testify to what we have proved in our experience, and we have certainly noticed how remarkable are the benefits flowing from a purely concordant act. Disease is nothing but discord, no matter, therefore, where it may appear most prominently, it is but a molecular discord evidencing a prior mental discord. All discords can be vanquished by the installation of harmony, and they can be vanquished in no other manner.

As the law of correspondences works universally, and the outer must sooner or later come to fully correspond with the inner, it cannot be difficult to see that necessary diagnosis is not diagnosis of disease but of necessity. What do you stand most in need of? should be the query raised. Having decided that some particular phase of good is not being sufficiently expressed at a given point, you must set to work to acknowledge its potency and begin to declare that it will assuredly show forth where it has not yet become manifest.

As the subject matter of this lesson is susceptible of limitless expansion, and more words on our part would not necessarily add anything to the real value of the teaching, we now dismiss this particular branch of instruction, not because we have said any final word concerning correspondences, but because we think we have called enough attention to those necessary keynotes which intelligent readers will take up for themselves and expand into voluminous harmonies. The essential points to be kept in view are principally these:

First. Always affirm the reality of your best and highest hope.

Second. Seek the thing you most desire and summon it to you through the agency of persistent affirmation.

Third. Seek to diagnose in your own case and in the case of others, needs and how to supply them.

When these considerations and meditations are taken into daily life, and constitute a guide for daily conduct, it will soon appear that discords, troubles and vexations of every sort are growing less and less continually, even unto final total disappearance. Errors and discords cannot remain where truth is boldly and constantly affirmed, though they can continue to multiply (and often increase rapidly) in defiance of all attempts to put them down by naming them and then decrying their existence.

We need to keep in closest touch with the realm of high ideals and spiritually embodied entities of the noblest types in order that we, by virtue of such fellowship, may correspond with celestial influences and continually speak and receive true answers in the course of heavenly conversation.

LESSON VII.

THE SPIRITUAL MAN—HIS POWERS AND PRIVILEGES.

In speaking of the Spiritual Man we do not wish to convey the idea of a human entity apart from the man or woman with whom we are accustomed to deal. Our object in using the term Spiritual Man being to call attention to that higher view of human nature in general which raises the thought of humankind above the plane, not only of sense but also of rational intellect. As the larger can and does always contain the lesser, while it is utterly impossible for the smaller to enfold the larger, it stands to reason that an exalted view of human powers and privileges can, and assuredly will, embrace all minor conceptions.

The theory of evolution can only be logically explained in the light of the previous involution of that which is subsequently evolved. The process of evolution marks degrees in expression culminating at length in perfect manifestation of all that the primal unit contains. Humanity standing at the apex of the pyramid of progressive existence contains all that has ever been expressed previous to the advent of the human race on earth. When we speak of the human race we are mentioning not one species or genus, as though we were describing some special type of bird or beast, but we are confronting the sum of all lower manifestations of life on this planet plus that mysterious something, which the world has agreed to call the human soul, which in contra-distinction from mere animal consciousness of existence, which may be but mortal, is pre-eminently regarded as immortal.

The word soul is clearly derived from Sol, the Sun, which is the ruler of all the planets and satellites found in the system of which it is the parent, master and central luminary. No astronomer of ancient or modern time has been able, so far as we know, to discover a single element in the composition of any planet, moon, asteroid, meteor or aerolite which is not included in the constitution of the Sun.

We can imagine a time when the sun reigned alone in this vast field of space, which is now peopled with solar progeny, but we cannot conceive of any one of the several planets, which now revolve around the solar disk, having an existence before its birth from the parental orb.

In like manner we can conceive philosophically of the central germ of human life pre-existing ere yet it had begun to manifest through the agency of offspring. The Spiritual Man is the real abiding entity; all existent to this entity results therefrom and is dependent thereon. The ancient astrologers, who were also the most learned astronomers of their day, anticipated Ralph Waldo Emerson in his immortal saying:

> "I am owner of the sphere,
> The seven stars and the solar year," for they taught that the truly wise man, instead of being "under the stars" rules within himself all the influences which the various planets and the moon are said by astrologers to exert over the average human being.

What is it, let us ask, to be a wise man in the sense in which Solomon among the Hebrews and Solon among the Greeks were considered wise? The answer is not far to seek. We are all unwise before we have grown wise; we must be children before we can be mature men and women in understanding. Children must be uneducated and inexperienced before they have embodied the lessons which they are called upon to learn in the many and varied schools of life's experience. We do not send children to school because we think them depraved or consider them naughty, but for the distinct purpose of training them in the exercise of dormant faculties.

We can readily imagine a sublime future period called poetically and prophetically a Golden Age, when there will be no sin, sickness, strife or any phase of discord upon earth, but even in those halcyon days we can picture to ourselves delightful school-houses, highly cultured and amiable teachers, and lovely children flocking gladly to the temples of learning which must certainly constitute some of the most charming palaces in those days. We have all read many times in the New Testament that the Holy Child increased in knowledge as he grew in age and stature. This statement has always been accepted as an authentic portion of the Gospel narrative by Christian thinkers of all denominations, proving that even the theological doctrine of a Divine incarnation has in no way militated against the reasonable admission that a perfect human life develops through successive stages from infancy to maturity on all planes of expression. Realizing that growth signifies development or expansion, but not radical alteration in nature, we may truly say that in the highest sense we unfold, but we do not alter, by which we mean that though we enlarge as to our outward expression of life we undergo no alteration in the region of primal substance.

It is self-evidently absurd to endeavor to educate a child beyond his latent capacity or to force upon him work of any kind for the performance of which he is organically unfitted; but though this conclusion appears self-evident we have no right to assume that an individual is unfitted by nature for the fulfillment of any task congenial to his tastes. We have positively no right to call anybody incorrigible or to pronounce any condition absolutely incurable, for our knowledge of the latent ability and most interior disposition of those about us is often so superficial that it is the height of presumption on our part to judge finally from surface seemings. We are all so much greater within than we appear without, we can all perform so much more in imagination than we actually manufacture that every one of us, the moment one begins to reflect, becomes conscious of an ideal higher self. This higher self is the real man or woman, the abiding ego, that which persists in declaring to us our own immortality. Not infrequently do we hear learned professors discuss the pros and cons of life immortal. When they are at their best they are ever ready to account for our persistent declaration that we are immortal on the ground of the voice of that which is immortal speaking within us.

At a Summer School of Philosophy, in Southern California, the writer was privileged to hear some very thoughtful remarks on this ever important question from a popular Professor of Ethics, who had in a previous lecture told the many fashionable ladies in his audience that their very conspicuous style of dress was due to the fact that they desired to enlarge their personalities. In much soberer vein, when descanting on immortality the same lecturer dealt with the problem of our belief in our continuous spiritual individuality, very wisely calling attention to the underlying cause for that faithless doubt and miserable uncertainty which so frequently shrouds in almost impenetrable gloom the prospects of future individual being. "We are," said he, "both mortal and immortal; on our material side we die, but on our spiritual side we live forever. When we confine our thoughts to that personality of ours, which is just as perishable as the raiment which covers it, we can catch no glimpses of a life beyond the confines of the tomb; but when we are engaged in meditation upon our higher side, we discover the truth that that plane of our consciousness can, does, and must endure forever."

When so good an illustration or so wise a reflection is thoughtfully analyzed, it will soon appear that the so-called higher side of humanity is the whole of humanity strictly speaking, for whatever is below or external to this can be but an offshoot from it, a mere instrument formed by the soul for its temporary use, endowed for a brief span of fleeting time with delegated life, a life which must sooner or later be indrawn and re-absorbed in the source whence it proceeded, unless the instrument be so perpetually remodeled that it can be transformed and eventually transfigured without palpable dissolution.

It can never be either wise or reasonable to estimate anything below its highest conceivable possibilities, but while we invariably do well to gaze steadfastly upon our loftiest ideals, we must guard against impatience when we dicover that though they can be gradually, they cannot be instantaneously, actualized in all their fullness. Before all plurals lies the one unalterable singular. Our powers are but variant expressions of our power; our privileges are but manifold varieties of our essential unitary prerogative as children of the Highest. Whatever one human being has already done that every other human being who truly desires to do likewise can certainly accomplish. Our desires proceed from within us, the aspirations which burst forth and well up from the inmost of our being are just so many partial revelations of what we all contain, our full containment always exceeding its fullest expression.

It is a very great step forward for the race and for the individual to accept the truism that "out of nothing nothing comes." There must be something within us which is fully adequate to account for all that issues from us in the shape of prayer, determination, resolution, ambition, etc., etc. Having used the word ambition we desire to contrast it with the much higher term aspiration, by which it is completely supplanted as moral evolution proceeds. An ambitious person is usually very egotistical, having not yet grown to appreciate the gospel of mutualism, but the aspirational hero has become elevated to the rank of a phlilanthropist who, interested in the welfare of all humankind, rises consciously as one among many brethren, knowing, and rejoicing in the knowledge, that as he climbs and soars he becames an increasing channel of inspiration and illumination to myriads of fellow travelers.

It has long been a tenet of Oriental philosophy, and also a doctrine of Esoteric Christianity, that all private personal ambition must be merged in active, efficient search after the common good. No one whose horizon is so limited that he considers self only, can do other than work injury to the very self he seeks exclusively to benefit, for so intimate are our mutual relations and so inter-dependent are we at all times and in all ways, that the quality of thought we entertain concerning others is unconsciously absorbed by them and reflected back upon ourselves. A thoughtful consideration of all that is implied in this proposition will, and necessarily must, open the way for a completely scientific, as well as purely philosophic and broadly religious, explanation of the working of the law whereby all things which come to us, come through the operation of the omnipresent force of attraction.

Nothing can be fairer than the affirmation that all people and all things should be sampled at their best, for it is only the finest and fullest expression which in any adequate way proves the real nature of that which is manifest. The interest attaching not only to horse shows, dog shows, and flower shows, but also to public exhibitions of beautiful human infants, proves that the popular mind is always delighted to witness a display of more than ordinary excellence in any department of life or industry. This beautiful, normal, and altogether reasonable preference for beauty over deformity, intelligence over ignorance, and perfect health in place of any symptom of disease, clearly evinces the innate appreciation of symmetry and deep seated desire for perfection which underlies the entire fabric of human emotion. There is indeed a morbid curiosity which delights to inspect the pathological, but let us hope there is within this morbid tendency a real desire on the part of the multitude to find a lasting remedy for those mysterious and perplexing ailments, the exhibition of which for the time being, seems to gratify a perverted taste. No one is ever heard to express that delight at viewing imperfection which spontaneously results from beholding the sublime, the majestic, or the exquisite. The esthetic faculty, which has sometimes been ridiculed, because curiously manifested in some persons, is nothing less than a bursting forth of a native impulse toward the love of righteousness.

When Matthew Arnold wrote so much of "sweet reasonableness," of "sweetness and light," and often very powerfully concerning the eternal force which ever makes for righteousness, the high moral influence which his essays exerted over a large company of more or less sceptical readers, was due to the primal fact that in all the literary productions of that very scholarly man there ran a deep vein of true optimism, despite the seeming pessimism of some of his conclusions.

We cannot make progress in any direction until we are firmly grounded in the faith that such progress is completely possible as well as intensely desirable; the importance, therefore, of a radically optimistic theory of human nature cannot be overestimated.

That there are difficulties in the way of immediately and completely justifying the grandest conceivable view of human life we frankly and willingly admit, but these difficulties vanish as we pursue our mental journey from the surface of the ocean of human expression by continually diving deeper and deeper into the calm waters beneath, to which the stormy surface offers no resemblance. Such frequent expressions as "good at heart" and many of like import are general tributes paid to the deeper, higher, and holier self of those very individuals whose outer personalities are at present extremely disagreeable and whose actual conduct is often disgraceful in the extreme.

The very fact that you can appeal to a person's sense of honor, thereby making him ashamed of his own fault, proves that there is within him something which rebukes his own wrongdoing, and no rebuke can ever be successfully administered except by that which points a nobler way. We are essentially and potentially exactly as strong, as wise, as beautiful, as pure, and as gifted as we ever wish to be even in our most exalted hours of felt communion with the absolutely divine. There is no adequate explanation for human ideals and aspirations save that which is contained within that sublime theory of human nature, which pronounces human nature one with divine nature. The highest of which we can conceive is already ours, seeing that we have apprehended it; our apprehension affording proof of our ability to embody. When Thomas a'Kempis wrote his masterly work "On the Imitation of Christ" he gave to the world in a priceless gem of literature a connecting link between the doctrinal theology of the early Christian church, and the so-called new metaphysical opinions which are at present greatly agitating Christendom.

There is not so much difference as we have been sometimes falsely led to suppose between Alexand-rian philosophy, Hebrew ideas of righteousness, and Oriental mysticism, even though the Hebrew, the Hindoo, and the Greek, do not always seem to assimilate easily. It is really absurd to call the metaphysical thought of Europe and America to-day "new" when it is a re-vivification, on a greatly extended scale, of the highest philosophical conceptions united with the purest moral teachings of all the greatest seers and sages whose presence in the world has most greatly blessed humanity. Though the foregoing conclusion seems inevitable it is but just, and at the same time highly encouraging, to trace the ever widening circuit in which these noble thoughts are moving.

We can scarecly compare, except by way of contrast, our present social state with that of Egypt, Greece, Rome, India, or Palestine in the long ago. Brilliant gems of thought of priceless worth have come to us through milleniums of time, but these choice spiritual jewels are to be attributed not to the average condition of the people in those lands, at those times, but only to the exceptional genius of the prophets of those countries and periods. To-day we are universalizing, we are daily becoming increasingly cosmopolitan both in theory and practice, and, thanks to the widespread influence of common education, what one person really knows is easily communicated to all others who are willing to share the knowledge. Though our present civilization has many drawbacks,—among which are the extremely artificial ways of living adopted by a large percentage of those who make up society with a big S,—perhaps the most lamentable feature,—it is not wise, nor is it just to dwell too largely upon the evils of this artificial condition, for the seeds of its own death are in it, while the growing intelligence of the hour is ever leading even the most slavish devotees of fashion in constantly growing numbers to abandon a position, which when tried to its uttermost proves itself entirely unsatisfactory. It is only fair to the great multitude of the unchurched in these days to regard disaffection toward ecclesiastical institutions as a not altogether unhealthy reaction from the blind religious formalism which went before and led up to the present departure from time-honored standards of orthodoxy.

The words of an agnostic orator may be often harsh, repellent, and at times ridiculous, but had it not been for the utterly spurious view of human nature promulgated from Christian pulpits in the ears of generation after generation, representing man was too vile to live, and God as an implacable tyrant, these very assailants of Christianity would never have gained a hearing, and we very much doubt whether they would have wished to say anything at all resembling what they are saying now.

However much we may cherish a noble conception of Supreme Benevolence, and however tenaciously we may cling to a consoling and exhilarating view of our own spiritual immortality, we cannot pretend that we are sorry when we perceive that many talented people are engaged in the work of demolishing the clouds and screens, which have long concealed the essential verities, for which true religion vouches. While the method of the reconstructionist differs entirely from that of the iconoclast, the idol-breaker,—should he succeed in destroying every image he assails,—could not logically disturb the position of those who rest their confidence neither in man-made creeds nor in pretentious institutions, but solely in the realm where intuitive preception of truth does away with the necessity for external authority.

It is deeply encouraging to note that the lowest views of human nature, not the highest, are those which are being most ruthlessly assailed. Modern literature abounds with diatribe levelled at shams, frauds, hypocrisies, and all else that is mean, contemptible, and unworthy, while the popular mind takes kindly to all the praise that is heartily bestowed upon genuine merit and real nobility. The great newspapers of to-day are sadly prone to give disproportionate publicity to the evils which afflict our times, but the proprietors, editors, and reporters connected with these journals all disclaim any admiration for the iniquities they describe, and declare that their chief object (aside from making money) in exposing iniquities, is to create a popular sentiment in exactly the opposite direction. It is also very pleasing to observe that however fiercely a really good book may be attacked by spiteful critics, no criticism however malignant can permanently prevent the author of such a work from wearing the well-earned laurels of popular esteem and affection.

Concerning great paintings, noble plays, and all else that appeals to the multitude, real worth does actually—and in these days not very slowly—make its way to general recognition. The occupants of the upper gallery in a low class theatre are the very readiest of all people in the community to vociferously applaud heroism and decry villainy whenever depicted on their favorite melo-dramatic stage. This is, in itself, a convincing proof that the evangelists have told the unvarnished truth when they have informed us that the common people heard Jesus gladly, though the scheming ecclesiastical and civil politicians operating in the Roman Empire many centuries ago determined to extirpate, if possible, all teachers and all teaching which militated against their own corrupt interests.

No great philanthropist has ever been rejected by popular vote, unless that vote has been unfairly obtained by the misrepresentations of unscrupulous demagogues. The uneducated populace may be misled by falsehood and cunning, but the great popular heart is never wrong even when its head is most demented. The love of righteousness rests in so secure a depth of human feeling that it it absolutely impossible to overthrow it, and it is there that we find abiding ground for confidence in the ultimate resurrection and glorification of the entire body of our great human family. Ineffectual may prove the most carefully devised and earnestly propagated "reforms," for not one of them can prove ultimately successful in accomplishing intended good, until all the measures adopted shall agree with the underlying motives of the enterprise. To take it for granted that there is awakenable good in every human being, and then proceed to devise means for its awakenment is wise, logical and kindly, and, in the long run, sure to succeed.

The true scientist has ever at hand the only sure remedy for public as well as for private ills. The next great step taken by practitioners of divine healing, will be to apply the teaching so loudly praised as a healer of sick bodies, to the great body politic which sorely needs healing at present.

Nothing but truth and justice can ever really satisfy our deepest human instincts.

PREFACE.

In presenting to the world a popular treatise on Theosophy, the author, who is in some respects merely an amanuensis and in others a compiler, desires to offer to the reading public, in portable form and at moderate price, a work which shall, in spite of many obvious limitations, possess the following advantages :—

1st. Lucidity of statement, conciseness of style, and freedom from all unnecessary use of technical or foreign terms.

2d. A systematic and orderly review of the Theosophic teachings of many of the world's greatest teachers of ancient and modern times, and notably an impartial presentation of the views of great bodies of religionists and philosophers whose theories have frequently been misstated or criticised in an unfriendly spirit.

3d. A practical digest of the teachings of Universal Theosophy and an application of these to the great industrial, social, and religious problems of the present day.

4th. Practical advice and direction to students seeking to translate theory into practice, and express in some measure, in their own lives, the truth so easily and frequently stated orally and on paper.

5th. Reviews of current Theosophical and kindred literature in the form of short sketches or digests of the contents of such publications, designed for the two-fold purpose of calling attention to increasing interest in such works, through extending a knowledge of them, and to help busy people who have little opportunity for extensive reading to get as much information as possible during their limited periods of leisure.

The following essays and reviews have been prepared amid a multiplicity of other engagements; no claim is made for perfection of literary style nor for exhaustiveness in treatment. Such a book as the one now offered, many people have long felt to be in demand; and in response to numerous and urgent requests it has now been compiled and thrown upon the sea of public approval or criticism, to meet whatever fate may be its destiny. As an evidence of the interest taken in it prior to publication, it need only be stated that considerably more than 1000 copies were ordered and paid for before the manuscript was placed in the publishers' hands; by this means the entire cost of production was defrayed in advance by the concerted action of confiding subscribers. All who thus secured its production and freedom from liability received their copies before the book was placed in the general market. A second edition from electroplates is now being prepared, which will be offered to the world at large, at $1.50 per copy, post free, or 6*s*. in England. As soon as the demand warrants the issue of a very large edition, thereby greatly reducing the cost per copy, the price will be permanently fixed at $1.00 in America, 4*s*. in England and the Colonies, thereby placing it at half the usual price for a book of similar size and style in the hands of all interested. Hoping it may do somebody some good, it is trustingly committed to the world by the compiler,

W. J. COLVILLE.

N. B. The twenty-four lectures which constitute a considerable portion of this book were originally delivered inspirationally by W. J. Colville to classes in San Francisco and other cities. As a great desire was expressed by numerous persons who attended them, for their publication, reports were taken from time to time, which were subsequently revised and altered whenever necessary to adapt them for permanent reading.

THEOSOPHY: WHAT IT IS, AND WHAT IT IS NOT.

At a time when Theosophy is being most absurdly identified in the public mind with a special idea of Hinduism, it seems the plain duty of those who know better, to speak out boldly and with no uncertainty of tone in explanatory defence of the great movement known as Theosophical, now inviting the world to a fuller understanding, than has heretofore been practical, of the various outward forms and systems in which the one essential truth of religion has manifested its spirit through the ages. To those of our readers who have not made etymology a study, we would particularly emphasize the right use of the word religion, which means union, righteousness, co-operation, and a great deal more which is thoroughly practical, and indeed essential to human welfare.

Free religion may be said to mean religion untrammelled by creeds and dogmas, which, in the very nature of things, are not susceptible of absolute, or indeed sufficient verification to commend them as certainties to an intelligent mind. Matthew Arnold, one of the greatest literary lights of the present century, was never tired of enforcing his favorite proposition, that religion really means righteousness; and that, as this is so, it behooves all men who have an eye to the general welfare of humanity, to hold together as much as possible in support of all institutions which are on the side of the higher nature of man. Arnold, being an Englishman, and a patriotic Englishman, naturally felt a warm affection for English institutions, and thus worked diligently in the interests of the Established Church; though in many if not all his essays he has put a construction upon the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, and the object and meaning of church ordinances, entirely at variance with popular tradition.

We mention Arnold, as he is a well-known author, deservedly respected by reason of his general fairness, breadth, and liberality (though, unfortunately, he is neither fair, broad, nor liberal in his summary dismissal of Spiritualism), only as an example of the tone adopted toward religion by men of culture, who in a great general way are disposed to treat all matters without prejudice or undue bias. Those who oppose religion violently are almost invariably destitute of any approach to genuine culture; or, if literary and scholarly, they are so violently led by passion or strong feeling as to become victims of emotion rather than calm deliberators in the open court of general appeal. For bigots and partisans we do not attempt to write, nor are we anxious to address them or converse with them at any time on subjects of moment to humanity, for the simple reason that they are determined to see only one side of any question. Such people may be fervidly religious or flagrantly irreligious, in the popular acceptation of those words; but in either case prejudice blinds them; they are convinced that all truth is in some one narrow system of their own; and while they prate of science, they are hopeless sophists or sciolists, undertaking most irrationally to force upon the world one system of thought only, and that system one so exclusive as to condemn probably ninety-nine per cent of the human family either to the hell of orthodoxy or the society of fools and knaves which constitutes the Tartarus of the heterodox.

Now for any one to come to the study of Theosophy pre-determined to prove one system of religion all right and other systems all wrong, is for him to so disqualify himself for the task before him as to make his study useless. We therefore appeal only to the fair-minded and liberal, and these we address with the certain conviction that they will not object to the motto, "There is no religion higher than truth." But what is Truth? Pilate is not dead yet; his modern representatives are still asking the same old question, and, unfortunately, those of Pilate's ilk (or perhaps fortunately) may go on asking it as long as they are of the mental fibre of Pilate, to the end of any number of ages or worlds, and still receive no answer from those who have the knowledge of truth within them.

This statement may seem confounding to many, but those whom it is likely to confound have not studied the Pilate nature, which is by no means an attractive or lovely one. Pilate is not even an honest curiosity-seeker; he is not simply inquisitive; surely he is a traitor to conviction, a spurner of divine voices, an open disregarder of heavenly messages; in a word, a selfish, scheming, hypocritical demagogue, who puts his private interest before all justice, and willingly condemns the innocent to death, so that he may curry favor with the rulers of the earth. His own wife points out to him the danger and iniquity of his way. His conscience indorses all she says to him, but he seeks to evade conscience by washing his hands, and after deliberately grieving the Spirit, impertinently sneers forth the question, which from his lips is an audacious insult, "What is Truth?"

Those who would receive reply to this all-important query must not think that truth can be had for the asking, by those who if they got it would only trample on it, or at best pervert it to their selfish and ungodly ends. Truth is a prize to be won only by those who seek it with a view to use it wisely when they have procured it, and we therefore unhesitatingly conclude and announce that truth never will become public property or be anything like universally dispersed, till the great masses of mankind are desirous of laying aside selfishness, and ceasing from competition, learn to co-operate for each other's good in all things. Theosophy, which simply means divine wisdom, inculcates one dogma, and that is, THE UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD OF MAN. No one can be admitted into the Theosophical Society who does not profess this one great article of faith. All other points are secondary; this alone is fundamental and essential. Now that Edward Bellamy's glorious book, "Looking Backward," is circulating by thousands and tens of thousands of copies, and clubs are forming everywhere for the dissemination of co-operative ideas and the practicalization of co-operative principles, the time is fully ripe for a clear, concise statement of Theosophical teachings.

In this series of lectures or articles we propose for the special assistance of busy people who have little time to read large and numerous works on the subject, to present as well as we can, in brief abstract, an epitome of the teachings of the world's renowned sages, ancient and modern; and at the same time pay merited tribute to many lesser lights, less well-known names who have identified or are still identifying themselves with the onward march of progress. The constitution of the Theosophical Society recommends that truth shall be allowed to dawn gradually upon the race. It discourages all ambitious attempts at proselyting, and affirms, with regard to those who are satisfied with their present religious convictions, that they are probably partaking of the aliment best adapted to their immediate needs. But who can fail to meet with more or less of that increasingly vast army of eagerly inquiring souls who are not content with what they receive, either through the channel of popular religion or scientific agnosticism? This multitude must be fed, or they will perish. They are the hungry and thirsty ones who cry loudly, incessantly, for living bread and water, and to disregard their cry or tell them to be content with what cannot satisfy their appetite for truth, is cruel and culpable.

It is stated in many quarters that there are mystic brotherhoods in the East and also in Europe, composed of men who have gained wondrous insight into the laws and forces of the universe, but that these Mahatmas, as they are often styled, are unwilling to reveal their knowledge to the multitude. We doubt very much if the latter portion of that statement is correct; we would rather institute a parallel by way of explanation. A professor of mathematics, for example, knows exactly how to solve many very difficult problems pertaining to the higher mathematics. Some schoolboys not yet fully conversant with simple fractions urge him to tell them how to solve one of the most difficult problems known to mathematical science. What reply must he make to their request? Two, and only two, courses are open to him. He can refuse to comply with it, and thereby enkindle their ire; or he can waste time by working it all out on a blackboard under their very eyes, they, meanwhile, stolidly gazing with open-mouthed curiosity, but failing utterly to comprehend the demonstration. To refuse their request is economical; to grant it is wasteful of time and energy. If he choose the former and not the latter course, he should give them his reason for refusal, by informing them that they need to go through a course of preparatory training, which he has been through already, before they can comprehend the solution. Then, when they are ready to enter his class, he will gladly instruct them.

It is with the Mahatmas, as it is with the higher intelligences, familiar by name at least to all Spiritualists; angels from celestial heights of attainment do not make a noise moving furniture from place to place, or alphabetically spelling out messages through a table or talking-board, nor do they respond to mercenary and trivial inquiries regarding business and the details of earthly affairs in general. Some answer we do get to all the questions we propound. Some force does manifest itself, no matter in what spirit or with what intent we singly inquire or gather together; but is it rational to presume, is it not rather the height of folly to imagine, that trivial minds with trivial ends in view can summon the brightest intellects in the universe to chatter platitudes with them; and is it not an impudent blasphemy to imagine that souls interested in the welfare of all humanity on the highest spiritual plane, will dance attendance on the would-be gambler in stocks or purchaser of a prize-winning lottery ticket? Yet such are the stupid puerilities manifested by some people calling themselves Spiritualists from day to day, that we hardly wonder at the ill odor Spiritualism is in, in some communities where these abound or shove themselves to the front as organizers and dictators. Such men as the justly revered Prof. Henry Kiddle of New York and other estimable Spiritualists have happily been as severe as reason demands in denunciation of such idiocy.

Theosophy and Spiritualism are essentially one and inseparable, and as to Christian Science and all allied systems of thought and practice, they are but sectional extensions of one and the same root idea. Our object is to overcome the sectarian spirit in our students, and we know that whenever a university is in operation which can meet the real demands of the age for spiritual and moral enlightenments, no such hair-splitting as now prevails will be permissible or possible. But, say many of our questioners and correspondents, Spiritualists believe in many spirits, Christian Science acknowledges but one Spirit; Theosophy teaches final extinction of individuality, while Spiritualism insists upon its endless perpetuation: how can you in the face of these glaring contradictions declare that the three systems are essentially one?

Our unequivocal and decidedly undismayed answer to all these queries and questioners is, that the questioners in the case take a painfully superficial view of the subjects on which they express views or seek enlightenment. Apparent contradictions may not be in the least contradictory, or even paradoxical, when looked at more closely and examined more searchingly; and in the case before us we see no obstacle in the way of a perfect reconciliation of these at first sight diametrically opposite statements. The declaration, there is but one Spirit, does not at all imply that the individuality or, at least, the identity (a better and higher word) of each Spiritual entity is not eternal. One spirit, one life, one substance, one nature, and only one, means that there are not two or more essential constitutions of things, that all heterogeneity is reducible to homogeneity, and thus all human beings are brothers and sisters in the fullest meaning of those familiar words. Universal brotherhood, which is the basis of Theosophy and without which the very attempt to practise "Christian Science Mind Healing" is farcical, can be logically deduced and scientifically demonstrated, if we can prove that we are all of one spirit, essence, or nature; a statement only tantamount to the declaration, "All men are born free and equal," or to such a saying as "You are as good as I am, and I am as good as you are." A common base on which all nature rests declares all men brothers, all women sisters; it denies away, i.e. effectually removes, vanquishes, overcomes, hostility between man and man, nation and nation; it strips us of false pride and causes us to think of ourselves no more highly and no more lowly than we ought to think, by disposing us to an equal regard one for another.

Again we reiterate our primal conclusion: the base of Theosophy is brotherhood, and only brotherhood. It may use the three immortal watchwords of freedom, liberty, equality, fraternity, and give to them an extended meaning which politics can never grasp. In the next place we shall do well to consider that there is not a scrap of evidence that extinction of the lower selfhood ever signified loss of identity to any profound or penetrative mind. A belief in the ultimate suspension of individual consciousness is a vulgar conceit of the ignorant with no more justification in the Vedas than in the New Testament, both of which compilations or literatures have much to say of two selves, — one, the (lower) mortal, the other (higher), immortal. Both agree that we lose the lower in the higher, or we are warned there is at least a temporal if not an eternal danger of our losing the higher through an over-cultivation and exercise of the lower. Now Theosophy, or Divine Wisdom, whose ways are the only paths of pleasantness and peace in the true sense, says before all else that we should cultivate the divine principle of our humanity: to do this successfully many teachers have insisted we must wage strenuous and incessant warfare against the lower appetites. The most enlightened teachers in their most luminous moods have, however, always insisted upon the culture of the higher principle, saying and thinking but very little of the lower, and it is at this point that Theosophy introduces to us a true basis and right method of education. Dr. J. R. Buchanan, a renowned anthropologist, now resident in Boston, in his admirable work "The New Education," very wisely places the higher education, i.e. moral and spiritual culture, in the front rank, giving a secondary place to what is simply educational and mechanical. Herbert Spencer assigns to the higher faculties about equal prominence. Both these able and distinguished men therefore testify to the necessity for cultivating the interior or sublimer nature as the paramount duty of man.

Now it is quite possible to use such words or terms as self-sacrifice, abnegation, surrender, denial, mortification, etc., far too often. The painful insistance with which many people of the best intentions dwell upon these gloomy terms, makes us long to give them Watts' exquisite and truthful couplet, —

> "Religion never was designed > To make our pleasures less," — as a formula for daily and thrice daily use; and to those who incline too strongly to certain ritualistic observances of the ancient Yoga type, other equally well-known and valuable words of the same author may be aptly applied.

"For Satan finds some mischief still For idle hands to do."

No tendency can be sadder, no sophistry more specious and dangerous, than such teaching as throws the mind in upon itself, to brood over its own weaknesses and taint.

Children are far too frequently brought up in idleness, and thus led into temptation by their parents and teachers, instead of from evil, by reason of the dark and hateful pessimism which teaches so much concerning original sin and the innate wickedness of human nature, that the very effort to stifle error and resist the devil gives power to the lowest impulses. The history of religious fanaticism furnishes abundant illustration of this ever-recurring fact in human experience. Many and many have been the men and women who have sought refuge from the devil (their own lower nature and what it attracts and affiliates with) in some monastery or convent, and there they have had a far harder fight with the adversary than they would have had, had they remained outside the bars and done their work in the world. Some verses from Keble's "Christian Year," exactly apply to such erroneous judgments. That healthy, vigorous English churchman sings: —

"We need not bid for convent cell
Our kindred and our homes farewell,
Nor strive to wind ourselves too high
For mortal man beneath the sky.
The common round, the trivial task,
Will furnish all we need to ask, —
Room to deny ourselves; a road
To bring us daily nearer God."

But it may be urged in reply to this summarizing, Keble was speaking for the rule, not for the exception, and we who seek special communion with the divine in sacred solitude are part of the exception to the general rule. If Keble marks out the way of the commandments for the many, is there not a way of counsels also for the few, of which he says nothing? The reply to this kind of reasoning is, that the very people who are most unusually anxious to escape the ordinary path of duty are those who are afraid of its difficulties and temptations, and whose motive in seeking out a special road is that they may escape ordinary trials. These are least of all prepared to tread a higher, steeper, more difficult way. They are like the boys who want the higher mathematics before they have mastered simple fractions. There is a motive, but only one, which can make a career of extraordinary isolation safe for any one, and that motive is the highest conceivable one by which any human being can be actuated, viz., a supreme desire to be of the greatest possible service to others, quite regardless of any happiness or profit which may accrue to oneself by acting thus unselfishly. Persons engaged in spiritual healing, who are more than usually disinterested in the performance of their work, understand, no doubt, what we mean by going out of the world for the purpose of working most efficiently for it and in it. Such persons can safely trust themselves out of the beaten track where the throng travels, but for the bulk of mankind "Go home" is a more applicable gospel saying than "Forsake all and follow me," though the spirit of the two is identical.

Theosophy, as a practical guide of life, a universal religion, is utterly non-partisan and non-sectarian; towering above Paine's immortal words, "The world is my country," it places the motto of the Home College of Spiritual Science in San Francisco, "The Universe is our Home." In that sentence the idea of universal brotherhood is accurately stated.

LECTURE II.

THE TEACHINGS OF THEOSOPHY, AS PROMULGATED BY THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, CONSIDERED IN A REVIEW OF A WIDELY CIRCULATING PAMPHLET.

In our first article of this series we made no effort to do more than simply and briefly present, as tersely as possible, what we understand Theosophy to be and not to be; and while no society is in the least responsible for anything we write or say, our utterances being entirely untrammelled and in no sense ex officio, we still desire to pay to the Theosophical Society a proper tribute of polite recognition. By such recognition we neither pledge ourselves or others to an indorsement of the theories entertained in the documents we refer to. All our aim is to let our readers know for themselves just what the Theosophical Society is publishing, so that when statements of an injurious and misleading character are made the answer may be at once forthcoming. No society is infallible, and to expect infallibility at the hands of the members of any organization is preposterous; and, moreover, what is most important for all to realize is, that truth is its own exponent and defendant. Weak and bitter censuring of individuals is as ridiculous as profane, and only when the public mind is superior to being moved by base insinuations or open accusations against individuals, will ideas have a chance to present themselves and be fairly discussed in open court. Personalities will not enter into this work, — at all events no offensive personalities will be permitted; and though in our journal, The Problem of Life, we may sometimes be compelled to answer attacks made by individuals upon individuals, our answering policy will be to present ideas and statements for what they are worth, without regarding the source whence they emanated, which frequently, in the case of the noblest things ever written, is historically ambiguous.

Our present effort is an attempt to review, and expound to some extent, a circular issued some time ago for the purpose of assimilating the popular mind with some of the most generally accepted conclusions of Theosophists. It is entitled, "An Epitome of Theosophy." As we cannot condense or abbreviate its statements without beclouding some of the ideas, we herewith present the distinctly doctrinal portion of it to our readers, feeling certain it will instruct and interest all of them: —

Theosophy, the Wisdom-Religion, has existed from immemorial time. It offers us a theory of nature and of life which is founded upon knowledge acquired by the Sages of the past, more especially those of the East; and its higher students claim that this knowledge is not something imagined or inferred, but that it is seen and known by those who are willing to comply with the conditions. Some of its fundamental propositions are: —

1. That the spirit in man is the only real and permanent part of his being; the rest of his nature being variously compounded, and decay being incident to all composite things, everything in man but his spirit is impermanent.

Further, that the universe being one thing and not diverse, and everything within it being connected with the whole and with every other, of which upon the upper plane above referred to there is a perfect knowledge, no act or thought occurs without each portion of the great whole perceiving and noting it. Hence all are inseparably bound together by the tie of Brotherhood.

2. That below the spirit and above the intellect is a plane of consciousness in which experiences are noted, commonly called man's "spiritual nature"; this is as susceptible of culture as his body or his intellect.
3. That this spiritual culture is only attainable as the grosser interests, passions, and demands of the flesh are subordinated to the interests, aspirations, and needs of the higher nature; and that this is a matter of both system and established law.
4. That men thus systematically trained attain to clear insight into the immaterial, spiritual world, their interior faculties apprehending Truth as immediately and readily as physical faculties grasp the things of sense, or mental faculties those of reason; and hence that their testimony to such Truth is as trustworthy as is that of scientists or philosophers to truth in their respective fields.
5. That in the course of this spiritual training such men acquire perception of and control over various forces in Nature unknown to others, and thus are able to perform works usually called "miraculous," though really but the result of larger knowledge of natural law.
6. That their testimony as to super-sensuous truth, verified by their possession of such powers, challenges candid examination from every religious mind.

Turning now to the system expounded by these Sages, we find as its main points : —

1. An account of cosmogony, the past and future of this earth and other planets, the evolution of life through mineral, vegetable, animal, and human forms.

2. That the affairs of this world and its people are subject to cyclic laws, and that during any one cycle the rate or quality of progress appertaining to a different cycle is not possible.
3. The existence of a universally diffused and highly ethereal medium, called the "Astral Light" or "Akasa," which is the repository of all past, present, and future events, and which records the effects of spiritual causes and of all acts and thoughts from the direction of either spirit or matter. It may be called the Book of the Recording Angel.
4. The origin, history, development, and destiny of mankind.

Upon the subject of Man it teaches: —

1. That each spirit is a manifestation of the One Spirit, and thus a part of all. It passes through a series of experiences in incarnation, and is destined to ultimate reunion with the Divine.
2. That this incarnation is not single but repeated, each individuality becoming re-embodied during numerous existences in successive races and planets, and accumulating the experiences of each incarnation towards its perfection.
3. That between adjacent incarnations, after grosser elements are first purged away, comes a period of comparative rest and refreshment, the spirit being therein prepared for its next advent into material life.
4. That the nature of each incarnation depends upon the merit and demerit of the previous life or lives, upon the way in which the man has lived and thought; and that this law is inflexible and wholly just.
5. That "Karma," — a term signifying two things, the law of ethical causation (Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap), and the balance or excess of merit or demerit in any individual, determines also the main experiences of joy and sorrow in each incarnation, so that what men call "luck" is in reality "desert," — desert acquired in past existence.
6. That the process of evolution up to reunion with the Divine, contemplates successive elevations from rank to rank of power and usefulness, the most exalted beings still in the flesh being known as Sages, Rishees, Brothers, Masters, their great function being the preservation at all times, and, when cyclic laws permit, the extension, of spiritual knowledge and influence among humanity.

7. That when union with the Divine is effected, all the events and experiences of each incarnation are known.

As to the process of spiritual development it teaches: —

1. That the essence of the process lies in the securing of supremacy to the highest, the spiritual, element of man's nature.
2. That this is obtained along four lines, among others, —
   (a) The eradication of selfishness in all forms, and the cultivation of broad, generous sympathy in and effort for the good of others.
   (b) The cultivation of the inner, spiritual man by meditation, communion with the Divine, and exercise.
   (c) The control of fleshly appetites and desires, all lower, material interests being deliberately subordinated to the behests of the spirit.
   (d) The careful performance of every duty belonging to one's station in life, without desire for reward, leaving results to Divine law.
3. That while the above is incumbent on and practicable by all religiously disposed men, a yet higher plane of spiritual attainment is conditioned upon a specific course of training, physical, intellectual, and spiritual, by which the internal faculties are first aroused and then developed.
4. That an extension of this process is reached in Adeptship, an exalted stage, attained by laborious self-discipline and hardship, protracted through possibly many incarnations, and with many degrees of initiation and preferment, beyond which are yet other stages ever approaching the Divine.

As to the rationale of spiritual development it asserts: —

1. That the process is entirely within the individual himself, the motive, the effort, the result being distinctly personal.

2. That, however personal and interior, this process is not unaided, being possible, in fact, only through close communion with the Supreme Source of all strength.

As to the degree of advancement in incarnations it holds: —

1. That even a mere intellectual acquaintance with Theosophic truth has great value in fitting the individual for a step upwards in his next earth-life, as it gives an impulse in that direction.
2. That still more is gained by a career of duty, piety, and beneficence.
3. That a still greater advance is attained by the attentive and devoted use of the means to spiritual culture heretofore stated.

It may be added that Theosophy is the only system of religion and philosophy which gives satisfactory explanation of such problems as these: —

1. The object, use, and inhabitation of other planets than this earth.
2. The geological cataclysms of earth; the frequent absence of intermediate types in its fauna; the occurrence of architectural and other relics of races now lost, and as to which ordinary science has nothing but vain conjecture; the nature of extinct civilizations and the causes of their extinction; the persistence of savagery and the unequal development of existing civilization; the differences, physical and internal, between the various races of men; the line of future development.
3. The contrasts and unisons of the world's faiths, and the common foundation underlying them all.
4. The existence of evil, of suffering, and of sorrow, — a hopeless puzzle to the mere philanthropist or theologian.
5. The inequalities in social condition and privilege; the sharp contrasts between wealth and poverty, intelligence and stupidity, culture and ignorance, virtue and vileness; the appearance of men of genius in families destitute of it, as well as other facts in conflict with the law of heredity; the frequent cases of unfitness of environment around individuals, so sore as to embitter disposition, hamper aspiration, and paralyze endeavor; the violent antithesis between character and condition; the occurrence of accident, misfortune, and untimely death; — all of them problems solvable only by either the conventional theory of Divine caprice or the Theosophic doctrines of Karma and Re-incarnation.

6. The possession by individuals of psychic powers, — clairvoyance, clair audience, etc., as well as the phenomena of psychometry and statuvolism.
7. The true nature of genuine phenomena in Spiritualism, and the proper antidote to superstition and to exaggerated expectation.
8. The failure of conventional religions to greatly extend their areas, reform abuses, reorganize society, expand the idea of brotherhood, abate discontent, diminish crime, and elevate humanity; and an apparent inadequacy to realize in individual lives the ideal they professedly uphold.

The above is a sketch of the main features of Theosophy, the Wisdom-Religion. Its details are to be found in the rapidly growing literature upon the subject.

The Theosophical Society is an association formed in 1875 with three aims, — to be the nucleus of a Universal Brotherhood; to promote the study of Aryan and other Eastern literatures, religions, and sciences; to investigate unexplained laws of nature and the psychical powers latent in man. ADHESION TO THE FIRST ONLY IS A PREREQUISITE TO MEMBERSHIP, THE OTHERS BEING OPTIONAL. The Society represents no particular creed, is entirely unsectarian, and includes professors of all faiths, only exacting from each member that toleration of the beliefs of others which he desires them to exhibit towards his own.

After reading this somewhat elaborate enumeration of commonly accepted beliefs among Theosophists, the liberal-minded reader must be refreshed and delighted with the closing extract we have given, and especially with the clause we have italicized; for, did the Theosophical Society demand adhesion to all the points of the circular, it would necessarily bar out many of the very most desirable persons who might otherwise seek admission to it. We must never forget that between the one essential dogma of universal brotherhood, and the almost innumerable tentative hypotheses put forward in the circular, there is no necessary ground of common consent. For example, we can hardly see how any Nationalist, or indeed any person admiring the views put forward by Edward Bellamy in "Looking Backward," can possibly dissent from the obligatory article in the creed of Theosophy. We can at the same time most fully sympathize with dissenters from much that is contained in the middle of the circular; but on critical examination we are likely to discover that our only valid objection to some points in the circular is that they are not sufficiently demonstrated by human experience; that they are speculative rather than practical, or that we do not fully understand them.

At the outset of this "Epitome" we are told that Theosophy or Wisdom-Religion is of unknown age, and that it offers us a theory of life founded upon knowledge acquired by ancient sages of the Orient. This claim should certainly be substantiated before any one is expected to indorse it, and it will be our object in this volume to consult the records of the ancient East, to discover what grounds we have for admitting Oriental religions to the category of repositories of divine wisdom.

First and foremost, in all our researches we must ever place Man himself. Anthropology is the king of sciences if theology is their queen; and so inseparably united are anthropology and theology that the one is practically impossible without the other. In some of his sermons Henry Ward Beecher has said that in his opinion the creeds of Christendom began at the wrong end; they should have commenced with man and worked up to God; instead of that they began with God and worked down to man. When Beecher made such statements his temper of thought was distinctly Aryan, and in a sense therefore anti-Semitic; while the creed-makers were intensely Semitic and thus in a sense anti-Aryan, though Semiticism is not necessarily opposed to Aryanism, or vice versa.

The Aryan race contemplates the external universe, and, finding nature, seeks to discover God through nature; the Semitic peoples, on the contrary, apprehend Deity first of all and then account for the objective universe by a system of outward reasoning. We find to-day in the Western world a large preponderance of the Aryan type and habit, which is exactly the type and habit of physical scientists and agnostic philosophers, also of every professed Spiritualist who requires external phenomena to convince him, and rests his assurance of immortality on visual and aural demonstrations of psychic power. But it may readily be asked if the Aryan method is from without to within, while the Semitic is from within to without, how can a Theosophical society ever be Aryan? The answer is simply to this effect: the very persons who most need to study literature and to investigate singular phenomena are of the Aryan type; the truly developed Semitic is intuitive, not rationalistic, and being satisfied to the point of positive and full conviction through the agency of inward testimony, needs no external help such as reading and phenomena supply. Both types can make good Theosophists, but they rarely coalesce in outward methods and seldom work very well together.

Theosophical literature is necessarily largely of an argumentative character, as the great bulk of readers the world over is composed of people who rely more on intellect than intuition. The most intuitive are rarely book-worms. In ancient days, in Israel, when there was "open vision," when prophets were abundant, and the gift of seership carefully nurtured in the young, very little value, comparatively speaking, was placed on sacred manuscripts or the written law. When Solomon's Temple was in all its splendor and the Hebrew faith shone at its brightest, the people depended upon the living voice of the prophet far more than on the records of a more spiritual age; for in the days of spiritual dispensation the oracle was alive and accessible. After a time, largely through the materiality of the affections of the people, prophets became fewer, the voice of the living spirit waxed fainter and ever fainter, till after a while not only the Torah, or written law, but the Talmud Midrash and a host of other rabbinical commentaries which exalted the Levitical to the level of the Mosaic law, were venerated by the multitude almost as highly as the Decalogue; until after a while the law and the testimony were looked to as final authorities from whose decision there must be no appeal. Then began the age of spiritual decadence for the Hebrew race, and the substitution of books for living inspiration. Precisely the same error has been fallen into by the Hindu race, who from being at one time the most enlightened among all the people on the earth, have become in many respects painfully degraded, though the author of this volume distinctly refuses credence to the sensational and exaggerated accounts of Hindoo degradation, gotten up by sensationalists with a view to exalting the Christian religion and Western institutions at the expense of justice to India and her native population.

But to return to prophecy and writings. Prophecy is incapable of long continuance when prophets are persecuted persistently by people who will not hear the message they have to deliver; i.e. prophecy in public soon ceases. While the race of prophets never becomes extinct, when these illumined ones are driven from the surface of society through the belligerent force of brutal and determined persecution, they betake themselves to solitudes where they still carry on a work for humanity. The nature of such work ought to be appreciated by all Spiritualists, Mental Healers, and those in general who attribute a potency to silent, invisible forces not credited to such forces by the unspiritual, material mind, which laughs at everything not evident to physical sense. Whenever a period of re-awakened interest in spiritual truth invites the prophetic mind to emerge from privacy, and proclaim openly the knowledge long concealed, we hear of a revival of all kinds of psychic gifts; and while at such periods a good deal of impurity comes to the surface, this passes off as scum from the mind of society, while beneath this external rubbish is discovered genuine knowledge and love of truth.

The Israelites and the Aryans have alike, through long periods of outward darkness, never lost sight of the lamp of divine wisdom burning within, though this pure and holy light has been for long periods almost entirely concealed from the masses. In this brighter and freer age the flames are beginning to leap high once more upon the altars of humanity, and the new order will not be fully inaugurated without severe conflict with the "powers of darkness." The light now breaking is clearly destined to illumine a large portion of the earth within the next few years, so as to completely change the social and religious aspects of affairs in the now advancing regions of the earth, while to those portions of the world not prepared for the full blaze of this re-illumination a certain measure of light will also be accorded, sufficient at least to greatly ameliorate the condition of the teeming multitudes now subject to tyrannical misrule. Theosophy strikes out for vital and permanent reform by laying the axe at the root of the tree to be destroyed, instead of lopping off the withering branches, or here and there cutting off a vigorous limb. The affections of humanity must be appealed to, or there can be no reformation which will endure. The history of every great and successful movement clearly demonstrates this proposition. When Luther and his coadjutors effected a complete change in the attitude of a large part of Europe to the Roman Catholic Church in the sixteenth century, the great success of their work depended upon the readiness of the popular mind to accept the proposed changes in ecclesiastical polity, as well as to accept many modifications of doctrine. The Reformation was rendered possible only through the disaffection previously in the minds of the people toward the established religious hierarchy; and this disaffection was brought about through the ambitious worldliness of the Church officials themselves. Had popes, cardinals, prelates, and all under them fulfilled the spiritual law, and concerned themselves with the peaceful establishment and maintenance of a heavenly kingdom on earth, there could have been no butchery in the name of religion. To justify persecution is insane; to attribute it to religious conviction is a great mistake. Persecutors are at the start ambitious individuals thirsting for material dominion, and, moreover, persons who will not hesitate, under pressure of seeming necessity, to use religion as a cloak for licentiousness.

Religion to-day is again under a cloud all over the world, entirely owing to the prelatical ambition which has been substituted for the meek and gentle temper of all the world's greatest seers and sages. To contrast Jesus with Gautama is but to compare two great human ideals and find them one; for deep in the heart of humanity a deep and tender love of sweet and gentle righteousness is ever to be found. Now this sweet gentleness which shines so conspicuously in the highest human ideals, is by no means the accompaniment of meek submissiveness to error. No man can be so brave as a true gentleman; but the difference between the gentleman and the boor is properly the difference between homo and vir, the former term standing in old Latin for an ordinary animal-fighting man, the latter for a superior being in whom the distinctively super-animal dispositions of manhood are in the ascendency. Bulwer Lytton, in his truly theosophical romance, "The Coming Race," aptly styles the marvellous people whom he describes Vril-Ya, while the vril they gather from all nature and control perfectly is the universal ether, akasa, or astral force so often spoken of by students of the occult sciences. This subtle, all-pervading force is amenable to the control of a high order of intelligence only, and while universally present in nature, cannot be manipulated and utilized except by persons in whom the lower principle (homo) is subservient to the higher principle (vir). Thus, while a man who has cultivated nothing but his animal nature (anima bruta) is simply a biped in human shape, and quite at the mercy of savage creatures and the elements, one who has unfolded to some degree his intellectual or human self, which makes him man instead of brute, though possessed thereby of ability beyond the savage, is still quite without the superlative power of those in whom the spiritual soul (anima divina) is liberated and expressed. Such words as virile and virility are shamefully misapplied in popular usage, as they clearly spring from the root word vir, which the Latins never used except in connection with quite super-animal, and properly with super-intellectual attainments. Man, to be able to control any element outside his own personality, must first have brought that element into obedience to its rightful superior, within the economy of his own nature. This open secret, as it may be termed, considering it is a secret from the multitude, and yet free to all who are desirous of learning how to live truly and healthily, will explain the just cause of relative successes and failures in all pursuits and enterprises where something more than animal vigor and ordinary intelligence are needed to produce results.

Theosophical teachings are ignorantly scorned by many people who are every day of their existence confronted with difficult problems Theosophy alone can solve. We can only pity and seek to enlighten, if but a little, those prejudiced ones among Spiritualists and Mental Healers alike, who are subject to every kind of difficulty and unpleasant experience through lack of a better comprehension of the forces they are trying to govern, but which in their present state of incapable ignorance are governing them and often making sport of them most mercilessly. As much is constantly being said and written concerning astral force, astral light, astral bodies, etc., let us go to our Greek lexicons for a definition of the word astral, before endeavoring to use it. Astron means a star, and from astron, astral is clearly derived. Now the word astral, which means pertaining to the stars, starry, and starlike, may be properly applied to that force, substance, ether, body light, etc., of which stars are formed, and also to whatever is inter-stellar, or between stars, and to that which shines like a star. Astral is, then, a very wide word. First, it designates the inner substance of the planet and the inner body of man. In expression we may speak of three elements, — spirit, force, and matter: the astral realm is the realm of force, which exists between spirit and matter and is the bond uniting them. But at this point we are sure to be asked if we are not retracting many statements in "Spiritual Therapeutics" and other of our works, wherein we declare, that essentially all is spirit, and therefore there is nothing but spirit in the permanent life of man? We contend that as the greater can always contain the less, while the less cannot possibly hold the greater, spirit can include force, and force can include matter. Matter is but an emanation of force, a temporary solidification of force, and not the whole of force at any time; and this statement is, we contend, acceptable to chemistry which teaches by experiment that all of matter is resolvable into ether, while all of ether cannot be converted into solids or fluids. Spirit is the cause of all things, and itself the primal and ultimate No Thing of the Mystics, yet is beyond all things, and is the cause of all. Force is its earlier manifestation, matter being its ultimated expression.

Now as man has always conceived of an inner and an outer body, a body of force and a body of matter, he has instinctively felt that the force body could travel from star to star, while the material body is confined to the earth, held by the force of gravity. All spiritual manifestations of a phenomenal order are simply exhibitions of force triumphing over matter, and may be produced through the agency of adepts or magicians (great or wise people is the true meaning of magicians) either in or out of their earthly expression. The mistake made by uncultured Spiritualists is, that they do not recognize the power of the adept as identical with that of the human entity disrobed of mortal form; but so far from genuine Spiritualism and Theosophy conflicting at this point, they perfectly agree, as Spiritualism teaches most emphatically that there is no sudden removal from a state of moral and mental impotency on earth, to all-powerfulness in the state immediately following bodily dissolution. The only reasons we can assign for the stupid opposition to Theosophy shown by many seemingly zealous Spiritualists, are, that they have not fully outgrown the dogmas of the churches they often berate, or they are quite ignorant of the real teaching of Theosophy, which is that the higher principle in man must control the lower, or he cannot be a wonder-worker on this side of the grave or the other; growth alone determining and regulating his measure of power. A very vulgar error is that the invisible world has some stated geographical situation; the truth is that it is everywhere, interpenetrating every particle of seemingly inert matter. A. J. Davis, in his "Stellar Key to the Summer Land," and similar works, undertaking to locate heavens, may be correct in some sense, though such works are apt to mislead the reader who carries to them a mind filled with theories of locality. All outward conditions are expressions of interior states; as a man thinketh so will he come to appear, gradually if not instantly, and surely all students of antenatal causes for afflictions, etc., must get their eyes open to the fact that mental conditions clearly produce bodily results.

Throughout the entire universe every outward globe or physical expression of an unseen force is a result of some psychical wave of action, unknown save to students of the occult (hidden or invisible) forces of nature. Occult or astral force is of all conceivable grades of refinement and density, and offers precisely the same resistance to what is commonly called the spiritual body that matter offers to the physical organism. Theosophy teaches us that as we, through purer and higher modes of thought and action, outgrow our animal propensities, being no longer governed by the lower grades of invisible forces, we shall be able to control them, and thus at length be able to demonstrate our complete victory over all material surroundings. The most exciting portions of the book of Daniel, so eagerly devoured by children, are profound occult narratives, and even if taken literally are neither ridiculous nor improbable, as man can fully overcome the ferocity of the beast and even the action of fire. Eventually, through unfolding of the higher principle within us, all things shall appear possible which are utterly impossible to our animal, and also to our simply intellectual, soul. Try to consider the astral world simply as the inner world, "the soul of things" approached through psychometry, and the difficulty will soon vanish when we find the psychic realm everywhere, and learn that dominion over lower grades of force and complete conquest over matter is a result attainable only as we persistently develop our higher, and through so doing subordinate our lower, nature.

LECTURE III.

THE WORK AND POSSIBILITIES OF THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY AND ITS BRANCHES.

(An address intended for delivery on the occasion of a General Conference, slightly altered in form to adapt it to this volume.)

EVERY lover of Theosophy, or the Wisdom-Religion of mankind, must hail with delight every indication of unity among seekers after truth, and feel deep regret at whatever is calculated to divide into groups and factions, antagonistic the one to the other, those who are striving to leave this world a little brighter than they found it. In view of this, does it not behoove us to contend most earnestly for the grand, solid basis of our sublime universal religion, and leave as subject for speculative inquiry only those moot questions and contested doctrines over which so many honest, good-meaning people stumble and fall? Re-incarnation, for instance, is a teaching which many earnest minds find very difficult to accept. Devachan, as ordinarily explained or not explained, is another serious obstacle; while astral bodies, shells, the reliquæ of the departed, etc., as instrumental in the production of alleged spiritual manifestations, are again other matters calculated to divide rather than unite seekers after truth.

Now Theosophy is founded on a recognition of eternal and essential justice supreme in the universe. The great value of the ethics of Theosophy consists in the fact that they do most emphatically present the idea of infinite, undeviating justice to the mind, and whatever may be said to the contrary by its opponents, this much-vexed question of repeated embodiments harmonizes exactly with absolute uncompromising equity. But is it the dogma of embodiments or the principle of equity for which we should most zealously contend? Is it not quite thinkable that many persons, while acknowledging the existence and claim of equity, do not see the necessity of re-incarnation to indicate and illustrate supreme justice? If they can, or if they feel they can, account for the manifold inequalities of this present state without having recourse to the hypothesis of successive embodiments, are we not unwise if we lay overmuch stress on that hypothesis?

We are never forgetful of the fact that brotherhood is the only crucial test of Theosophy; still there are sometimes persons in the theosophical camp who make re-embodiment too prominent. This charge may with all kindliness of advisory suggestion be preferred perhaps against Mrs. Sinnett's generally excellent work, "The Purpose of Theosophy," and other publications of similar import by different authors. Let all vexed problems be submitted for thoughtful consideration to the public mind; and even though the Oriental Scriptures and the Masters do appear to teach certain things very plainly in the letter of their instructions, are we always right in feeling sure that we are not sometimes unwittingly substituting exotericism for esotericism in our deductions and avowals, in this connection? (vide the introductory chapter of Madame Blavatsky's grandest and most recent work, "The Secret Doctrine," wherein she convicts Mr. Sinnett of falling into some error of this kind, though with the best possible intentions, in his much valued work, "Esoteric Buddhism"). Some deliverances of Theosophists in the past have been too acrid, many have been far too dogmatic. As we all learn by experience, let us not regret the past, but strive to profit by the lessons we may learn from its imperfections, and for the future let us cling more to essentials and divide less on speculative matters.

Another very important question is the avoidance of personal squabbles and the disagreeable canvassing of private reputations. In the case of the late controversy over the authorship of "Light on the Path," a great deal of most unseemly strife has been ventilated in public print. Recriminations and counter-recriminations cannot thus see the light without imposing on the Theosophical movement an onus of ugliness it has no right or reason to carry. Reprehensible in the extreme as the conduct of the Religio-Philosophical Journal of Chicago has been in connection with this and kindred subjects, we cannot honestly say that The Path or even Lucifer or The Theosophist have been quite free from deserved criticism in this respect. What the earnest truth-seeker needs is not a recital of how, why, when, and where parties fall out and call each other hard names; but a cautious yet frank presentation, and as far as possible elucidation, of great spiritual and psychical problems demanding solution at the hands of all who are earnestly seeking aid to walk in the path of genuine spiritual development and higher mental and physical culture. The great need of the present day, as it appears to us at least, is not wordy discussion over obscure mysteries, but practical co-operation to the end of establishing the reign of righteousness on earth.

Sometimes we think the sure though apparently dilatory outworking of the law of Karma is too much, because too blindly, insisted on. We hear very frequently, indeed, that so-and-so cannot come into the light, cannot be healed, etc., by reason of his or her Karma, accumulated in previous existences. Without questioning there being such Karma, and without denying it is a hindrance in many instances, we would still most particularly urge the object of disciplinary embodiment, which is surely to vanquish and overcome, not to yield or submit to, refractory Karma. Karma is a persistent force in constant operation. Every thought, word, and deed makes or unmakes Karma; but as it is a question of the strength of the effort put forward, not the length of time consumed in putting forward such effort, which determines its effectiveness, we cannot be too urgent in assuring all who are in any measure desirous of attaining a higher station, that though they cannot skip any of the rounds in the ladder of Progression, they can accelerate their transit over them. The practical questions of the day cannot be settled on a physical basis; they must be dealt with spiritually, or (satisfactorily) not at all.

The special object, then, of organization with theosophical intent should be to place before the inquiring public the tenets of Theosophy in as simple and practical a manner as possible. This is, happily, now being done, to some extent at least, by the many excellent and well-attended open meetings of the various lodges in the different cities where such lodges have been established. The membership in these lodges is constantly increasing, and the influx of new members is most encouraging, as they are chiefly persons of high mental attainments and noble moral aspirations. We could easily congratulate the Theosophical Society at large on what it has already accomplished in the right direction, and when we point out where the blunders have been made, it is only with a view to their future avoidance and present rectification as far as possible. The Theosophical Publication Society has issued many excellent pamphlets at a very moderate price, but to some of them at least two exceptions may be taken. Some are so extremely transcendental, that, while of interest and value to scholars, they are quite beyond the comprehension of the very persons whom literary efforts of a missionary character are specially intended to reach. This is, however, our minor objection; our major criticism we reserve for those publications and utterances which deal less fairly with Christianity than with Buddhism. Now we know that as soon as Christian people begin to look into Theosophy they are apt to feel justly offended at a manifest partiality for Buddha and relative disparagement of Christ. This attitude may be natural to persons who have become disgusted with the superficiality and hypocrisy, alas! so prevalent in Christendom, and who, in the first flush of their ardor at sight of the excellences in Hinduism, hasten to pay their tribute to the latter and expose the fallacies of the former. Such precipitation is, however, exceedingly unwise, as it does not bear the impress of profound research or sober judgment, and inevitably gives occasion for attack on Oriental religions of the most spiteful and damaging kind. It is the purpose of Theosophy to show the truth in all religions, not to hold up one religion as so very much truer than all beside it; to prove how, in remote lands and distant ages widely separated by space and time, the same pearl of measureless price has been discovered by untiring travellers toward the goal of perfection. Lady Caithness, in "The Mystery of the Ages," has contributed to this benign accomplishment in a queenly manner: would that other authors had been equally happy in elucidating the theme! That very valuable author, Franz Hartmann, in his "Jehoshua, the Prophet of Nazareth," has said very much that is true and beautiful concerning the character and life of the great adept whom all Christendom reveres, as a unique master in wisdom; but he has, in our judgment, marred and enfeebled a portion of his treatise by putting a very low construction on the cursing of the barren fig-tree, the driving of money-changers from the temple, and other similar incidents in the life of Jesus as recorded by the Evangelists, when a much higher interpretation of these incidents would have been far more esoteric, profitable, and therefore theosophical. Whenever Gautama, the saintly hero, whom Edwin Arnold so beautifully styles "The Light of Asia," is alluded to, no such aspersions are cast as are frequently cast on Jesus; and why is it, if not because a certain poetical glamour is thrown over Buddhism and all pertaining to it in the minds of Mr. Hartmann and other authors who adopt the style he uses, while these persons are by no means so friendly to Christianity? While very much of Gerald Massey's writing is painfully harsh and external, he, notwithstanding his violent prejudice against the Christian religion, makes many excellent points when in his review of "The Historical Jesus and the Gnostic Christ," he endeavors to refine away all personal ideas of the logos, making the essential Christ the highest element in man, and in no sense an outward historical personage.

The personal controversies over which so much blood was spilled in the Middle Ages, and which are the cause of so much waste of nervous force as well as ink and paper to-day, are but bubbles on the surface of thought. It is clearly impossible to either verify or disprove a literal history of a personal Christ or Buddha in any satisfactory way. At the same time it is not impossible or even difficult to show that there is indeed a light enlightening every man; and this light, though existent in all men, and capable of expression through all, has been expressed in a marvellous degree by some few of the world's exceptionally wise and illumined teachers. The work of Theosophists in America and Europe should be identical with what they are endeavoring to do in Asia. Missionaries have been sent to the East to tell the Orientals that they are in danger of everlasting misery unless they turn from their religion and scripture to the books and opinions held sacred in the West. Missionary enterprise is almost as futile in India, China, and Japan as is the work of that most ineffective organization, "The Society for promoting Christianity among the Jews," which so persistently asks assistance in countless churches every year on Good Friday. The real value of the theosophical movement in Asia is, that it is helping Asiatics to understand their own religion, by expounding truth to them through the use of a language and literature to which they are accustomed. In Europe and America the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures are in every one's hand; the Vedas and Puranas are not. Why not, then, prove the identity of the spirit of all religion, by using, wherever we may be, the literature with which the people are familiar? and, by letting them see the identity of the revelation made in both hemispheres help on gloriously, expeditiously, the realization of our common brotherhood, — a work which can never be effectuated by disparaging one scripture to enthrone another in popular esteem.

The Bible as we have it is full of Theosophy; so are all Oriental scriptures. The same great truths are clearly or obscurely proclaimed in all, according to the clearness or obscurity which marks the reader's mind. Mohini M. Chatterji, the young Brahman who started out on a missionary tour through Europe and America some few years ago, did a grand work in publishing a new translation in English of the Bhagavad-Gítá, with notes and references to the New Testament, in which he tells his Christian readers that he need not convert them, nor need they convert him to a new religion, for the faith of the Orient and of the Occident is essentially the same. Theosophy being the great undercurrent of spiritual meaning running through all the great writings extant all over the world, no matter when, where, or by whom originally produced, can only be brought to light and do its work as it removes the veil of the letter which kills and gets killed and exposes the Spirit, which ever lives and is the giver of immortal life to all who realize its presence and its sway. With this thought uppermost in our affections and intellects, we can go forth to spread glad tidings over all the earth.

As a further suggestion for increasing the efficiency of the work of all branches of the Theosophical Society, wherever established or about to be established, we would urge upon all members of the various lodges the great desirability, we may add necessity, of members cultivating the society of each other, meeting together as often as practicable at each others' houses where no lodge-room is permanently available. At such meetings the central aim should be to discover how nearly these good people can come together in thought and feeling, and what particular spheres of usefulness they may individually occupy best. It is of little advantage for people to join societies, and acknowledge their adhesion to a great bond of union, if they do not embrace and seek to create opportunities and occasions for mutual converse and help. The work of many a society languishes because of the members not acting in accordance with a due recognition of the tie of brotherhood; while much inspiration is lost by two or three fluent speakers or able writers being looked to at all times, under all circumstances, to furnish food for the mental digestion of all the rest. Timidity and bashfulness should have no place among brothers and sisters; fear of criticism or of being misunderstood should never seal the lips of one who feels he has aught to say for the edification of the assemblage. To underrate our powers or mask our gifts, to fight off inspirations and disown ability, is not humility, but pride masquerading as its opposite virtue.

Above all, in thought, word, and deed let us be charitable in our judgments, the one of the other. This grand old grace, charity, placed by Paul above faith and hope, above prophecy, and tongues, and all beside, is the virtue we so sorely lack to-day. The absence of it from our midst is the cause of the weaknesses and dissensions among us, and its absence among those who profess better things is really unpardonable as well as pitiable. The abnegation of the lower self, about which we hear and talk and write so much, is impossible to us unless we studiously cultivate the higher self. And while the prohibitory form of some of the commandments which constitute the decalogue make it at first sight appear that the highest conception of the ancient Israelites was to refrain from iniquity, we must not forget that the two great affirmative commands on which Jesus declared all the law and prophets depend, are Jewish utterances, taken out of the Old Testament and placed in the New, as proof of the identity of the counsels of Jesus with those of the great legislators and prophets who preceded him and lived long before his day. Thou shalt love with all thy heart and mind whatever is good, practically means that we are to so cultivate love for good as to find it engrossing our every thought and feeling, leaving no possible room for its opposite. Truth, when spoken in love, is always powerful and convincing. As it lays hold upon the human intellect and heart at one and the same moment, it is both sweet and reasonable to describe it in terms especially dear to the friends and admirers of Matthew Arnold, and men who, like him, have sought to unite reason and affection in all presentations of truth. How much unreasonable sweetness and anything but sweet rationalizing there is in modern literature, converse, and oratory, we need not attempt to decide. That there is far, far too much for the peace and safety of society and the effectual spread of truth, none can deny. It being the special purpose of Theosophy to present wisdom lovingly, and to culture the affections to love wisely, no work is in reality theosophical; i.e. wise in the divine, loving sense which does not address itself to reason and affection both at once. Some persons are certainly far more emotional than intellectual; others again far more rational than affectionate. Both classes are capable of doing excellent work for the general good, but the two are better united in one. The old words, "It is not good for man to be alone," recur to us at this point. Many of our readers are doubtless familiar with the Kabalistic interpretation of that text. The Kabalists, not being believers in any such thing as absolute or essential evil in the constitution of the universe or man, declared the true meaning of the word evil to be simply imperfection; less than perfect state is called an evil state. In many of us the Adam (intellect) is without its complementary Eve (affection). We are therefore not good, i.e. not perfect. This imperfection of ours is the cause of our irregularities, antagonisms, and general ineffectiveness. As we become inwardly married, and as this inward union manifests outwardly, we shall appear good, perfect, lacking nothing, as the apostle James speaks of those who are filled with divine wisdom, which he contrasts so finely with that unmentionable wisdom of sensuality described as devilish. As we can none of us, to use the old correspondential imagery employed in Genesis, partake of the fruit of the tree of life and also of that of the forbidden tree of knowledge of good and evil, we have to look well to ourselves to see that the serpent of our lower nature does not tempt us to transgress the divine commandment engraven on the imperishable tablets of our own immortal nature. The thirst for knowledge is good, and if we gratify it aright we partake of the fruit of the tree of life, which the Apocalypse tells us yields twelve manners of fruit, — one variety every month, — so that the fruit is sufficient to satisfy the needs of the whole year, through what it signifies. If we are actuated by sordid motives, and seek to become magicians of the lower type, we shall surely forfeit our ability to partake of the fruit of the celestial tree and to drink of the perennial spring of life-giving water.

This expressive imagery is not hard to interpret among students of such literature as now issues from the press, filled with references to a higher and a lower principle in man. Bishop Butler, author of the famous "Analogy," formerly considered an unanswerable vindication of the Christian religion, was without doubt a Theosophist, even if he knew it not, as in his analysis of the component elements which make up man as we at present see him, he described all as good in their place and for some special purpose, but gave the crown and palm of precedence and sovereignty to a spiritual element, — none other than the atma or highest principle in the human constitution, insisted upon as supreme by all initiates and their pupils. The intellectual soul of man is surely placed midway between the anima bruta seat of all selfish desires and the anima divina seat of all spiritual promptings. The Adams and Eves (reasoning and affectional impulses) of our distinctively human principle are always oscillating between obedience to the voice of the divine and the voice of the animal. We must choose to obey one or the other; both we cannot follow, for no man can serve two masters, however much he may desire to do so. We cannot look in two directions at once, though we can turn our heads round, and look first in one, then in the other direction. We cannot be going up and down hill at the same moment, nor can we sail toward the equator and toward the pole at the same instant. Theosophy places before us most clearly and solemnly the responsibility and consequence of choice. We cannot stand still long, if at all; we must move up or down, forward or backward. Which shall it be, God or Mammon? Christ or Belial? We cannot choose both.

Theosophy, taking as it does all fictitious dread of divine wrath and an ever-burning hell from the minds of man, substitutes for these nightmares of unreason the inevitable law of sequence, Karma, cause and effect. By placing the judge and judgment seat within instead of without us, it renders rational the thought of judgment; but by so doing it does but impress the idea of a judgment from which none can escape the more firmly in our minds. Believers in vicarious sacrifice, in the old false view of forgiveness, and other dogmas of externalism, may always hope to evade the consequences of their lives, but Theosophy offers no such loophole of escape. Sin can be outgrown, but penalty is never cancelled. Man makes his own heaven or his own hell. The sources of our joy or misery are within us; and as we cannot escape from ourselves, we cannot be happy or see the divine kingdom until we have grown into an affectionate appreciation of eternal law; then shall we have risen superior to hope of reward and dread of punishment alike. Happiness will then be our unasked boon, our unsought treasure; for as happiness follows righteousness within, as night follows day and day again succeeds to night, heaven and happiness will then be ours forever.

MIRACLES AND MODERN THOUGHT.

CONTINUING the thread of our study from our remarks in the past three discourses, we find ourselves brought face to face with the great problem of miracle in the light of nineteenth century criticism. "Robert Elsmere" might supply us with a text for the basis of this study. "Miracles do not happen," which Mrs. Humphrey Ward rightly says is but a restatement of Hume's old argument.

Watching the drifts of modern skeptical inquiry none of us can be blind to the fact that so-called liberalism or radicalism is daily and hourly tending nearer and nearer the unsatisfactory point of historical and actual negation.

Learning in a purely critical direction seems to be one long wearisome process of unlearning; long cherished beliefs and attachments have all to be given up, and the weary restless mind of the scholar must either dismiss the subject with a sigh or allow himself to be carried on by the stream of doubt to where he at length finds himself forever banished from the supernatural and confronted with a stern, inexorable, natural order from which there can be no deviation in time or eternity. A rationalistic view of history allows no place for a resurrection or an ascension, as it allows no opportunity for a miraculous birth; it is inexorably committed to inevitable natural law and enforces the reign of law everywhere as a dogma of the creed of necessity.

At first sight such a consummation is greatly to be dreaded, as it would drive out of the world all art, poetry, romance, and all beside that appears most attractive to a loving and sensitive disposition; but when inspected a little more closely after the shock of disillusion has been recovered from, the new view of life which science and philosophy alike compel us to take, instead of being the cold barren one it at first seemed to be, soon glows with a life, love, and beauty vastly superior to any excellence we can find in the old discarded system from which it may have cost us such agony to cut loose. Our object on this occasion is not, however, to leave the subject in the hands of Hume or any other negative or speculative philosopher; we are not disposed to deal with negations, nor to remain contented with any attitude of denial; for in our eyes doubt and denial are but dark passage ways leading from one lighted gallery to another, and that other larger and brighter than the one left behind.

Now what does the word miracle mean when rightly defined? It is interpreted in several dictionaries as "an act or event beyond human power," while the word miraculous in the same lexicons is defined supernatural and also wonderful. Now this word miracle is evidently an elastic one, for wonderful things are by no means necessarily supernatural; nor are events beyond human power necessarily above nature, for do we not witness natural occurrences every day far beyond man's power to produce. We certainly include insects in our definitions of natural productions; but while any one can easily destroy millions of them, who can create even one? Spontaneous generation is a mere "will o' the wisp," utterly unsubstantiated by any kind of scientific experiment. Life then is miraculous, insects are miraculous, because the wonderful ways of spirit breathing itself into outward expression even in the minutest forms of terrestrial existence are utterly beyond human power to duplicate, or at least beyond such development of human ability as we are at present acquainted with. Now there are three ways of accounting for events usually styled miracles. First, they are defined by orthodox theologians, as supernatural in the strictest sense, i.e. God has stepped aside from his ordinary method of governing the world by natural law and has astonished its inhabitants by a display of His power to suspend the operation of his own law. Second, they are defined by skeptics of every name as non-historical or unreal occurrences, partaking of the nature of imaginary narratives or fairy tales, and are to be accounted for only by attributing belief in them to human ignorance and credulity. Third, they are regarded by spiritual scientists as unusual displays of an occult force in the universe which ever exists and which can and will reproduce such phenomena whenever the necessary conditions are afforded. With the first and second explanations we do not care particularly to deal, as the ground has been so long and ably covered by arguers in favor of both those theories; it is with the third position only we feel ourselves called upon to deal extensively at any time, as we cannot but feel this reasonable, moderate, and satisfactory view is the only one which makes history really intelligible, and the past record of mankind to accord with the scientific and spiritual developments of the present. Now, plainly the author of "Robert Elsmere" has not grasped this position, she has made her hero recoil from the supernatural and embrace the skeptical, though to do her justice, his skepticism is not of an objectionable type, and does not in the least interfere with his complete acceptance of all truth generally necessary to a noble and successful life.

It is from the scientific and experimental rather than from the theological or moral standpoint that we take exception to the statement, "miracles do not happen," in the sense in which the words are used in her narrative; for while, undoubtedly, events commonly called miraculous are only wonderful or unusual and do not owe their origin to any interference with universal law, the impression given to the ordinary mind, is that the alleged events never took place, and that similar events never can take place, there being a law to prevent them.

Now, to state our position clearly before proceeding further: In the strictly etymological sense of the term, a miracle is simply a surprising occurrence, not necessarily due to any approach toward a suspension of universal law, but on the contrary exhibiting the power in operation of a hitherto unknown or unrecognized though eternally-existing law. The phonograph, which reproduced the performance of a military band at the Presidio to an amazed and delighted audience in the centre of San Francisco, wrought a miracle in the ears of those who could not comprehend how tones could be thus mysteriously recorded, preserved, and reproduced at will by a subtle but unpretending little scientific instrument which in common with every really valuable discovery of to-day owes its potency to man's ever-increasing familiarity with electricity and its uses.

Electricity is the future motor, indeed it is the only motor if men did but know it; but electricity works in obedience to an unchanging law, and this law is subject to will, as all law is the product and expression of will; therefore, as man's will becomes ever more and more free from sordid material entanglement he gains ever greater and greater ascendancy over the subtlest and most potential of all the forces which are really only different modes of operation of one sole force — electricity. In his review or rather, somewhat severe criticism of "Robert Elsmere," William Ewart Gladstone, who is a good theologian as well as a distinguished statesman, shows the incompleteness of "Elsmere's" position by pointing out the serious omission always made by those who repudiate miracles on the score of their being impossible owing to the continuous operation of a fixed law of necessity governing the entire universe; this important omission, which is the reason of the failure of their arguments to reach conclusiveness, is their blindness to the very nature of the law for whose immutability and omnipresence they are such earnest sticklers. Law is not and cannot be apart from legislation, and legislation necessitates a legislator; this legislator is will. Now man is an embodied expression of divine will, and thus all intelligent Theosophists have from the very earliest days understood the esoteric meaning of the text, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me."

The authors of the Synoptics were genealogists, historians, biographers, to a considerable extent at least; they began their gospels with reference to the lineal descent of Jesus from David, or they recorded some incident connected with his early life. Remember we are not questioning the spiritual or correspondential meaning of the first three gospels, we are simply alluding to their literal form which is in such decided contrast with the fourth or gnostic gospel, which without the slightest preparation, or the faintest reference to literal history, plunges at once into a clear but mystical interpretation of the Word. Greek scholars and all who have studied Plato will at once perceive in the Word of John a reaffirmation of the logos of Plato.

Now it was the endeavor of whoever wrote the fourth gospel to impress upon his hearers the eternity and divinity of the essential spirit of man. The logos of the Greeks means exactly the same as the atma of the Hindus, which Theosophists term the seventh and highest principle in the constitution of man. This seventh principle, as it is termed, is the immortal principle, the Alpha and Omega, that from which all lower principles are expressed and by virtue of which alone they can exist.

Now in the days of Jesus there seems to have been a singular and depressing distrust of human goodness and greatness in the world; sin and weakness everywhere abounded, and among the Jews this loss of personal goodness, this failure to maintain a genuine high record for righteousness, was sapping the very foundations of collective and individual safety. Judea was already a Roman province, the hated name of Cæsar was the synonym of government, and while there were no end of religious quacks endeavoring to heal the communal body by disgraceful processes of anarchy and venality, the truly wise and great among the Israelites were beginning to feel the force of the teaching of Jesus, who forbade them under penalty of inevitable ruin to employ ferocious measures or in any way to retaliate upon their conquerors. Jesus came as a Hebrew reformer, to save and bless his own countrymen first, then to spread the gospel of truth over the whole world; but he clearly believed that Jerusalem was the rightful centre of civilization at that time, and from the Hebrew race he taught enlightenment was to go forth to the uttermost parts of the earth. As he interpreted the moral law much as Isaiah, Jeremiah and other prophets had interpreted it previously, he won for himself the cordial detestation of religious hypocrites and political demagogues, who together conspired against him because his teachings stirred up the people to noble independence of thought and feeling, and tended to wrest the reins of government from the hands of tyrants and establish by peaceable means a kingdom of heaven on earth; not a republic where vox populi vox Dei would be the accepted motto, but a political and social state in which the cream of society would rise to the surface and be acknowledged, no matter whether it rose from the ranks of titled nobility or humble fishermen.

Jesus was neither a monarchist nor a democrat, in that he points out the weakness of both schools, and seeks to lead his disciples to the understanding of a practical utopian government in which righteousness must prevail because of men's love for it. Now in a sensation-loving age we are told by men of the skeptical school of thought that Jesus had to appeal to the love of the marvelous in those about him, and we are further informed that the tendency of those times was to exalt miracle so highly that sensational wonder-working would win popularity for a cause which otherwise would fail for lack of sustenance. Taking its stand on that assertion, this school seeks to account for the rise and spread of Christianity on the basis of alleged miracle, though of course, the skeptical intellect says, "miracles never happen," and though Jesus and his followers may have been honest they were fanatical, and subject to illusions, while those who came after them were still more fanciful and not always honest, as these later Christians according to all testimony, invented miraculous stories without stint, to propagate their peculiar doctrines, and most of all to gain for themselves undisputed ascendancy over the minds and property of a credulous, ungodly, illiterate multitude.

Now every skeptical objection, however plausible, when put forward on these lines utterly fails to explain away miracles or to account for the spread of Christianity in the first century. Miracles, it is true, were and are very popular among the credulous who are never weary of startling exhibitions of occult power, and who are indeed so well pleased with successful sleight-of-hand and other feats of dexterity, that they do not at all object to be deceived if their credulity is fed. Miracle-mongers and believers in miracles were very common all over the Roman Empire in the days of Jesus, and long afterward, and from this fact alone we may logically conclude that the simply miraculous element had exceedingly little to do with the spread of primitive Christianity; for why, in the name of reason let it be asked, should people abandon one miraculous system for another when the latter was no more miraculous than the former? It is at this point that miracles require classification as well as definition. Miracles may be divided into four classes: —

First, Ordinary events which are only regarded as miraculous by persons afflicted with over-strung nerves whose diseased condition causes them to attribute everything unusual or mysterious to supernatural agency. In connection with such occurrences as are termed miracles by hysterically disposed persons, must be classed, of course, those subjective experiences of their own, which have no actual form for any but the nervous beholder.

Second, Genuine exhibitions of some occult power, such as mesmerism, thought reading, etc., which must always create intense surprise and be looked upon either as divine or diabolical, until the simple, rational explanation of such phenomena shall be scientifically published and accepted by the world in general. Under this heading we would place all genuine occult phenomena which apparently accomplish neither appreciable good or harm, but simply amaze the witnesses and set them to wondering how such things can be.

Third, All unscrupulous exercise of occult power, sometimes denominated "black magic," and now often designated malicious mesmerism; in the Middle Ages regarded as dealing with the devil, and in very ancient times designated sorcery, witchcraft, necromancy, etc., and sternly forbidden many times by Hebrew prophets and legislators and also by wise and good men in all countries. Under this caption we should include all abuse of psychic power, which is of course reprehensible, as the perversion of any faculty must be a source of danger to the individual and society.

Fourth, Divine magic, which is none other than the work of those true adepts or initiates, who have in every age and place so subdued the flesh to the spirit, that they have developed extraordinary power over the lower forces of nature. It is to this divine magic, the true Theosophist ever appeals, when asked for the credentials of Theosophy, and it has now become our duty to deal with Bible miracles in the light of definitions already given.

Every form of divination was at different times practised among the Jews, who often indulged in the black art in common with their less enlightened neighbors, the Canaanites, Hittites, etc. Whenever they sank into idolatry and immorality they had recourse to wizards who peep and mutter, and exalted to the highest offices, unscrupulous persons, who, while doubtless possessed of considerable occult power, shamelessly perverted it to the basest of ends for personal aggrandizement.

This power, however, misused as it always was by the ambitious and unscrupulous, utterly failed to bestow the slightest blessing on the community; instead, indeed, of benefiting the people, it added to their distresses and sickness. Magic of that type was performed both by Moses and the magicians of Pharaoh's court just prior to the exodus of Israel from Egypt, and until Moses healed the people of their afflictions, he failed to prove that God was with him. Making all the allowance any one may please for exaggeration and romanticism in the narrator's style, the self-evident conclusion is, that when it was a mere matter of converting rods into snakes and snakes into rods, or of multiplying pests, Moses had no pre-eminence over Pharaoh's magicians who did precisely the same with their enchantments; but when it came to driving away plagues and disorders, the magicians failed and Moses triumphed. Henry George, the great labor-agitator, has spoken of Moses frequently in his addresses to workingmen, and has commented with much ability on that ancient law-giver's uncompromising loyalty to principle. Now whether Moses be regarded as a genuine personage, or only a hero of romance, it needs no long analysis of his career to see why such a man was able to accomplish wonders of beneficence, the courted magicians of the Egyptian monarch could not approach. Moses was from an infant accustomed to every luxury; and was indeed heir apparent to the throne of Egypt, but he preferred to cast in his lot with oppressed workmen, and deliver them from cruel bondage to tyrannical oppressors, at the expense of every possible humiliation to himself, than sit next Sesostris on his throne, where his conscience would rebuke him for leaving the work of human emancipation undone. Such a man is typical of the true initiate, of the adept who is a master where others are but slaves; he has conquered his own appetites and ambitions; he has educated his higher self; he has fanned into a flame the electric spark of divinity within, and has thereby gained power which all who will rightly, may gain over the lower elements of nature; he is therefore a healer and a moral benefactor; his miracles are not tricks of occult force, like the sensational blasting of a tree unwisely published by Mr. Sinnett in "Karma; a Theosophical Romance," for the power to blast a tree may be diabolical, and we do not wonder at the Englishman of conservative belief objecting to a young relative of his, remaining where such awful things were accomplished by occult agency. True spiritual power does act destructively when infamies and impurities have to be thrown down, but it never displays itself at all in the simple exhibition of marvels, for, it can only be distinguished from diabolism (which is a perversion of the same power) by its exclusively beneficent action; thus from the earliest days it has been invariably associated almost exclusively with the reformation of sinners and the healing of the sick.

In the case of the prophet Elisha, we are told that in healing Naaman, the Assyrian captain, of leprosy, he required of his patient that he should wash seven times in the Jordan, maintaining that no amount of bathing in Abana (stony) and Pharpar (swift) rivers of Damascus, could accomplish his cure. We are told of Elijah's stretching himself on the body of a seemingly dead child, and calling earnestly upon God to let his spirit return into the body, and the child revived.

In all these narratives we detect a scientific note; means are employed, events are brought about evidently through the operation of an unchanging law, but such great results can only be achieved by those who pray and fast as the gospel teaches — prayer and fasting signifying aspiration and self-denial, i.e. denial of the lower self that the higher self may perfectly prevail. To revert now very briefly to the miracles said to have been wrought by Jesus and his immediate disciples, not one was a mere sensation; in every instance some sick or insane or crippled person was healed of an infirmity, and whatever view Jesus or his apostles may have taken of his divinity or simple humanity, the miracles were never put forward as evidence of supernatural deity; for had they been, the words could never have found place in the record, "The works that I do ye shall do also, and greater works than these shall ye do because I go to my Father." Here we have a strictly scientific view of miracles. Jesus tells his disciples that according to their faith it shall be unto them; he also tells those who are healed by his touch or by mere contact with his robe that their own faith has healed them, and when he has departed from mortal sight entirely, and his disciples are weaned far more from earthly attachments, then shall they do yet greater deeds than any done before, continually demonstrating further and

Let us sum up the matter in this wise. Very little do we know of time, place, and circumstance, with regard to the miracles of old, but one great lesson we do learn from all the scriptural narratives, and this we amplify and prove by reason and modern experiment, viz. that wisdom is to be gained only by diligent devotion to truth. Divine wisdom is a queen who permits no rival to share our affections with her; the wisdom which is from above is only to be courted and won by a life of such spirituality as expresses itself invariably in the entire devotion of practical whole-souled philanthropy. "Robert Elsmere" died physically on the road to this higher understanding; let his progressing spirit define miracles and he will not reiterate the words of Hume, "Miracles do not happen," but will explain how man's power derived from God is practically unlimited, but requires earnest and unceasing effort to unfold and apply.

EGYPTIAN THEOSOPHY.

THE very name of Egypt is associated in almost every mind not only with hoary antiquity, stupendous edifices, and marvelous learning, but above all with a system of religious thought so profound and amazing, that we may well ask whether Professor Smyth has not some justification for his astounding declaration that the Almighty Himself must have designed the Great Pyramid and made known the secret of His plan to Melchisedec or some equally wonderful personage who figures in biblical history.

Though the fact is often disputed by half-informed and one-sided students, the mass of testimony already accumulated in favor of the real historical existence of Atlantis is far too great to be set aside by any Egyptologist worthy the name of a scholar, who possesses himself of this evidence and candidly examines it. The Atlantian hypothesis, or rather explanation, does away with the need of supernatural invention, and proves to us how, through long ages of gradual and unceasing developments, the human mind reached a height from which it could command such a view of the universe as that taken by the earliest illumined ones, who have left a sublime and seemingly indelible impress on the earth itself in that most renowned of all far-famed countries, Egypt. One fact alone is sufficient to give much plausibility to the theory of an Atlantian conquest of Egypt, and that is that the most ancient monuments are by far the most magnificent. This would argue against evolution were we to accept it as a solitary unexplained fact, as orthodox people are glad to do. For the Theosophist, however, these monuments have a widely different meaning; they point not to divine favoritism, to the arbitrary selection of one here and one there as a result of sovereignty, but to the results of long ages of growth, culminating at length in the achievement of an almost complete mastery over the material side of nature.

When the conquerors of the Atlantian race, the celebrated red men of the distant past, came into Egypt, they doubtless found the inhabitants sunk in that form of idolatry commonly called nature worship, as it consisted of an adoration of natural forms below the human. The river Nile, the crocodile, the ox, the lotus flower, the dog, the cat, the serpent, birds, and many other objects in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, were the popular divinities. Now it must not be supposed that idolatry was worship of the inanimate or the material, though it may in some instances have degenerated into this; it was originally a form of Spiritualism of a not very elevated type. The ancients in all the Orient recognized an invisible life principle pervading the entire universe. They witnessed its expression in the multiform varieties of existence all about them, and seeing one attribute of the life principle expressed in one creature, and some other attributes expressed elsewhere, they paid honor to the particular creatures who manifested the qualities they most dreaded or admired. Their worship was, therefore, divided into two large and many small varieties. Good influences were praised with flowers, music, and peaceful rites of a poetic and elevating tendency; but a fearful error was perpetuated when the priests of the old temples encouraged the propitiation of evil powers. From this arose the sacrificial customs of the most barbaric type, though mingled with the desire to propitiate awful influences was coupled a desire to feed beneficent ones.

The Spiritualism of primitive people was very childish, but very natural. They saw animals much larger and stronger than themselves waiting to devour them. They saw that birds and beasts of prey rarely attacked man unless hungry or irritated, and they concluded that in the unseen world intelligences whom they ignorantly deified were of similar disposition. Thus those who threw themselves or others into the Nile to feed the crocodiles, usually did so with no other end in view than the propitiation of an unseen power behind the crocodile, which would accept the sacrifice and stay the avenging sword of destruction threatening the land.

Looking backward over the lapse of ages and trying to put ourselves in the place of our ancestors, we shall find much to shock, but more to encourage us as we seek to faithfully trace modern beliefs and practices to their ancient source. The vulgar religious notions of the West of to-day are perpetuations of antique Egyptian ideas and customs. Christianity is the old Egyptian religion in a new dress; and while in ritualistic observances and questionable dogmas we can clearly trace the influence of the old popular belief entertained by the illiterate masses, we need never be at a loss to find abundant traces of that sublime Solar worship which, more than hero worship, was the crowning glory of the religion of the past. The Atlantians were Sun-worshipers, without doubt; and the Great Pyramid of Gizeh was a temple to the Sun, the lord and giver of life. But the question now arises, What is meant by the Sun? How did the enlightened among the ancients regard the central luminary? Did it stand for the highest principle of life in the universe and man, or was it merely, in their eyes, a material light, an orb of matter, with no soul or life, save as soul and life are terms used blindly by agnosticism?

Our answer to all such questions ever is: The Sun was a symbol of Deity and of the presiding rulers and guardian angels of systems. The great central Sun, in which the whole universe revolves, was not Alcyone, the centre of the Pleiades, around which the suns of several systems revolve; neither was this greater Sun, Alcyone, identified with the Sun, which is but the centre of the small planetary system to which this little globe belongs. When Paul was preaching to the Athenians he reminded the Greeks of their own Theosophy derived directly from the Egyptians. His famous quotation, "In Him we live, move, and have our being," was distinctly a re-affirmation of the wisdom-religion of antiquity, which insisted before all else that the universe revolves within the infinite embrace of one Eternal Spirit. This concept of pure Theosophy places Deity beyond all possible limitation, and disposes finally of all such puerilities as grow out of trying to harmonize the idea of a central sun as ordinarily understood, with the opposite idea of all-pervading Spirit.

Having acknowledged the one Infinite Spirit as the only Eternal self-existent Life of all universes, the savans and illumined seers of the Egypt of old pointed out how, in the order of the heavens, a perfect system of government held sway. Nothing is left to chance; law reigns, order prevails everywhere; but there is no blind law of necessity such as that in which fatalists affect to believe. Intelligence is omniscient, omnipresent, omnipotent; and this essential life of all that lives is the inmost spark of consciousness, the basic germ of every organism: "He in us, and we in Him." Beholding the exact order in which everything in nature moves, the wisdom-religionists of antiquity were of necessity evolutionists, but not in the sense of tracing everything to a material germ and then forward to a spiritual hereafter. Involution is indispensable to evolution; nothing can possibly be evolved or unrolled which has not been previously involved or inrolled. When gazing upon the myriad orbs which revolve in infinity, the astronomers and astrologers, who constituted a powerful section of the Magi, concluded that there must be a perfect system of government in the heavens and throughout the universe. As they beheld some worlds brighter by far than others, and differing widely in magnitude, the one from the other, they thought, very reasonably, of the existence of celestial hierarchies, all of which were said to be under the dominion of the Infinite. We must be careful not to confound their pure, essential Theism with their phenomenal Spiritualism, but diligently compare the one with the other. By so doing we shall find that absolute Theism relates to the sole uncaused cause of all things, —a reality which all scientists and philosophers of all schools must admit under some name. Whether they call it the Infinite Life, Power, Energy, or what they choose, they must admit an uncreated, self-existent Force which pervades the universe, which always was and ever will be; while Spiritualism deals with finite revelations and expressions of the one life. These two systems are not in the least antagonistic one to the other; they only appear so to those who jump at conclusions, and whose immoderately hasty, and therefore shallow brain prevents them from regarding a subject from more than one point of view.

As the Infinite Life, or grand Central Sun of Being, was regarded by the truly wise in ancient times as all-pervading and all-including, the word central really signified interior, while the phenomenal universe or expressional existence was the theatre for the display of individualized intelligences, continually struggling to manifest their latent potencies. As there must always be a limit to finite thought and description, and as some particular orb must necessarily mark the horizon of finite perception in any epoch, Alcyone, the centre of a universe, not of all universes, was regarded as the abiding-place of the most mighty Archangel discernible by man. This most ancient spiritual being, whose individualized expression came within the range of astronomical observation, was the real Osiris of the Magi, while the popular Osiris was the angel of the lesser Sun, the sun of this planetary system only. The duality of life in its expression on any plane of existence was a cardinal doctrine of the wisdom-religion. While Sophia (Wisdom) is a Greek feminine noun, and Wisdom is constantly alluded to under the guise of a woman in spiritual documents, this divine Wisdom was ever with her masculine consort Love. He (Love) did nothing alone in the work of creation; neither did she (Wisdom) ever operate singly. An afterthought purely vicious, which grew up in periods of decadence, has found its way into more modern writings purporting to be of equal authority with the most ancient. These writings have been attempts to effect an impossible compromise between the real spiritual knowledge and sublimely exalted sentiment of the true adepts or initiates in Theosophy, and the coarse and brutal notions and practices of the vulgar throng of animalistic worshipers, who certainly did adore the male rather than the female, from the very cause assigned as a justification of the monstrous falsehood that woman is inferior to man and ever must be — because woman has less physical force than man and cannot make so successful a warrior.

The Scriptures of the Hebrews and Christians, both of which collections of antique documents are largely derived from Egypt, set forth both the higher and the lower view of this subject of sexual equality or inequality. Those portions of the Bible which evidently owe their origin to the wisdom-religion teach the absolute equality of the sexes; they are not found to contain a single passage which can fairly be construed otherwise. The weaker portions of so-called "Holy Writ" agree with the current misconceptions of the periods in which they were written, and thus argue in favor of man's sole dominance and woman's cringing subservience. Man and woman are, in the divine natural order of the universe, essentially equal. Have you ever met a man who was not a woman's son, or a woman who was not a man's daughter? If woman cannot exist without a father, and man cannot exist without a mother, how can one be above or below the other? Osiris never appeared without his wife, the beautiful veiled Isis, in the ancient portraiture of life's dual essence and expression; while from the union of the blessed two, the offspring Horus proceeded as a divine child, a celestial messenger, not miraculously though immaculately conceived and born. To understand the real difference between immaculate and miraculous conception, it is only necessary to inquire into the proper meaning of terms, and we shall soon see how perfectly natural the one is and how highly improbable the other. True Theosophy is not incredible mystery; it is divine wisdom, knowledge of life calculated to so enlighten all its possessors as to make them far better able than they would be without it, to stem the torrents of iniquity and promote the reign of righteousness on earth.

As the Roman Catholic Church has, without doubt, perpetuated the wisdom-religion, though it has studiously concealed it, under an immense mass of dogmas and ceremonies, from the comprehension of the multitude, we shall find that as the centuries roll on and new doctrines are put forward as articles of faith, and special holidays celebrated in their honor, the veil is gradually lifting and the people are beginning to catch glimpses of a long-cloaked verity. The dogma of the immaculate conception, though at first sight it appears to all Protestants an unfounded superstition, should be hailed with delight by all lovers of natural morality. On the eighth day of December every year (styled in Catholic calendars Patronal Feast of the United States) it is declared from every Roman Catholic pulpit, that Mary, the mother of Jesus, was conceived, gestated, and born without sin, yet she had a father and a mother like any other child. True, some may reply, but the Church declares this was the result of a special act of divine grace and has occurred in no other instance, and was rendered necessary to bring the Messiah into the world in a spotless body; therefore the celebration of this feast is only another link in the old chain of superstition, and as such should be denounced. Our answer is, we are not advocating Roman Catholic interpretations of an admitted fact in the Church; we are seeking its theosophical soul and origin; and disguise the truth as theologians may, or fail to see it as many do, the fact remains that the most conservative and miracle-upholding Church does teach that a child has been conceived, gestated, and born like all other children, and yet immaculately; and the priests of that Church do very often in their sermons on the 8th of December hold up Mary as an example to the world on account of her spotless purity. Inconsistency, you may cry out; for if Mary was specially endowed by God as no other woman was, then how can other women take pattern from her when they are not thus endowed? Again the answer must be given: truth and error are strangely mixed in all theology, and it is the work of Theosophy to disentangle them. He alone is a true Theosophist who is not afraid of any mixture of truth and error, but boldly works to sift the chaff from the wheat, and sever the gold from the alloy. This is not done by the sledge-hammer blows of the iconoclast, who looks not at all to the truth within, and seeing some tares would condemn an entire field as full of them. We need constructive, discriminating workers, who can impartially and dispassionately distinguish between truth and falsehood. These, and these only, can collect material for the universal church of the future, which will be enchained by no rigorous bonds, but will welcome to its embrace all who are desirous of living for the spirit rather than for the flesh.

We are quite ready to listen with approval to many objections to the dogma of the miraculous conception of Jesus; but if in the case of Jesus the Church used the same argument it uses with regard to Mary, the immaculate conception and the immaculateness of all that follows could be easily and usefully argued out. How many women are there who expect to become virgin mothers in the literal sense of the word virgin as made to apply to a state of celibacy only? Here and there a disappointed, deluded person may be chasing such a will-o'-the-wisp; but may not every girl and every boy be instructed to regard the procreative function as sacred, and would not some sound, plain talk on the ancient phalic worship in its original purity, do much good in many quarters in the direction of elevating the general idea of sexual relations above that of disgusting animality. Let the original truth on this subject be brought to light, let the natural relation of the sexes be purely and fairly dealt with, and an end will soon come to woman's degradation and enforced motherhood, to the birth of unwelcome children, and the multiplication of criminal tramps. Unless the wisdom-religion be revealed in its application to daily life and social purity, Theosophy, as a system of dreamy speculation, may as well be relegated to the Oriental chairs of a few universities and fall into innocuous desuetude, as the race engages its mind and taxes its brain with matters of every-day utility.

True Theosophy is the underlying principle of all reform; it is no antiquated or half-way measure teaching of things in no direct way pertaining to life here and now; and though we have the greatest respect for Spiritualism, and can see in it a means for the highest elevation of humanity (though honesty compels us to admit it can be desecrated to the undoing of the race), we have no doubt but the excessive other-worldliness of the Egyptians led at length to the loss of power and grandeur which once made Egypt a land of light, though eventually its name became the synonym of darkness. According to Bunsen's Chronology, Egypt was ruled by divine rulers for a consecutive period of 13,900 years; then came a race of demi-gods who ruled the land; then their reign was over, and the Pharaohs or native rulers wore the crown. After the Pharaoic period, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Turks, in succession, tyrannized over the dispossessed inhabitants, till of late English interference in Egypt has marked the latest stage in foreign conquest. Here again would we emphasize our most positive conviction that Atlantis was the source whence early Egypt derived her knowledge. The gods and goddesses were none other than the ancient rulers who came from the higher Atlantian race, and were looked upon as divinities by the people because of their superior spiritual as well as intellectual attainments. Gerald Massey, whose poetry is often exquisite, and whose fame as a scholar is by no means inconsiderable, has certainly ridden his favorite hobby-horse, Astro-Mythology, to death, when he has characterized Atlantis, "an American mare's nest." While he has without doubt collected a great amount of important information, and published it in his large works and lectures, how can astronomical occurrences account for the condition of the bed of the Atlantic Ocean, though the mythical theory be everywhere pressed into service, and forced to apply whether it will or not to everything everywhere? Astronomical and astrological facts ought to be taken into proper consideration in an interpretation of the mythos; but the true rendering of the subject is that the truly wise have ever known much more concerning the influence of world upon world, than the blind scoffers of to-day who, after repeating like parrots the simple formula, "the moon rules the tides," dismiss all further knowledge of the interaction of planets and satellites as barbaric folly and gross, unworthy superstition. Egypt was never a genuine parent of science. She seems to have had no growth of her own from infancy to maturity; but in the days of her childhood a powerful and wise race of conquering invaders came in upon her, and established themselves as her rulers and possessors. The original inhabitants were doubtless much in the condition of the American Indians and Australian aborigines at the time of the invasions of America and Australia by Europeans.

As some slight account of the other-world theories of the Egyptians may be of peculiar interest to our readers, we will summarize the essential teachings of the "Book of the Dead" in the following brief sentences which are in no way quotations from any Egyptian manuscript, but simply a summing up of the general teaching concerning the soul and its future experiences.

All the wisdom-religionists of the world have believed in pre-existence, though there has been considerable latitude among them concerning re-embodiment; while transmigration may be looked upon as entirely misunderstood by the unlearned at large. The soul is conceived of as a pure, innocent, spiritual essence, containing within itself all the potentialities of life. Its existence in paradise prior to any outward expression is exceedingly difficult to define, as it is in a state of non-reflectiveness. It lives and is content to live; it does not inquire into the why and wherefore of anything; it takes life as a matter of course, enjoying it in serene innocence. But the latent possibilities of the soul will not always remain dormant; they seek expression; and when first this expression is found, the soul creates a lower self, much as the play of "Pygmalion and Galatea" represents the sculptor fashioning a marble statue, endowing it with life derived from his own breath, and permitting it to choose for itself whether or no it will follow the desires of him who fashioned it.

The mystery of our dual selfhood, of the two "I's" of which we are all conscious, is hard to deal with in satisfactory terms of language; however, we all feel the fact of double desire and double consciousness. This secondary self, or lower nature, needs discipline, correction, education; and when perfected becomes the transparent and thoroughly submissive vehicle through which the higher soul gains expression in all the fullness of the term. Man on earth may be in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, or even seventh stage of planetary expression, and the marvelous inequality of human life on earth, though all life is essentially one, and derived from one primal source, is accounted for from the fact that the seven planets, or spheres of progression, are not regarded as orbs, but states. These states are represented, perhaps, on several planets at once, in the different degrees of manifested life common to them. At the same time, according to this view, the very lowest races now on earth must be considered as living through their first round of planetary experience on this earth, while the few exceptionally great teachers who have astonished the world by their marvelous spiritual and intellectual attainments, have manifested the sixth, and in the highest instances the seventh stage of expression.

Re-embodiment need not take place on the same planet; it is possible to live through the whole of one round on one earth; thus, if one lives the life which may be called the rung A in the ladder of progression on this planet, he will live his B life on another world; but if he is found unfit to progress through the intervening spiritual spheres to the next planet, by reason of the exceeding sensuousness of his desires, he is then compelled to take on another earthly form on this earth. Reincarnation on the same planet is also accomplished through intense desire to do some special work, and thus is common only to the very high and the very low, using those terms with moral reference. To explain this planetary chain to the satisfaction of all readers is impossible in the limited space at our disposal. Some doubt if every one would see it clearly if volumes were devoted to its elucidation. In brief, it is but this: All material worlds are ultimatums of spiritual worlds, and on any given planet at a given time several spiritual states are ultimated. There can be no beginning half-way up the ladder for some while others have to commence at the bottom; consequently, those who are now high up were once low down; those who are now low down will once be high up. The Atlantian race may have been a race of souls who had lived out their lower lives on some other planet, and were attracted to this earth in the natural order of sequence. When the time came for them to take a higher step, they were in consequence of growth superior to other races whom they were instrumental in elevating. Every planet affords sustenance during the various periods of its development for the varied races of men as well as animals. Life does not in the case of every unit commence its expression on one particular earth and remain with that earth till final perfection is reached; but goes on from world to world. In this chain of experience all are treated equally; thus, if any are living an exalted life of attainment here, they have grown to preparedness for it by experiences elsewhere. It is most conducive to the general welfare of the planetary system, that different races should be on each planet simultaneously, though at the outset of a planet's career only the lowest expressions are to be found upon it: as it progresses it affords attraction for the higher races until at length it sustains seventh-race embodiments, and has by that time reached the meridian of its perfection. This theory is at once reasonable and just, and most certainly deserves to be treated with the respect its dignity commands, not to be set aside with flippant sneer, and stupidly condemned because it does not coincide with the narrowest type of some one's particular orthodoxy, which may be heterodoxy of the worst kind in the eyes of his next-door neighbor.

The judgment scene in the court-room of Osiris is most graphically depicted in the Egyptian scriptures, from which it may be safely inferred the Apostle Paul borrowed the glowing imagery in which he indulged in his Epistle to the Corinthians, for there is no extant Hebrew records containing what he declares is "written in the Scriptures." Corinth, an influential seaport, contained a people who traded with Egypt, and thus it is easy to see that a man who, in the best sense of the phrase, endeavored to be "all things to all men" for the purpose of elevating men of all nationalities and creeds, would use the records most familiar to his auditors when instructing them on the subject of the resurrection, concerning which the Hebrew scriptures are singularly silent. This silence is best accounted for by the admission generally made by scholars, that when in Egypt the Israelites had become so thoroughly indoctrinated with theories of post-mortem existence, that their best moral teachers and legislators found it needful to lay the utmost stress upon matters pertaining to the present life, as concerning the future world they were already well instructed.

In the book of Daniel, — a splendid sample of Chaldean Theosophy, — Nebuchadnezzar's degradation to the level of an animal and subsequent reinstatement as man — a man nobler after his descent than before it — may be studied with much profit by all interested.

When the soul leaves the body it finds itself in an immaterial form closely akin to the vesture it has laid aside in general appearance, in the audience chamber of the utterly impartial judge of the world. This judge is seated on an elevated dais or throne, after the manner of Eastern potentates. Before him are female divinities blindfolded, holding scales in their hands. In perfectly just balances they weigh every act of the soul summoned to judgment, whose fate is decided absolutely by his own acts. Taken out of its venerable archaic setting, this doctrine is a gem of the purest lustre. We may reset the stone, but nothing can dim its lustre nor any length of time wear out its suggestive usefulness.

What truth needs to be more impressed on the consciousness of each and every individual, than that man is the arbiter of his own destiny, and while judgment or sentence may appear to be pronounced from without, each individual really passes sentence upon himself? The higher spheres of paradise open to all who merit entrance therein, while the darkest states are but places of purification through suffering. Transmigration into the bodies of lower animals was never taught by the enlightened, but in every case the human entity is retained, and however a step may appear retrograde, all is in reality advance.

So much has already been written and said, and that many times, concerning Egypt and almost everything pertaining to it, that we scarcely know whether we can offer anything in the least new on the present occasion. Our theme is old, and yet the interest which it calls forth, and the great demand at present for condensed printed information of the Great Pyramid of Gizeh and other ancient Egyptian marvels, has led us to determine to once more discourse on Egypt, and offer another lecture on its wonders to the reading public.

To deal anything like fairly with an ancient theme, it is absolutely necessary to approach it with a mind entirely free from party bias, or one is almost certain to unconsciously indorse particular theories which have no real justification in the facts presented. Scriptural prophecies and references are often immensely strained to support foregone conclusions, and with all respect for Piazzi Smyth and other justly noted men who have striven to make the pyramid testify in defence of orthodox Christianity, we venture to affirm that all sectarian interpretations would considerably astonish the builders of this gigantic pile. Let us take a glimpse at the pyramid first, and then consider why and by whom it was erected.

Pyramids are very common in Egypt; they literally stud the delta of the Nile, and they all bear striking resemblance to each other. In outward appearance they are quite similar, and the Great Pyramid differs from its younger and smaller brethren only by reason of more imposing proportions. When we enter the pyramids, however, we find an amazing difference, the Great Pyramid alone being conspicuous for the absence of all hieroglyphic inscriptions and for the elaborate interior arrangement, which is more than sufficient for a life-long study. Looking at the pyramid externally, in its present denuded condition, it is not very attractive to the lovers of the simply picturesque. It appears stern, majestic, imperial, forbidding, colossal in size, and hard as adamant in construction; but it can scarcely be called beautiful. Imposing it is in the highest degree; but the days of its loveliness were long ago, when coated with pure white casing-stones it shone with the radiance of spotless alabaster whenever the sun shone upon it. To-day its rugged, naked exterior suggests to us its long and tumultuous history. It looks like the country in which it stands, a splendid ruin, a magnificent wreck, and yet by no means an entire wreck or a perfect ruin. In its despoiled state it calls forth both reverence and regret; but it evidences a solidity which defies the tempest, and declares it ever ready to reveal to those who will patiently listen, a marvelous record of days that are no more.

Its proportions have frequently been given, but as any treatise on the subject would be imperfect without them, we repeat the most important. In height, the building is about 480 feet from base to apex. Its base line is 764 feet. Interiorly, from the entrance to the commencement of the grand gallery, the space measures about 2527 inches. The length of the grand gallery itself is 1881½ inches. The passage between the grand gallery and the king's chamber is about 55 inches, while the dimensions of the king's chamber are about 412 inches in length, 206 in breadth, and 230 in height. These numbers doubtless have astronomical and spiritual meanings, which the sincere student of Theosophy will soon be able to interpret.

But however interesting and important its outward appearance may be, its history and significance are necessarily far more so. Why was such an edifice constructed? and by whom? These are questions ever recurring and very difficult to answer unless we concede certain points with regard to the affairs of the ancient world, which quite a number of reputed scholars are unwilling to grant. Historically considered, Egypt is doubtless the most fruitful of all ancient lands to those who carry out a well-arranged programme of archæological research. India yields far less than Egypt in the monumental line, however much she may have to teach us through her literature. But just here it is appropriate to call your attention to the fact that the Hermetic literature of Egypt is almost precisely the same as the Hindu Vedas, both in literary style and esoteric teaching. A striking resemblance to this literature is notable also in the Book of Job, which scholars almost unitedly regard as the oldest portion of the Hebrew Scripture. In our search for the historic as well as the mystic key wherewith to unlock the mystery of ancient Egypt and its most stupendous monument, we must carefully steer clear of two extremes of opinion, both of which are very prevalent. One set of extremists claim that from Egyptian discoveries they can prove the Christian gospels non-historical. This assertion we flatly contradict. The other class of extremists are orthodox evangelicals, whose desire is to account for the Great Pyramid in particular in a strictly miraculous manner. The school of thinkers, of which Gerald Massey is an able representative, is so carried away with the exoteric symbolism of ancient Egypt, that statements are made by it, often most dogmatically, which are not by any means fully borne out by the actual facts in the case; and this school deals so much with the purely astronomical element in the mythos, that it does not dwell sufficiently on the esoteric, or strictly spiritual teaching of which mythology is the outer shell. The school of Piazzi Smyth displays almost total ignorance of the condition of the real ante-diluvian world; an ignorance shared by most opponents of the theory of Atlantis, as put forward by Ignatius Donnelly in his truly marvelous and highly authentic work bearing that title. But in substantiation of the truth of the theory, it needs only to be said that nothing short of a direct divine miracle, totally supernatural in character, is ever brought forward by the orthodox Christian party to account for the Great Pyramid, independent of the supposition of an Atlantis or its practical working equivalent. That strange and valuable book (now out of print), "Art Magic," gives a very plausible, and in some respects ample, sketch of the Great Pyramid, who designed it, and for what purpose. The explanation in that treatise is purely theosophical, and to this we will refer more particularly before we close this lecture.

The principal points of interest in connection with Egypt is that its oldest monuments are by far the finest. Egypt seems like unto the Adam of the second chapter of Genesis, who appeared first as a man and then gradually deteriorated, instead of having been born an infant and then slowly ascended in stature and intelligence. Hadaama is the Hebrew equivalent of red men, and it is singular, to say the least, that the earliest notable persons of whose history we can find any traces in Egyptian literature, painting, or sculpture, appear to have belonged to a powerful red race. Now this red race seems to have invaded Egypt long, long ago, and to have suddenly established itself in power, introducing religion, sciences, and arts totally at variance with the crude barbaric condition of the original inhabitants. These powerful conquerors must have been the "gods" to whom James Freeman Clarke alluded in that unparalleled work of his, "Ten Great Religions," who are said to have reigned over Egypt for a continuous period of 13,900 years. Then came the reign of demi-gods, and later on the Pharaohs, or native princes, who in their turn were overthrown by the Persians, who were followed by Greeks, Romans, and Turks, until recently England has appeared in Egypt. Now "gods," or sons of God, otherwise designated sons of Osiris, sons of the Sun, and sons of light, are not angelic beings, who assume human form and intermarry with mortal women, as many fanciful interpreters of some parts of Genesis have assumed. They are simply unusually gifted men; and with the gods always appear goddesses, or equally gifted women.

These distinguished wise ones of the earth are not supernaturally endowed by arbitrary divine appointment, but qualified adepts, the successful initiates into the genuine mysteries of being, who, in consequence, and as the necessary reward of diligent and long-continued spiritual study, have brought themselves to a state of proficiency in both spiritual and intellectual matters, truly astounding to the uninitiated multitude. Melchisedec, to whom Professor Smyth, and others who share his views, make frequent reference, signifies not a solitary historical character, but whoever for the time being is the head of the inmost and profoundest spiritual order on earth. This order is perpetual, and is always composed of twelve males and twelve females, who, wherever they may be on earth, are always perfectly and consciously united by means of absolute spiritual and thence electric sympathy. This order possesses the knowledge expressed in the pyramid, which only the enlightened can interpret; for, while astronomy, astrology, mathematics, and geometry are employed as its exponents, the inner meaning is so deep that a merely scientific interpretation fails to reveal the spiritual intent, and though doubtless correct in the main, where astronomy and metrology are concerned, fails totally where universal spiritual teaching is intended.

The first step out of the fog of creedal error into the light of spiritual truth is, to realize that spiritual facts are outside of time and space; therefore they are supersensuous, super-historical, and super-theological. For this reason materialistic historians and theologians invariably misapprehend because they limit them. The next step is an understanding of the science or law of exact correspondence, which is totally different from fanciful allegory, the difference consisting in correspondential emblems being universal, and always understandable; while fanciful allegorization is necessarily dubious owing to the artificial and non-persistent character of the objects employed as types. In order to make this portion of our subject plain we will cite an instance of correspondence, and contrast it with allegory.

Jesus says, "Consider the lilies of the field." A lily is an accurate correspondential emblem, because a lily is a flower which, though appearing in several varieties of form, conveys a definite idea to the mind, as it always grows in the same way, and presents a similar appearance. A table or a chair, for instance, indeed any article of human manufacture, is not truly a correspondence, because it is nothing invariably persistent in nature, being incidental to man's condition or a part of his surroundings in one country and not in another. The highest of all correspondences are the parts of the human body which always appear in the same relations and exist for the same purpose. Another very high order of correspondences are the sun, moon, and stars, which always appear in the heavens, and perform regular revolutions. Solar worship was originally the very highest and purest form of worship known to man. The ancients understood what Swedenborg in the eighteenth century again brought to light; they knew and taught that the heavens were in the human form, and that in man is to be found a perfect correspondence to all the signs of the zodiac. In the wisdom-religion of antiquity, Alcyone, the central star in the constellation known as the Pleiades, was the fitly chosen symbol of the Divine Mind, to which the immortal life of man directly corresponds. The sun in traveling around Alcyone passes through the twelve zodiacal signs once in every period of about 25,840 years, as the earth passes through the same twelve signs in its every annual revolution of a little more than 365 days. These twelve signs are corresponded to in man by the twelve orders or groups of intellectual faculties which can be distinctly traced and defined. The Grand Pyramid was designed to memorialize for all time the exact science of man in his relation to the universe, which its designer must have pretty thoroughly understood. The apex points directly to Alcyone, which symbolizes the ever-upward glancing of the soul to God, the parent of all intelligence. The interior construction of the pyramid is marvelous and unique, and suggests very much more than any simple metrologist, astronomer, or ordinary theologian can detect, as it portrays in perfect proportions the scenes through which every soul must pass during its journey from infancy to maturity. Only the true adepts of the highest rank, masons of the first order, can interpret the pyramid theosophically, as its occult meaning is deeply and purposely veiled from all others, though clearly revealed to those who can read the hieroglyphics of the universal lodge, which are simple and accurate geometrical proportions and mathematical figures.

The entrance to the pyramid, as doubtless all are aware, is at the north side only, and while many endeavors had previously been made to force an entrance, El Mamoun was the first to enter within its walls; whether through some unusual knowledge or by accident he discovered the entrance, is a matter of speculation. When the entrance is once found, exploration of the interior is not easy, for the method of construction is so strange, and the facilities for travel so meagre in many places, that it was long after the entrance was gained that any one was hazardous and successful enough to glean much definite information concerning it. El Mamoun's forced hole led to the descending entrance passage by means of a toilsome road; but there is, higher up, a perfect entrance passage, 985 pyramid inches in length, that conducts the explorer immediately to a granite portcullis, which is at the juncture of the first ascending and first descending passages. The descending entrance passage leading to the subterranean chamber, the object of which seems deeply mysterious, is, according to the most authentic estimation, about 4446 inches. The subterranean chamber is at a considerable distance above the high-level watermark of the Nile ; but before it is reached a deep well is encountered, with which there is communication from the point of juncture of the first ascending passage (length 1542 inches) with the grand gallery leading to the king's chamber, and the horizontal passage leading to the queen's chamber. The subterranean chamber was, without doubt, the scene of the profoundest mystic rites many thousands of years ago, for it is almost impossible to doubt that the most sublime and awful religious ceremonies were carried on within its walls; rites, the very mention of which would startle and confound any save those whose knowledge of the deep things of Theosophy is infinitely beyond the average attainment of those who just venture to peep curiously over the brink of the occult. The grand gallery has been for several years past the subject of much interest, as its length, 1881½ inches, has pointed, many think, with remarkable clearness to midsummer, 1882, when Lady Caithness and other eminent writers and thinkers consider anno domini (the age of the lord) came to an end and anno dominæ (the age of the lady) commenced. This, then, is woman's era, and man's monopoly is at an end.

Let us take a hurried glance at the grand gallery, and gazing upon its majestic proportions see if we cannot gain some clew as to its inner meaning. This gallery is long, light, handsome, and vaulted; but, like all other portions of the pyramid, utterly destitute of ornamentation. It terminates abruptly in a most extraordinary manner, as it leads directly into a narrow passage extremely difficult to travel, into the king's chamber, which is doubtless the most important and significant of all the chambers in the pyramid, as it contains simply a lidless sarcophagus, eminently suggestive of the unveiling of truth and the removal of every veil of mystery when the hierophant has crossed the mystic threshold and stands face to face with the naked truth in its sublime majesty. The passage through the difficult way may, however, be obviated by those who can soar into the chamber above, access to which can only be gained by ascension or flight. To those who reduce everything to a special chronology, the narrow and difficult passage signifies the present period through which the world is passing; and this present age is certainly a time of universal trial and unrest. Still there are those who can and do live serenely above the strife-laden atmosphere of the lower mind; and these are sheltered in the sanctuary above, while others less spiritually advanced are toiling painfully along the weary road, till they at length gain admittance to the king's chamber, which typifies a new and brighter dispensation.

To those, however, who see in the pyramid a universal picture of man's effort and the soul's destiny, as well as the fate of this and all other planets, the pyramidal architecture is far more deeply significant than it can be to the mere chronologist; for all questions of time and place are far inferior to those relating to the progression of the human spirit everywhere. The metric system so carefully elaborated in the pyramid's construction, is to the occult student of far more moment than a mere literal standard of earthly weights and measures. That reference is correctly made by Professor Smyth and others to the sacred cubit of Scripture, and that "false weights are an abomination to the Lord," we certainly indorse; but our plea is for a higher and deeper interpretation of the pyramid than that given by those who, in their over-anxiety to prove the Bible literally true, well-nigh overlook its spiritual meaning.

From a theosophical standpoint the pyramid is a monument of universal import, relating to the deepest truths of spirit. Standing as it does on the perfect square, it teaches that the only temple man can build acceptable to the Most High, is a temple whose foundations are perfect equity and universal brotherhood. The square stands for absolute impartiality, and it is not a wrong use of language to speak of a square man, a square transaction, or even a square meal, when you intend to signify that people and things are fully as good as represented. "Acting on the square" is an excellent expression; but it means brotherhood in the fullest sense of the word, and this is the foundation stone which the builders of false systems of political economy have rejected, which rulers have defied, but which is yet to become manifestly the headstone of the corner. This is the stone which grinds all injustice to powder in the day of its might, and breaks irretrievably all that comes in collision with it.

The triangular form of the pyramid is emblematic of the perfect trinity, the three in one and one in three; the perfect light whose color is white but which manifests itself in the threefold radiance of red, blue, and yellow. White is perfect purity, the all-including, but as yet unmanifested life of being. Red is the masculine power of love, the generative principle. Gold is the color of wisdom, the mother element, in whose pure matrix the blue, significant of truth, is miraculously conceived and born. Osiris, Isis, and Horus are the threefold expression of the one infinite, eternal, nameless life which is above and yet within all, and in whom as well as by and through whom all existence is possible.

The Egyptians, invariably sublime in their conceptions, have in the Great Pyramid far exceeded all their other efforts; and by Egyptians in this connection we do not mean the native dwellers on the soil, who at the time of the Atlantian conquest were slowly emerging from primitive barbarism; but the descendants of those princes in wisdom who, whether of Atlantian or other physical descent, were the true sons of light by reason of their having completely subdued the flesh to the spirit and walked in the glory of an illumination which no mere external culture can supply. To trace out still a little further the object of the pyramid, let us glance at the telescopic gallery, a perfect natural telescope which stretches from the subterranean chamber to the entrance. This perfect telescope enabled the mystics who were engaged in astronomical as well as spiritual studies, to receive light directly from alpha draconis, which was the polar star 2170 B.C., and which is always the polar star at the time when some very great event of mystical import affects the earth. 2170 B.C. is about the date of Noah's deluge, which, according to occult tradition, signified a complete remodelment of all things upon the earth, and previously in the spiritual states connected with the earth. Professor Smyth and many others believe the pyramid to have been completed and dedicated in that year; others with whom we agree, for reasons known only to mystic fraternities, place the date nearly 26,000 years earlier, or about 30,000 years from the present time, when the position of the stars would have been identical with their places 2170 B.C. Be this as it may, the pyramid displays a knowledge of astronomy on the part of its designer wholly incompatible with the foundationless assumption of many that there was no knowledge in the world to speak of until very recently. Western sages are only just beginning to rediscover, and paragraphists to publish as new revelations, facts better understood in the ages long gone by than by any modern scientist.

The present age is, however, very notable for the almost universal dissemination of knowledge which characterizes it; for though the actual attainments of the past may, in some directions at least, have been positively greater than those of the present, facts certainly have not been so universally diffused before, unless it may have been in the palmiest days of the long-sunken and well-nigh forgotten Atlantis, to whose actual existence the bed of the ocean which has derived its name from this mysterious country, irrefragably testifies. The polar star is ever the emblem of the highest perception of truth in man; it is invariably associated with the keenest and loftiest intuition; and thus to turn literally toward the pole star was in the attitude of exact correspondence, to turn ever for light and guidance to the sense of right within; and as the star in the heavens is so far above us that we have to direct our glance steadily upward, and therefore to divert it completely from the earth, so are we taught by wise spiritual direction, to become so enamored with whatever is above and beyond us that, forsaking carnal pleasures and sensuous delights in our eager quest of spiritual possession, we may rise effectually superior to the snares, entanglements, distresses, and diseases incident to all that is conveyed in the terms sensuality and worldliness. It is only by the light of another and higher world that earthly business can be done; "one world at a time" is an insane and unnatural expression, for which no justification is found anywhere in the universe; for where have we an example of a world that does not borrow light from a grander orb around which it perpetually revolves? Still the time may come when worlds are self-luminous; but then their relation to other orbs will only be the more intimate, the union more intense.

A comparison of the Egyptian pyramids with pyramids in Central America furnishes many grave arguments in support of the conclusion we long ago arrived at, that in distant times, by means of Atlantis as a central land, communication was open between the Eastern and Western hemispheres. The pyramids of the Western world are, however, far inferior to the Egyptian. They are larger (one at Pueblo, New Mexico, covering about forty-seven acres of ground, while the great Egyptian pyramid covers no more than thirteen and one-half acres), but very much lower, thereby suggesting a debased type of architecture, deficient in grandeur and sublimity. Divinely tall is a poetic simile; but who ever heard any thing or any one spoken of as divinely short? It is a striking fact that very high buildings are inevitably connected with a high degree of culture. Where very few are civilized, a great artist may design a solitary, lofty pile in a widely extended district, but wherever civilization abounds, the general height of buildings is peculiarly notable, and there are no examples of pigmy races of men displaying great intellectual vigor. The great test of attainment is symmetry of form, good balance, fine equilibrium; and wherever we find the truest and most thorough culture, we shall behold harmony in proportion everywhere as its concomitants. Thus are we led to admire the exquisite beauty of that Greek Theosophy, derived from Egypt, which will form the topic of other essays; and though in succeeding chapters we shall have many words of unaffected praise to bestow on the Hindu religion, which has too often laid excessive stress on austerity, a careful comparison of the best features in all systems will conclusively prove that the highest teachers in all lands have advocated symmetry, i.e. perfect culture of morals, mind and body.

LECTURE VII.

ATLANTIS.

WHILE there may be no absolute historical proof limited by that history which commences with the period of Herodotus, popularly termed the father of history, who is, after all, only the father of the most modern history; while we say there may not be any direct historical proof of the existence of Atlantis to be received along such direct lines of modern history as modern scholars usually travel, yet the testimony of the very earth itself is sufficient to convince all intelligent students who are capable of making an examination of the bed of the ocean; while all the mythologies of the world and the most ancient documents of the Orient, besides the traditions of the North American Indians and others, all go so far to substantiate Plato's story and to confirm the general line of affirmation in Ignatius Donnelly's work entitled "Atlantis," that we feel certain an impartial and critical review of the subject on the part of all who are fair-minded, will bring students to the inevitable conclusion that there is, at least, a large probability that Atlantis was a fact and no fiction.

From the spiritual side of life it is declared that the existence of Atlantis is thoroughly well ascertained; that there are multitudes in spirit life who positively know of its existence, that records are kept with most faithful accuracy, and that communications are forthcoming absolutely proving to those who are susceptible of such demonstration the fact of the antediluvian world. We will now call your attention directly to facts in the order in which we deem it advisable to present them, and then leave you with such assistance as you can derive from history and science, to indorse or repudiate the testimony here given.

There can be no doubt whatever that the world is immeasurably older than six thousand years; there can also be no doubt of man having existed upon the earth through periods which may almost be termed "countless ages." We will not undertake to say how old the human race is; it may have been millions of years since the first human being set foot upon the earth, for without doubt the story of the earth, as many geologists have affirmed, is a history of a constant succession of risings and fallings of surface. Many geologists have come to the conclusion that a million years is a very short time in the history of the world, for such periods as are sometimes called the Primary, the Secondary, and Tertiary, as well as such other periods as are termed the Silurian, the Devonian, the Carboniferous, etc., have occupied ages upon ages. An eminent geologist in England expressed in our hearing, that all events which transpired less than eighty thousand years ago might be considered, geologically speaking, recent, eighty thousand years being as a mere span in the history of the earth, for since the days of the fire-mist, or the time of the primitive chaos (the first expression from original cosmos), until the present hour, cycles of ages must have been consumed in the gradual development, peopling, and civilizing of this one little world.

But it would be impossible in an address such as this to enter at any length upon the story of the world's gradual formation and development. It is not our purpose to carry you in thought through long geological epochs or to compute their duration: we simply remind you that the earth develops through a succession of spiritual cycles; these cycles are each divided into twelve lesser cycles ordinarily termed ages, periods, or dispensations, each one occupying twenty-one hundred and seventy years or thereabouts. If the average duration of each minor cycle is between twenty-one and twenty-two hundred years, and there are twelve of these minor cycles in the grand cycle which has been termed the grand year of the Pleiades, during which time the phenomenon is accomplished known as the precession of the equinoxes, you will perceive that a complete cycle embraces nearly twenty-six thousand years. We believe twenty-five thousand eight hundred and forty years is about the time of the duration of each grand cycle when computed with as much accuracy as is possible without entering upon the higher mathematics.

During each period of nearly twenty-six thousand years land and water change their places upon earth, and while there may have been a "glacial period," there is no doubt whatever of there having been many glacial floods; and while there may have been a time when the entire world, or at all events the greater portion of it, was under water, still all races have their stories of deluges which were simply local and which occurred long after the earth was settled by man. When you were children you all heard the story of Noah's deluge, which, according to the chronology of the Pentateuch, took place about four thousand years ago; but when you consider that these five books, commonly called the five books of Moses, only relate to a very small portion of the earth's surface, no mention being made in them of any other parts of the earth than portions of Europe, Asia, and Africa (nothing whatever being said concerning America or Australia, the eastern parts of Asia, the southern parts of Africa, or the western parts of Europe, all this territory being apparently unknown to the writers), the story dealing only with the Israelites and with the nations with whom they fought and did business, making mention of no other territory than that associated with Israel's history, you become convinced that the flood which occurred nearly four thousand years ago, or thereabouts, was nothing more than a local deluge. The letter of the story undoubtedly referred to events which then occurred — doubtless some great natural upheaval, due to violent earthquakes, and the encroachment of the sea to an unusual extent upon the land; at the same time vast torrents of rain poured down day after day, causing great damage to life and property. But the deluge stories of all nations certainly cannot have been founded upon the Israelitish record of a deluge that occurred comparatively recently and which was limited to a very narrow area. You will find on inquiry that many a nation which apparently never had communication with the Hebrews has preserved faithfully the record of a great deluge which occurred long, long ago; and though it has been customary for many centuries among the orthodox both in Israel and Christendom, to deny everything that has appeared to conflict with the literal history of the Bible, no scientist, scholar, profound philosopher, or liberal religionist is in any way limited in his acceptance of universal testimony to an event occurring long ago, by any alleged divine revelation concerning the comparative youth of the world, as geology has gone far to prove that the world is millions of years old instead of only a few thousands, while testimony is accumulating daily proving man to be so ancient an inhabitant of the world that his real antiquity is a matter of doubt, it reaching so far into prehistoric ages. There can be no doubt whatsoever that the legends of all nations have been founded upon historical facts, that all mythologies have historical and biographical, as well as scientific, spiritual, and philosophical elements within them; the question therefore at once arises, From what primal fount did the idea of a universal deluge enter into all ancient literature and possess the minds of all nations upon earth?

The story of a universal deluge must necessarily have reference to a great catastrophe, which, even if it did not affect the entire world to the extent of overwhelming the whole earth, must have so far affected the entire world as to have seriously interfered with the condition, occupation, and commerce of all peoples.

There can be little doubt that the Aborigines, both of America and Australia, are the degenerate relics of once ancient and powerful peoples; no one can study the literature of the North American Indians, or their traditions rather (for most of their testimony is conveyed orally, not by means of writing), or the remarkable ceremonies in which they engage connected with the interment of their dead; no one can study their beliefs concerning the future world, and then peruse the Hermetic philosophy of Egypt, the Vedantic philosophy of Hindustan, or the classical literature of Greece and Rome, without coming to the conclusion that there is a truly wonderful similarity between the traditions of the untutored dwellers on the North American prairies and the most ancient and cultivated people upon earth. With such testimony as ancient scriptures, classical lore, and Indian tradition can supply, all deep students must become convinced that there was a time when Europe, America, and Asia were united as they are not now geographically, but as they surely will be to all intents and purposes, as fully if not more perfectly than they ever were in prehistoric times, when commerce and navigation have been brought to such perfection as to place a girdle of fraternity round the whole world.

You all know that in many places islands have been known to suddenly disappear, especially in regions where there are active volcanoes and where earthquakes are frequent, and whenever an island has disappeared in one part of the sea, somewhere else an island has suddenly — apparently miraculously — made its appearance. You all know that whenever the encroachments of the sea in some places are such as to inundate large tracts of country, submerge habitations, and drive the population inland, at that very time somewhere else large tracts of marshy land become dry, and in some places what was for ages the bed of the ocean becomes once more the habitation of humanity. In California, and all along the line of the Pacific coast, there is a tendency on the part of the sea to withdraw itself; and though something has been done by the hand of man in "making land," human art and ingenuity having redeemed some land from the waters, yet instead of the sea when left to itself gaining upon the land, it is unquestionably assisting man's endeavors to extend the land. We predict the time will not be very long before the waters of the Pacific Ocean will retreat several miles from where they now usually flow, and there will arise a beautiful and fertile tract of country extending far into what is now the ocean. But on the extreme eastern coast, especially in the State of Maine, it is observed that many farms once high and dry are now under water. The water is constantly encroaching upon the eastern shores of the American continent and retreating from the western; and as the march of civilization and progress is now constantly westward, it appears as though the current of human thought and enterprise naturally follows those natural currents which are causing new lands to rise in the West and the sea to encroach upon land that has grown old in the East.

You know that it is necessary in Egypt for the Nile to overflow its banks every year and inundate the land, or it would not be capable of yielding crops; hence the overflow of the waters of that "sacred" river is absolutely necessary to human sustenance. You also know after long periods of excessive cultivation it is necessary for the earth to have a period of rest; for this reason it was wisely prescribed in the Jewish law that the land should keep its Sabbaths, every seventh year the land should be allowed to rest, as the seventh day every week was given to man for rest; whenever the sabbatic law is ignored by farmers and agriculturists, the land gradually loses its fertility, as by over-cultivation and over-production it becomes sterile, just as man by over-exertion, the loss of natural sleep, and stated periods of refreshment and recuperation, loses his vigor and power to continue labor.

Whenever the land has been excessively cultivated for a long period of time, and has supported very highly developed races of men, the phosphates have been gradually removed from the soil into the sea; and when those phosphates, which are necessary for all human and vegetable life, are removed from the soil, and the richest earth has been carried into the waters, the earth becomes practically uninhabitable; at such times the waters gradually encroach upon land and undermine large portions of the soil. There are many currents of water under the earth; there are also currents of fire. If you could see deep down into the bowels of the earth you would behold connections between interior portions of the earth far inland and the ocean; these are reasons for streams of fire belching forth as they sometimes do far from the centre of any specially volcanic regions. You know there are warm and even boiling springs in very cold parts of the earth, in Iceland for instance, proving that there is underneath the earth a close connection between rivers of fire and rivers of water; whenever earthquakes occur, the fire and the water under the earth have together produced the phenomena. Earthquakes and volcanoes are always near neighbors. Earthquakes are always common in volcanic regions; where there are many earthquakes there are usually violent volcanic disturbances; in many places where there are now frequent earthquakes there are ranges of extinct volcanoes. Students can discover over all the earth many indications that great upheavals and convulsions of nature, destroying large territories of land, have been brought about by the collision of fire and water, two great necessaries and yet two deadly enemies of man, if man's life is regarded only from a physical standpoint; but when our eyes are turned toward the spiritual plan and purpose of being, and we realize that God manifests his presence in the storm; that there is never a period of inundation or strife that is not followed by prosperity and calm; when we realize the existence of a spiritual power beyond all external laws and forces, and attribute all to divine power, never to accident or chance, — nature becomes aglow with divine illumination, and the spirit of God is seen in every movement of the earth. From the standpoint of spiritual life we can observe the action of spiritual powers in peopling and then unpeopling the earth, in rebuilding districts long since rendered uninhabitable; and we thereby come to know that every distinct centre of civilization is a direct response to some special need in spiritual life, and that when any period or cycle ends, the first-fruits of that cycle are gathered in like garnered sheaves; at such times all the souls belonging to that period are gathered to their home in spiritual life.

If we had space to enter more fully into the laws of spiritual life, to explain the existence of families in the spiritual world, the distinctive origin of the various races of mankind, and prove how each race has its distinctive origin in spirit and afterward in material form; that the negro did not spring from the Malay, nor the Malay from the Caucasian, but that each race represents a distinct order of spiritual life manifested on earth, — we could trace in the outward history of the world the reason why one race after another rises and falls, and why a place which has long been occupied by one people will afterward be occupied by another and totally dissimilar race, until after many such changes (generally brought about by natural convulsions of the most terrific character, also somewhat by wars and pestilence, particularly when the condition of the people has been corrupt) all nations blend into one; then when all nations have blended into one, the paradisiacal or edenic condition of the world will be established on that hemisphere or in that zone where such union has been perfected. There can be no doubt whatever that upon the land where civilized races are now living there were once powerful warlike races, who gradually grew peaceful, then in an age of deterioration warlike again. These races came and went in obedience to a direct law of spiritual being which ordains that all events shall be accomplished through the precession of cycles of development. When an objection is made that there is not only progress but also retrogression, we answer, that when you can solve the spiritual problem of life, you will KNOW that seeming retrogression as well as seeming progress is in reality only progress in the true sense of the word.

What do we discover concerning the development of the earth itself? Why, that everything advances, then retrogrades, and then goes forward again visibly. There is not a summer but is followed by a winter, day is always followed by night, there is never a period of activity that is not followed by rest; the glory of the meridian sunlight is followed by a midnight. But why is it necessary that there should be a night following upon every day? a winter after every summer? Why is it necessary that men should sleep every night after a period of activity during the day? Why is it that empires fall after they have risen, that flowers fade and forms die so soon after their maturity? Why is it in the history of every nation under heaven as well as in the progress of the earth itself there should be a night-time in every cycle as well as a day-time, rest as well as boundless activity? Surely because during the day period of the cycle the activities are such that it becomes necessary for rest to follow in order that humanity may be prepared to ascend to a yet higher plane. Surely it is necessary that winter should come in order that the seeds may germinate in the earth, and that darkness follow light so that light be more appreciated. In all great pictures the background is dark and the foreground brilliant; contrasts and reliefs are necessary to show forth the splendors of the artist's ideal; shadow is necessary to reveal the glory of sunshine, adversity gives the highest understanding of pleasure. So in the entire development of the earth and of all races of men there must come a night-time as well as a day-time, a winter as well as a summer in the cycle of unfoldment.

If, then, you behold a bright and brilliant day ending in a dark and awful night; if clouds gather at eventide, and night follows rayless and starless; if thunders, lightnings, and earthquake terminate a day of summer heat prolific of activity and prosperity, remember that that brilliant day not having been a perfect day, its very activities not being absolutely perfect, have begotten such conditions as must of necessity be removed through the agency and instrumentality of the darkness, rest, and storm that follow.

As no spirit can die, no intelligence become extinct, no mind perish, no idea be lost, what matters it if the great empires of the world are buried in oblivion? What matters it if Cæsar, Alexander, and Napoleon shall some day be forgotten? What matters it if Egypt, Chaldea, and Babylonia are now in ruins? What matters it if along the banks of the Nile, the Ganges, the Euphrates, the Jordan, and all sacred rivers there are now little else than abodes of owls and bitterns where at one time were gorgeous temples and splendid palaces?

Though their outward forms be destroyed and are now but faded flowers and withered leaves, only the most external forms have died, only the chrysalides have been thrown off, while the spirit of the nations like butterflies of immortality have wended their way to brighter and loftier climes; and from that glorious realm of spirit whither human sense cannot ascend, triumphant mind reaches down to the earth, offering to take us all, though ever gradually, to its higher state.

All graces of the past, all voices of ancient song, all ideas inspiring ancient artificers, are ever ready to rehabilitate themselves on earth with a splendor never known in days gone by.

If the story of Atlantis is regarded by any as a fable, it must be accounted for in other ways than those which have already been resorted to to prove the narrative fabulous. The statement that Atlantis at one time occupied what is now the Atlantic Ocean is borne out by the very name; the ocean has taken its name from Atlantis, at one time an immense continent, but afterward, when reduced in size through gradual encroachments of the waters, only an island of moderate dimensions; also from Atlas, who is said to have been a mighty ruler of Atlantis before the days of Poseidon, from whom the principal city of Atlantis took its name. This great king also gave his name to the central state of the united Atlantian empire of olden time, which was divided into ten kingdoms; he was afterward regarded as a god in mythology: great warriors and heroes of antiquity were always deified after passing from earth — even Romulus was deified and numbered among the gods because he was regarded as the founder of Rome, though it is supposed by many that his sudden death was a result of popular protest against his tyranny; the "gods" therefore were not always immaculate. It was customary in olden times to give the names of great and mighty warriors to the countries they ruled, as well as to worship them as divinities after their passing into spirit life. We say, then, the very name Atlantic, derived from Atlantis and from Atlas, will have to be accounted for in ways not yet attempted if the story of Atlantis is considered a myth; while the deep-sea soundings of the vessels "Dolphin," "Challenger," and others in the waters of the Atlantic Ocean have absolutely proved the assertion of Plato, made more than twenty-three hundred years ago, reiterated from the words of his ancestor Solon, the great lawgiver of Athens, who flourished about six hundred years before the commencement of the Christian era, as the ocean district bordering upon the northwestern coast of Africa and extending as far as the British Islands is filled with volcanic débris which may be correctly termed "mud" produced by sunken land. It is an absolutely attested fact that the entire bed of the Atlantic Ocean bordering upon the coast of Africa and Europe is at the present time in such a condition as to prove conclusively that violent earthquakes and volcanic eruptions have destroyed countries in that region once extending far toward the shore of what is now America, while the peaks of the Azores off the northwestern coast of Africa are without doubt the mountain tops of the highest elevations upon Atlantis. The circular motion of the Gulf Stream is another witness to Atlantis, as it was doubtless occasioned by the water flowing around the island of Atlantis taking an almost circular form from that circumstance; while before Atlantis became an island (that is while it was yet a large continent), there being no outlet for the waters of the southern sea into the northern ocean, extreme cold prevailed in the north of Europe and other northern climes, which cold has considerably abated through the agency of the Gulf Stream.

The glacial period in Europe was no doubt occasioned by the cold northern ocean being shut off from the waters of the warm southern seas; but as the continent of Atlantis gradually wore away, as the encroachments of the sea steadily diminished its dimensions and reduced it to an island, the Gulf Stream, flowing from the southern seas around Atlantis, warmed the waters of the northern ocean, and by so doing caused that melting of the ice which is supposed by many geologists to have taken place from twelve thousand to twenty thousand years before the present time. The epoch when Atlantis was submerged must have fully terminated the glacial period in the northern parts of North America and Europe, while the more southern portions of these continents must have had their glacial era, if at all, at a period of almost incalculable antiquity.

Let the reader try to imagine himself a citizen of the ancient world occupying a position on Atlantis, say twenty-five thousand years ago, before the continent had been reduced to an island, for at that time Atlantis was physically connected with both the Eastern and Western Hemispheres. Instead of there being then two large hemispheres, the Eastern and the Western, as now, with two immense oceans between them, there was an immense middle continent, that included considerable portions of what are now known as the Eastern and Western Hemispheres. Time came gradually when the land was split by earthquakes and the gradual encroachment of the sea, which caused land to rise from the ocean both on the eastern and western sides of Atlantis; as the land went down more and more in the central continent, it rose correspondingly on either side. In this way both the western parts of the Eastern Hemisphere and the eastern parts of the Western Hemisphere were gradually formed prior to the time of the submergence of Atlantis, but did not assume anything like their present size till after that event.

This fact will account for the presence of widely different races in the opposite hemispheres, races who certainly were not indigenous to the soil. There is, moreover, a wonderful similarity in both the fauna and the flora of the Eastern and the Western world; these facts, together with that perfect unity of tradition in religious and many other respects prevailing in the most ancient portions of the Eastern and the most ancient portions of the Western Hemisphere prove very strongly the once union of both hemispheres.

There can be no doubt that after Atlantis had been to a large degree separated from the mainland, ridges remained connecting it with the Eastern Hemisphere on the one hand, and with the Western on the other. The course of those ridges can now be distinctly traced, as they are not very far below the bed of the Atlantic Ocean; across these ridges men and animals must have passed from Atlantis to the Eastern and the Western world. The inhabitants of Atlantis and its animals could pass easily along the eastern ridge into Africa, thence into Europe, and thence into Asia; and along the western ridge they could with equal ease pass into America: this circumstance readily accounts for the close resemblance still existing between the peoples, animals, and vegetation of both hemispheres; such similarity cannot be accounted for satisfactorily in any other way.

You will also remember that the earliest stories of Egypt are tales of unparalleled glory and magnificence. Egypt was at one time the most highly civilized colony of Atlantis; long before the days of the Pharaohs or any native Egyptian rulers, you are told the country was ruled by "gods." Many and many an ancient Egyptian tradition and inscription proves that they were great and mighty men who ruled in prehistoric times; they are represented in tradition as of a reddish hue. The Hebrew narrative ultimately traceable to Moses, who was educated at the court of Pharaoh, and therefore acquainted with all the wonders of Egypt, declares that red men were specially created in Eden by God: now the Atlantians were doubtless a red race, and an exceedingly powerful and highly developed race. The letter of the second chapter of Genesis contains, no doubt, a record of Atlantis as well as the allegorical spiritual truth we have endeavored to bring out further along in this volume. There are very many traditions in Egypt describing the overrunning of the land in very ancient times by a race of powerful and mighty red people. When the Spaniards visited Peru many centuries ago, they found Solar worship there in its original purity, agreeing perfectly with the ancient Solar worship of Egypt, Persia, and India. Now Solar worship is the true worship of antiquity; and you can account for the similarity between the Peruvian and Egyptian theologies satisfactorily in no other way than by admitting the influence of Atlantians who crossed the connecting ridges now under water, and traveled to Egypt on the one side and to America on the other, leaving in both hemispheres almost ineradicable impressions of their civilization.

Before as well as after the ridges were submerged, the arts of navigation were thoroughly understood in the ancient world. In the brightest days of Atlantis, in its palmiest period of palmy civilization, the Atlantians or their descendants must have built the pyramids of Egypt, and also those wonderful pyramids of Central America, which, though not quite so perfect in form, bear a close resemblance to those of Egypt. Professor Smythe has declared that the Great Pyramid of Egypt was probably built twenty-one hundred and seventy years before the commencement of the Christian era, because at that time Alpha Draconis was the polar star, which must then have shone directly down the shaft of the pyramid; and the formation of the galleries in the pyramid proves conclusively to astronomers that it was built for astronomical as well as religious and other purposes. The telescopic gallery evidently was intended for purposes of stellar observation; but it is known that more than twenty thousand years before that date Alpha Draconis was also the polar star; may not the pyramid have been erected at that much earlier period?

Egypt had certainly begun to deteriorate four thousand years ago; for you find all marks of its highest civilization carrying you back to a much earlier date than four thousand years ago. Now as the pyramid contains in its secret and still undiscovered chambers a great deal more than has been discovered in the parts already explored and concerning which so much has already been said and written, we declare that evidence points to the fact that the greatest pyramids of Egypt are between twenty-five thousand and thirty thousand years of age, and therefore carry you back to a period of such remote antiquity as places them side by side with the buried marvels of Atlantis. At the time when Atlantis was in the height of its glory, there was, doubtless, a high degree of civilization in Central America, and in various portions of South America, extending also some distance to the north, surpassing any civilization of to-day, but not reaching to the height of the purest civilization of the near future, when it shall have reached its culmination, which will probably be less than one hundred years from the present time. Then will come in the natural order of development, the co-operative commonwealth, so perfectly outlined by Bellamy in "Looking Backward."

It is stated to us by those who claim to KNOW, that about twenty thousand years ago Atlantis was at the height of its power and sovereignty, also from eight thousand to ten thousand years before that time, carrying us back from twenty thousand to thirty thousand years. After a long period of ever-increasing prosperity, the land and its inhabitants gradually began to deteriorate and decline, until at last, nine thousand years or more before the days of Solon, according to his account, Atlantis was overthrown, as Plato graphically and perhaps somewhat poetically and extravagantly states, "in a single day and night."

Before that time the better element of the people had emigrated to other shores, leaving the land in possession of the less enlightened. Races die soon after the emigration of their better element, while those cut off from all other races, left alone in solitary grandeur, soon pine and expire in their isolation. Probably the North American Indians and other aborigines have deteriorated because of the isolation brought about by those natural catastrophes which separated the inhabitants of America from all the rest of the world.

When nations begin to emigrate, it is an evidence that their country is on the declining wave, for then the power and vigor of the nation goes forth to other lands. It may be to-day that Ireland as an island declines; but all the representative element of the Hibernian race is within the American people. It may be said that England is declining; but the very backbone of Anglo-Saxon civilization is in the Canadas, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and other parts of the rising world. It may be that Germany will soon decline; but the best elements of the Teutonic race cross the ocean and form an important factor in the life of the United States. If France and Italy decline, it will be because the best elements of the French and Italian races, through varying circumstances, have departed to other lands and left the mother country barren.

There is nothing really lost when a land is overthrown. It was not in its highest glory that Greece was swallowed up by Rome. Greece had deteriorated, and Spartan bravery was no longer the watchword of the hour.

When Rome fell she was no longer the mistress of the world, but enfeebled and decrepit, given over to vice, and so emasculated that she retained but the skeleton of her former grandeur. When the fair temple of Jerusalem was destroyed and the Israelites driven out over all the earth, whatever was characteristic of the Hebrew race was carried by the exiled Hebrews into all countries whither they roamed, and they still perform their "messianic mission" in all parts of the world.

If the splendors of the days of David and Solomon have long since departed from the sacred shrines of Israel, if India, China, and Persia are no longer what once they were, all that made them great, all nobility of thought, all true culture, all their marvels of art had fled long before their destruction, and these are rehabilitated in the new forms of the modern world; all civilization rises as the phœnix rose, a young bird from the ashes of its parent.

There is no retrogression, no decline, no failure in the purposes of the Eternal; even were there no visible indication upon this particular earth that the glories of the olden days are renewed, still when you turn your eyes to the star-bespangled heavens by night and gaze on other planets, the countless starry orbs may be to-day (some of them) the scenes of the higher activities of those who have been transported thither from this earth, there to express higher forms and engage in larger activities than they could conceive of before their earthly career was ended. Arcadia, Eden, Hesperides, the Olympian Heights, the Islands of the Gods, and all the sacred places whose names after a time were interwoven into Greek literature, expressed in mythology and religion in the cultured Greek world reminiscences of Atlantis. When Plato told his story, he had gathered it from Solon, who had obtained it from the priests of Egypt; not from the Alexandrian library, — for it was told before the city of Alexandria was founded, and came from those learned cults or secret orders of the priesthood, who afterward committed it to writing. It is certain that books existed before libraries or book-cases, and afterward in the Alexandrian library ancient knowledge was preserved. The world of letters had in its possession accessible ancient documents pertaining to Atlantis until the time when this library was destroyed, several centuries after the commencement of the Christian era, through the vandalism and bigotry of the Mussulmans. In that library was registered and perpetuated the ancient knowledge of Egypt, its genius, literature, and art, extending to far ancient times. Knowledge has always been preserved in ancient orders, the mysteries of knowledge being always perpetuated in many a rite and symbol. In very ancient times mystic orders in their wisdom deemed it unwise to place much of their learning in any outward form to insure its preservation; but later on the Alexandrian library contained an embodiment of that knowledge which Solon received, not from books, but direct from the priests of Sais at the time when Egypt was a Grecian colony. Under Grecian rule the richest treasures of Egyptian knowledge were conveyed to the Grecian philosophers and afterward transmitted by them to the world at large, though but imperfectly. The story of Atlantis, recorded by Plato and received by him from Solon (one of the greatest lawgivers the world has ever known), has lately been fully corroborated by the bed of the ocean, stones and the very mud under the sea confirming the statements made by the learned of antiquity concerning this fair and wondrous land.

The Atlantians were, unquestionably, those people of olden time who were called gods and goddesses, and who, because of their godlike form, were termed giants among men. Atlantian men and women at one period — and that the highest in their career — without doubt enjoyed perfect equality, so that their government took that dual form in which it must have appeared at the time when Egypt recognized the divine duality personified in Osiris and Isis: both in government and religion the feminine principle was acknowledged as deserving worship and admiration equal with that accorded to the male.

When Bulwer-Lytton wrote his "Coming Race," he made his hero say that he had traveled in subterranean countries, and had there been introduced to people whose government, religion, and general customs were far in advance of those of modern Europe and America: not only did Lytton look forward to the future, he reviewed the past history of Atlantis in the popular guise of a fascinating romance. In that book is portrayed that higher potency and dominion of the human mind over the entire earth and atmosphere which, in a period of sovereign and enlightened spirituality, enables man to prove himself indeed the lord and ruler of creation. Those wonderful air-boats in which the Vril-Ya traveled, those wings which they wore upon their shoulders as useful (not ornamental) appendages, were the literal originals of the wings upon the shoulders of the cherubs and angels in Christian art: the winged beings represented to the world by artists were not men and women whose wings grew out naturally from their shoulders, but men and women thoroughly versed in the art of aerial navigation. When Jules Verne, for writing "Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea," and other sensational works peculiarly pleasing to boys, received a gold medal from the French Academy of Sciences for his perfectly philosophical reasoning, it was because he not only gave rein to imagination, but, following upon the traditions and inspiration of the past, reproduced to a considerable degree in his stories a record of the ancient world, even though strongly colored and largely imbued with the prophetic and romantic spirit.

When the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments" were conceived, crowds of travelers would gather together to hear the praises of ancient people and ancient times recited by itinerants, who entertained the marvel-loving Eastern public by reciting to them the wonders performed by the use of Aladdin's lamp and other marvels of the far Orient. All such stories are but highly colored tales of a far past when a part of the world was brighter than it now is. In stories of the long ago, in many a wonder of architecture, in splendid tapering spires and minarets pointing to the sky, in gorgeous gardens upon the roofs of Oriental houses, in majestic palaces and cities paved with gold, from Noah's ark, the simplest and rudest structure, to the symmetrical and magnificent temple of Solomon — in all we may trace some recollection of Atlantis. Floods sweeping over the land, bringing utter desolation and disaster, and the ark resting upon the water, in which a remnant of the human family were saved, carry us back to a period when Atlantis was in all its power and glory, a very paradise upon earth, and then to the sudden ending of its bright, hot, glorious day, when the storm cloud arose, followed by a dark and awful night of utter desolation.

But from out that splendid land long since submerged there has arisen to the world of souls a glorious company already engaged in enlightening mankind to build a new Atlantis, to form a brighter colony than that of yore. And when America is again united with the Orient, the ocean bridged by perfect navigation; when commerce and the arts shall blend all nations in the pure chain of fraternal relation, and the new republic of peace shall be formed, then will the time come when man shall reach out more fully than of old toward perfection, and rise to sublimer heights than Atlantis ever attained. To-day men realize the prophecy, but only in its dawning, the budding, not yet the opening of the flower.

There is no retrogression in nature; all is progress. But as everywhere summer and winter, night and day, light and shade, must alternate, the most appalling catastrophes which overwhelm the earth are forever fulfilling the purposes of the Eternal Good.

Aspiration.

Eternal Fountain of all beneficence, Thou who art the orderer and ruler of the universe, Thou in whose hand are all the events of life; Thou who dost ordain the rising of the morning sun and the shadows of the evening; Thou who dost call forth the light from its hiding-place, bidding it illumine the world with radiance; Thou who dost fold the curtains of the night about Thy sleeping children and invite them to repose; Thou who dost speak unto us in every sunny glance which lights the mountain and valley, in every star-beam that pours down its radiance from the glorious heights above; Thou who dost speak in nature's myriad tongues, inviting man to Thee with all her countlesss voices; Thou who dost allure the world to truth by every form of nature's loveliness displayed in all the changing seasons; for all the beauties of the earth, for all the loveliness of sea and sky, — we would give praises unto Thee!

Eternal fount and sustainer of our being, in the glories of creation, in the wonders of preservation, in the marvels of reproduction, Thy power do we behold; and when destruction spreads its gloom about us and works of grandeur are reduced to their parent ashes, then from out the pile of ashes cold Thou dost revive the world; while the phœnix, arising from out the newly kindled flame, jubilant and immortal, typifies the resurrection of the spirit from the tomb of sense, ascending beyond all death forever.

If empires rise, then fall in splendid ruins; if magnificence departs and decay takes possession of ancient palaces and temples; if all over the far Orient the lights have gone out and the altars are discarded where once Thou wert worshiped under the sacred name of Brahm and where Thy servants were acknowledged as the messengers of Vishnu the preserver; if all these splendors faded into story as the glories of the Orient were reduced to a name; if over Persia and Hindustan, Greece, Rome, and Egypt the mantle of destruction and the pall of darkness has fallen, then from out the depths of all the buried cities of the earth Thou dost cause the light of truth to arise, and from the buried land beneath the sea Thou dost summon Thy witnesses, until the rocks are eloquent with Thy praises and the stones cry out concerning Thy wondrous works of old.

If, with the voices of inanimate nature, even with the voices of the stones which men have piled together, the spirit of wisdom calls us that we may receive instruction, oh! may we in the midst of Thy living temples of humanity, turn from the dumb idols of wood and stone, from the temples that lie in ruins, from the deserted banquet halls of ancient kings, to the glory of those immortal habitations which can never be overthrown and to the splendors of the life of those souls who abide forever in Thy keeping.

Whatsoever storms sweep over the earth; whatsoever waves inundate the land; whatsoever quaking of the earth removes the cities of the plains; whatsoever fire and smoke from burning mountains shall desolate human habitations, may we know that Thou art in the whirlwind and the storm, that the earthquake is Thy messenger, the flood Thy servant, and that all things working together for good will at length reveal to all Thy plan, which orders all things for the best.

As we turn from the ancient Eden to the Paradise that will yet be revealed; as from scanning the history of the past our eyes turn prayerfully and hopefully towards the future, as we gaze toward republics which shall yet be established, toward the purer religion, the milder government and juster laws which shall yet betoken the presence of truth enthroned among humanity, may we sigh not for what is gone, but prepare for what is yet to be, knowing that the future glories of the earth and the future destiny of all human spirits shall surpass all that prophetic eyes have seen, and transcend a thousand-fold all wonders historians may record.

And thus in earnest faith, in the confidence of love, in abiding trust in Thine infinite goodness, may our hearts rest secure: may we never fail nor falter, but fulfill our mission faithfully by proclaiming truth to earth and spreading it in perfect love among all humanity.

LECTURE VIII.

FRAGMENTS OF FORGOTTEN HISTORY; OR, ATLANTIS "RECONSTRUCTED."

MANY persons inquire: "What good do you think you or any one can accomplish by digging up ancient fossils and speaking of remote antiquity, of races of men who have been buried in oblivion for thousands of years? Why not confine yourselves to practical, present-day topics? Why not deal with the burning questions of the age, take up the labor movement or some other matter of vital importance to society as at present organized?"

We answer, that no scientific mind ever thinks of doubting the desirability of studying the history of man in the far past, the science of geology and kindred sciences being regarded by all as matters of the utmost importance in a liberal and progressive education to-day. While geology deals with very ancient fossils; while this natural science carries us back to remote antiquity and teaches us how the earth has gradually developed from primitive chaos until it now assumes an almost spherical form; while we are told of the habits of the very earliest men — yea, and of even the radiata, who swarmed long before the earth could give sustenance to man; while "evolution" embraces a study of what has been going on for countless æons, and all students of nature or of the history of the globe are obliged to go back through almost incalculable periods of time that they may accumulate the testimony which the rocks and the seas will give, as to how God made the world; as the knowledge of cosmogony is one of the most interesting and important topics of the day, we may well ask, why study geology? Why discuss evolution? The answer comes, we can both regulate the present and prepare for the future in the light of past experience.

While it is true, indeed, that a wise and doubtless highly inspired apostle recommended his hearers and readers to "forget the things which are behind" in their zeal to "press on to the things which are before"; while, without doubt, there is sage counsel in the commandment, "Look forward, not backward," still before we can take a forward glance we are often obliged to review past years, and no one can say that experience is nothing or that the knowledge of what has been may not be most serviceable to those who desire to correct the errors while they would follow all the good examples of the past.

All ancient history teaches us the most valuable and important lessons. By studying the doings of ancient peoples we are enabled to see ourselves as others were in similar conditions to those in which we now are. And as we learn that all ancient civilizations came to naught, that all ancient empires were at length overthrown, that the most splendid achievements of past centuries were hurried into oblivion, and that civilization seemed only to reach its highest point to be overthrown, we may well inquire, what is that wonderfully mysterious and seemingly awful law which ordains that as soon as the flowers are perfect they should begin to wither, and that as soon as the fruit is fully ripened it should fall from the tree?

In a beautiful hymn often sung the statement is made most sublimely, —

> "We do not die — we cannot die;
> We only change our state of life
> When these earth temples fall and lie > Unmoving 'mid the world's wild strife;"

and then the hymn closes with the magnificent refrain, —

> "Our friends have only changed, have sped
> From lower homes to homes above."

As we said in the previous lecture concerning Atlantis, that as we gaze upon the starry heavens and watch the planets as they roll, we cannot reasonably regard the occupants of this little orb as being the only intelligent creatures in the universe; we cannot feel that those ancient and majestic globes that roll and shine in the distant heavens and that the various planets in this system are uninhabited, while this world is the only world which contains intelligent, sentient beings; rather do we feel in the progress of the cycles — as wise men of the East were wont to teach in days of remote antiquity — the soul passes on and on from planet to planet, from system to system, and those bright, glorious, and aspiring minds who, while they dwelt on earth were always scanning the heavens and wondering whether those bright, twinkling stars were inhabited, or whether man could ever visit them — we feel that those great inquiring intellects who gaze upon the stellar worlds and desire to know all about them, build their observatories and place their telescopes so that they may discover whatever may be revealed to human sight and understanding concerning the myriad worlds in space — those mighty intellects are destined to travel among those starlit spaces, destined at some time to pass from world to world, to navigate the oceans of space and explore what would be termed by man on earth the farthest corners of the universe. Those great and glorious souls who long to know all they can about the stars are the very ones who are becoming prepared while in earthly life to journey through the universe, and when they have dropped the earthly mantle, clad in other and more glorious form, will assuredly pass to other and more glorious worlds than this.

There are no instincts in the human mind which are beyond satisfaction, no desires eternally destined to remain unsatisfied; there are no demands of our spiritual or intellectual being for which supplies do not exist somewhere, and we have no hesitation in saying that a spiritual revelation has already been made to highly inspired seers and sages, both in the Orient and the Occident, and that there are those to-day in America, and Europe also, who are holding communion with intelligences who speak of what they know when they declare that the old Buddhistic doctrine of a planetary chain and of souls passing from world to world, assuming new and higher forms with every forward stage in their journey, is substantially true; and these are not the victims of an overheated imagination, but are the recipients of spiritual truth wafted to their minds from higher spheres.

If any one inquires, "What does anybody really know about the lost Atlantians, or about any prehistoric peoples, wonderful God-like men and women who were the models after which the Grecians patterned when they erected statues of fairer and lovelier human beings than we now see around us? Where are those great and mighty nations of antiquity whose very habitations have been washed away by floods, ruined by earthquakes and storms, and now lie but as débris at the bottom of the Atlantic and Pacific waters?" we answer, Turn your eyes skyward; gaze upon the myriad worlds that shine in the blue expanse of heaven, ask of those stars which the telescope but dimly reveals, concerning which no adequate information can be obtained by material science, at least with reference to their inhabitants, and if you have the quick ear of the spirit and hear the answers that will vibrate toward you through the illimitable spaces dividing the earth from those distant worlds, as swiftly as light and electricity pass down to you, you will receive tidings of those races of mankind who have graduated to higher schools and universities in the universe. Races of men, families of souls, colonies of spirits come to the earth to fulfill their appointed mission; their destiny is slowly outwrought here, and then the countries wherein they labored and which they perfected by their toil become like old school-houses from which the scholars have fled. The school-houses may fall into decay, the edifice, no matter how fair, may lie in ruins, but the emancipated scholars have graduated and gone forth into a broader universe; all of them are learners, some may now be professors in those great colleges which you call other and brighter worlds.

Not only is this world a school, but all worlds are schools; not only is this world inhabited, but all worlds are inhabited at some period in their career. All are born from one great parent source; all are brought to perfection in obedience to one beautiful law; all are intended as houses of discipline and education for immortal mind, and filled with probationers for a glorious immortality. Such is the mission of all the planets and stars which stud the glorious firmament.

Therefore it is not ruin, devastation, or failure that overtakes a world or any portion of it when, having reached the climax of perfection, it afterward fades away, but as the book of Genesis tells us, when the heavens and the earth were completed and man appeared upon the earth, the sons of God shouted for joy. Why did those sons of God shout for joy when this world was sufficiently far advanced to sustain human beings? Why did those angels and archangels of which theology teaches give praise to God when God had made a new earth, but, because they were evidently former inhabitants of worlds that had passed out of existence, and from the very star-dust, from the cosmic fluid and the primal chaos, a new world had been born in the building of which they had been instrumental as the servants and messengers of the Most High, rearing habitations and schools for other souls who must undergo experiences similar to those which had made them great.

And so whenever a world is blotted out or quenched in flame, or whenever a portion of the earth fades out of sight (even its memory may lie for a long time forgotten, buried among the ruins of departed ages), — when its forgotten history is again remembered, and knowledge of ancient days is revived, and men exclaim, "Oh, what saddening spectacles of decay! Oh, what pitiable wrecks! Oh, how terrible it is that when things have been brought to such perfection they are surely doomed to die!" — angelic choirs chant with exceeding gladness, "Ah, it is not so; for we who were the inhabitants of those now deserted haunts have been called to a higher world; and when the spirit, which kept alive the earth and advanced it on its way, receded, it journeyed to higher spheres, and only through the withdrawal of the spirit from the outward form at the time of their death, the old tabernacles, no longer vitalized by mind, passed away, and their places know them no more."

Let us look back upon those grand old people whom we call Atlantians, who inhabited many thousands of years ago that glorious land beyond the Pillars of Hercules at the entrance to the Mediterranean Sea, spoken of by Plato in his wonderful account of that ancient world; let us take such glimpses as we may catch both from inspiration and from history of their manners and customs, of their religion and general condition, and we shall find that corroborative testimony collected from an immense variety of authentic sources will lead us to the conclusion that they were in their highest culmination, without doubt those very remarkable people who are called "sons of God" in ancient lore, and whom the poets have sighed over as the fair and happy beings who once were well-nigh immortal upon earth.

There are two directly conflicting theories extant, (i.e. apparently conflicting) concerning man's origin, growth, and destiny, which cannot either of them be set aside as spurious or without foundation. The one theory is, that man began his career as an illiterate, naked savage, and slowly made his way to his present point in civilization. That theory, which is termed the evolutionary theory, and which is now held by nearly all scientific and philosophical minds in some form or other (subject to various modifications), seems to harmonize perfectly with all we can understand of God's goodness and of the infinite wisdom displayed in the scheme of the universe. Such a theory seems to harmonize perfectly with all our knowledge of the laws of growth in nature, that man should begin a human acorn, as it were, and work his way out by dint of progressive effort until he becomes a giant oak; that he should begin as the very tiniest seed, though containing every highest possibility of future development within him, but only through ages of growth become as a flower in all his expanded beauty; that he should begin as an infant with the most rudimentary intelligence and scarcely any idea of Deity or the soul's immortality, and then slowly evolve through long periods of time, religion, government, science, art, and philosophy, until he becomes at length well-nigh a god in human form. This theory of evolution fills us with boundless hope; it enables us to look forward to a future far more glorious than the past; it teaches that paradise is before and not behind us, that we are working our way to an Eden that has not yet been found. It fills us with a boundless confidence that our dreams are all to be realized in days to come, and that there is something infinitely better before us than ever lay behind us. To a great extent this theory, commending itself as it does to the very highest, noblest and most intelligent sentiments of our nature, is indisputable, it is supported by many irrefutable truths, and is beyond cavil when judged either from a moral or intellectual standpoint.

But while we may glory in the evolutionary theory of man's development; while we may give to it the palm and in a general sense sincerely believe in it, — at all events we believe it to be the nearest approximation to truth which modern science has preached to the world, — we are compelled to admit that history and the condition of the globe itself everywhere points to a forfeited Eden, to a lost paradise. We need not turn to the Bible to read the story of Adam and Eve expelled from a garden of Eden in Asia six thousand years ago; we need not read of the flaming sword held by the cherubim to deter man from partaking of the fruit of the Tree of Life; we need not delve through wonderful stories in the Old Testament and read of a Deluge that swept away the inhabitants of the earth with the exception of eight persons, about four thousand years ago, or of the fire and brimstone that came down from heaven and destroyed the wicked cities of the plain; we need not read in history of the fall of Rome, the fall of Israel, the desolation of Nineveh and Babylon, or the sweeping away of Tyre and Sidon; for no traveler who journeys through the land of the Nile, or through any of the territories watered by the Euphrates or the Ganges, and contrasts the present condition of Egypt, or of India under British misrule, or the present condition of the Chinese Empire given over to degradation and idolatry, with the splendid teachings of an age that brought to light a Buddha and Confucius, can fail to perceive that the earth has in many of its parts enjoyed in days gone by a glorious history which is now scarcely remembered even in name.

All the eloquent ruins of Egypt, those wondrous pyramids, that mysterious Sphinx, and all those weird and mystic obelisks standing in impressive grandeur in the Delta of the Nile, point to a time when there was a race of men in Egypt who could build structures which to-day excite the attention of the most scientific minds, and are well-nigh beyond decipherment. We find in Central America, in Peru, though to-day the native populations are degraded, evidences of a glorious enlightenment in the far past, which assures us that all these districts have once been centers of a civilization and art now almost entirely forgotten.

No traveler in Rome, in Athens, in Palestine, can possibly pass through the desolated walks where once the noblest and mightiest men of earth were wont to travel, without sighing over the world's loss in their destruction, and exclaiming, "Oh, if to-day things were only what once they were!" The traveler pours forth a wail of anguish when he gazes upon the desolated splendors of the earth, and yet all the while modern science tells him that progress is the watchword of the earth and humanity, that everything is moving forward to a more glorious goal then was ever reached in bygone ages.

Here are two apparently irreconcilable stories told by the earth itself. The earth says, "I am advancing," and the same earth in many, many places says, "Oh, how sadly have I retrograded!"

The doctrine of evolution is positively confirmed by the testimony of the rocks, and by a study of ethnology. But at the same time the story of a lost paradise as sung by every poet and prophet, is eloquently told by the very stones beneath our feet. By reason of the ships which to-day go forth across the Atlantic, and make deep-sea soundings in the very bed of the ocean, thinkers are led to conclude that there is no longer any doubt that the peaks of the Azores are the mountain tops of Atlantis, and that for thousands of miles under that wonderful Atlantic Ocean, yea, and under the Pacific also, we may find the remains of continents and islands, which were once more glorious than any of to-day.

We can, however, affirm this: while there is an order of circular motion in the development of all things, while night follows day, rest follows work, winter follows summer; the earth is progressing all the while, and taking it all in all, everything considered, the world was never as well off as it is now.

We are now in the spring-time of a new cycle; we are now in the early morning hours of a new day; they who stand on free fair American soil, where their unknown ancestors trod in ages buried in the night of prehistoric antiquity, are carving out a destiny for fair Columbia, infinitely surpassing that of the palmiest days of old. When the fruits are ripened next season, when the waving corn is next gathered in, when next the angels are commissioned to thrust in their sharp sickle because the harvest of the earth is ripe, the vintage and gathered crops of grain will be more luxurious, if not more delicious, than ever of old. Civilization covering a far wider territory than it ever covered before, the world will fulfill the prediction of Jesus, "Greater works than these shall ye do." Not necessarily greater in kind, but greater in quantity; not greater in marvelousness, but more widely extended. The civilization of olden times was localized, here and there was an oasis in what might otherwise be called the desert of the world; and though such oases grew larger and larger until civilization spread over wide tracts of country, there never was a culmination in days gone by so glorious as the culmination we may now anticipate.

The forward march of the world is accomplished not only through the day-hours, but also through the night that follows day; so the new day following a departed night is a brighter day than the preceding one; winter follows harvest, then another spring-time and summer result in a harvest more plenteous than the one of the year before. And so there is indeed a forward march of the world, a response from all beings to the Master's great cry, "Excelsior," a perpetual response to the invitation, "Come up higher," and this in perfect accordance with what, at first sight appears like a reversal of the order and a contradiction of the doctrine of humanity's progression.

We maintain, therefore, when we take anything like an intelligent survey of the world's history and cast the horoscope of coming generations with anything like accuracy, that we must look on this side of the picture and on that; on the side of seeming retrogression and on that of real progress. When we do so we shall learn that a new and more glorious life than has ever yet been known to earth is not merely a poet's rhapsody or a sentence placed by an enthusiastic painter at the foot of a great work of art, but a sure and solid reality capable of application in every national and individual case.

In "Fragments of Forgotten History," a work published under the auspices of the Theosophical Society in London, by two Cheelahs, the statement is made that there were days long gone by in the far East when men possessed seven senses instead of five, and that beyond the senses of the body these men enjoyed clear perceptions of the spirit which gradually were lost as men became more and more materialistic, thinking more and more of mammon and less and less of spirit. This same work which is the result of mystical researches into the spiritual as well as the physical history of mankind, declares that the various powers and senses of human nature were not developed all at once, but gradually one by one. Now as we hear that there has been a stone age, a bronze age, an iron age, etc., and different ages of the world have been characterized by special developments in all departments of being, we can readily understand there may have been a mystic period long ago, an age of intuition, an age of wonderful spiritual enlightenment, when the morality of the world, at all events in certain sections, was higher than it is now. We may assure ourselves there were times, now long gone by, when people realized their nearness to the spiritual universe as they do not ordinarily realize it now; that there were times when the gods really walked among men; but who were the gods? Those mentioned in the New Testament were simply human beings upon whom the spirit of God (the Eternal) came; gods are said to have ruled in Egypt before the Pharaohs; Egyptian gods and goddesses were highly inspired men and women whose spiritual gifts enabled them to realize not only scientific, but also spiritual truth in wonderful degree. The accounts in Grecian and Roman poetry and philosophy of how gods and goddesses in the happy days long passed, walked among men; the stories which are told of mortals meeting with the gods upon the Heights of Parnassus and Olympus, and of mortals hearing the lyre of Orpheus play when touched by invisible hands, clearly prove that men were once nearer to the spiritual world than they now are. These tales are records of a holier and happier age, of a period when the earth was young in this sense: that the beauty of the unsophisticated spirit of poesy and philosophy had not been tampered with and sullied as much as now. However, that may have been a period, comparatively speaking, of the world's infancy, for we know that children to-day are often far more alive to spiritual visions than the oldest gray-headed sires. We know there is a profounder wisdom than appears at first sight in the action of Jesus taking a little child, setting him in the midst of the wise men of that day, and saying to the sages: "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." We know that childlikeness does not only mean innocence and virtue, but frequently spiritual illumination; it means that intuitive wisdom which fades away when reason dogmatically asserts itself and intellect claims to be the only ruler, saying: "What I cannot comprehend is not worth knowing." We all know that in a spiritual sense a little child is often a sage, while many a man of science is but an ignoramus spiritually.

We do not undervalue the achievements of material science, but we do say an age of intuition in the far past gave to man a knowledge of spiritual law coupled with a power to produce æsthetic art, as the faculty of instinct enables animals (lower creatures than men) to act unerringly while man stumbles and falls. Do not animals — creatures far beneath you in intelligence and dignity — astonish and abase you by knowing more than you know, or apparently so, because they act with foresight that you do not possess? And is it not true that man falls when he endeavors to walk alone, but when guided by a power beyond himself he always walks uprightly?

We are not prepared to say that the Atlantians or that any ancient wonder-workers of either the Orient or the Occident were as rationalistic as modern scientists. We are not prepared to say that intellectually considered they had come to that perfection in the development of science, literature, and art which men of to-day are rapidly achieving; we rather look upon them as what may be termed mediumistic people, guided very greatly by a spiritual instinct, by a subtle intuition, and by a peculiar receptivity to the operation of the spiritual nature. Thus we find associated with all their achievements, and with all their art, names and forms of those whom they called gods and goddesses, and these gods and goddesses, though originally men and women, were those in whom spiritual gifts were unfolded, to a very remarkable degree, and who held constant and open communion with spiritual states of life.

Our own knowledge is derived from sources which we cannot divulge further than to say that it emanates from those who positively know of the ancient world. Atlantis in particular was the primal source of all the splendid literature which startles the world with its profundity and glowing imagery, that has been worshiped as sacred but yet misunderstood, as its inner meaning has not yet been found by the masses; sacred lore has been handed down to modern peoples and committed to the custody of the nations of to-day from the very ancient prehistoric races of Asia, Africa, and America at large.

We have no doubt but that the Israelites, borrowing their wonderful knowledge from the Egyptians, acknowledging Moses as their leader, Moses having been educated at the court of Pharaoh, acknowledged as the grandson of the reigning monarch, when leaving Egypt at the time of the exodus, borrowing from the Egyptians their ornaments, had gathered from the Egyptians that wonderful knowledge which they embodied in their scriptures, which agree esoterically with the marvelous tales of Atlantis told to Solon, the Athenian law-giver, by the priests of Sais, and we are sure the Alexandrian library prior to its destruction by the Mohammedans contained in priceless manuscripts knowledge of the ancient world transmitted to parchment. But the knowledge which men suppose to have been destroyed by the Mussulmans when they caused the Alexandrian library to be burned — because, said they, there is nothing worth preserving but the Koran; and if the statements in these books are not in harmony with the Koran, they are false; and if they are in harmony, we do not need them because the Koran contains all truth and knowledge — this knowledge was never swept from the face of the earth, for in sacred secret orders (theosophical lodges we may call them, for they are lodges for the study of divine wisdom, and that is all the word theosophy signifies) this knowledge has always been preserved, and there are those now all over the world who act as ordinary citizens, who wear the ordinary costume of the period, whose outward manners would betoken no singularity, who belong to these ancient lodges and hold communion with those who have handed down to them a direct line of history of those ancient buried peoples. Now concerning Mahatmas and Himalayan brothers: while a great many stories have been told of them filled with sensational exaggerations; while a great deal of mystery has been thrown over Theosophy by those who endeavor to advertise themselves rather than divine wisdom, we assure you that we know as a positive fact that ancient history is now in the possession of secret orders which is yet to be disclosed to the world, printed in plain English and sold by booksellers, for there are many important palimpsests about to be deciphered by learned hieroglyphists, archæologists, and other students of antiquity, and you will soon find our words concerning the condition of the Atlantians are in accordance with veritable facts recorded on the sacred tablets of the world's ancient monuments and parchments, which are slowly being discovered by those who in various ways are interrogating the bed of the ocean, and the wonderful monuments of antiquity all over the earth, and who will reveal all the truth they can decipher to the world at large.

The religion of Atlantis, which has been aptly called solar worship, was not a simple recognition of the solar orb as a center of light, heat, and electricity, but as Swedenborg said in a later day, reviving the science of correspondences which he declares was known in the time of Job and lost for four thousand years, until he refound it in 1757, divine wisdom is divine light, divine love is divine heat. Therefore, as the sun is now known to be the center of light, heat, and electricity from which the world and all that grows upon it derives its sustenance, and this fact that all things are dependent upon the sun, is a recent scientific discovery, so far as the present age is concerned — the very fact that all ancient people, Egyptians, Hindus, Peruvians, Central Americans and others worshiped the sun, is an evidence that they were acquainted with the scientific facts which are now being newly revealed or newly discovered to the world.

In Solar mythology, when spiritually deciphered, the sun represents the soul, the light, heat, and electricity radiating from it, love, wisdom, and truth which illume the entire understanding and body of man, and give him all his intellect and vitality, man being the microcosm, God the macrocosm.

Alcyone, the centre of the Pleiades, the great and glorious central sun around which the sun which lights this system in company with many others accomplishes its periodical journey in the grand year of the Pleiades, was the best representative of the Almighty that man could find, and instead of dwarfing and limiting God to a puny earthly form, instead of declaring that God was to be likened to a dog, a cat, or a bird, — as many idolaters have likened God, — knowing that great central sun (without which the universe could not exist) was the center of all light, life, heat, and electricity, they acknowledged it as a symbol of the divine spiritual power which kindled all worlds everywhere; and thus Solar worship, the grand old religion of the Atlantians, the religion of Egypt at the time when the Great Pyramid of Gizeh was built, and the religion of all the most enlightened ancients, instead of being an idolatry which worships matter and ignores spirit altogether, as some suppose, was a correspondential religion acknowledging the glorious luminary which lights all space, as being the best and most perfect symbol of the divine all-illuminating Being.

The Atlantians, acknowledging the central sun as the source of all light, declared that as the sun gave light, heat, gladness, and vitality to countless worlds, as the sun did not exist for itself, did not live in solitary grandeur, shining in splendor for its own glory, but lighted all space and brought teeming worlds into existence with all their myriad populations, such was God's light in the great universe as a whole; and in every individual life God must be understood as always imparting his beams of glory to all who will to be reached by His power. Acting upon this glorious principle, they declared that love to the neighbor and works of philanthropy were the only possible means of showing forth the glory of God; and from that great and glorious ancient world came the very spirit of the commandments, "Thou shalt love God with all thy heart, and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The ancient religion of Atlantis has been well reconstructed and re-presented to the world in Bulwer-Lytton's magnificent description of the Vril-Ya; and when that great novelist wrote his "Coming Race," he did not depend upon romance or imagination, but being himself indoctrinated into the innermost mysteries of certain secret orders, he wrote the history of Atlantis, and prophesied that in coming days the world would achieve even more glorious triumphs over matter and beget even diviner forms of government than were ever known before.

Atlantis, then, is that wondrous world said to be under the earth (for it is now under the water),where those tall and venerable men and women rose in glory with their Vrilsticks in their hands to dominate the earth and gather force from everything in nature, driving away all errors and annoyance by the mere touch of their magic wands. From many ancient sources we may learn much of the condition of the ancient world. We are convinced that Atlantis will be reconstructed, nay, surpassed in future days in the condition of some fair, bright land in which all nations will unite, in which all peoples will amalgamate, in which all religions and languages will blend in perfect harmony; for out of all the chaos of the present, a pure religion, a perfect language, and a just government founded upon principles of intelligence, equity, and freedom, will appear, like a phœnix from the ashes, soaring triumphantly to future glory.

What was the condition of the Atlantians when at the zenith of their greatness? Study if you will the most perfect models of Grecian art, gaze upon the magnificent statues of these highly civilized peoples, when the nations bordering upon Hellenic seas were at the very summit of civilization. Behold the majesty of Hercules, the mighty in strength; the wondrous loveliness of Apollo Belvedere; the matchless intelligence of Minerva; the charming grace of Venus. Compare those wonderful models of humanity with the almost pigmy creatures who strut upon the earth to-day, and then you will have caught something of a photograph of those marvelous people of old who attained to this surpassing loveliness by a life of intelligence far, far surpassing that which is dictated by the highest culture of to-day, which is superficial because intellectual only and not spiritual, even when avowedly religious.

In those ancient days when the gods and goddesses, as they are termed, walked the earth, the most perfect symmetry extended through the moral, intellectual, and physical departments of human nature. The most spiritually minded were the most intellectual, and the most intellectual were the strongest and healthiest in body. Instead of emaciated skeletons priding themselves upon their sanctity because they look more fit for the grave than for the discharge of ordinary life duties; instead of pale and lifeless men and women cloistered beneath the earth, shut away from the invigorating influence of sunshine, air and beauty, those noble Atlantians, who were the builders of the pyramids and other wonderful structures now in ruins in Central America, were the people who were made mention of as "the children of God" in the olden times, separated from the ordinary children of men, because characterized by exceeding grace of mind and form.

Their government was a pure republic, a perfect democracy, and yet at the same time a theocracy. It was of God, and yet it was "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people." It was the self-government of an enlightened nation who followed their moral instincts and were guided by intelligence and wise enough to allow every one to fall into his own place and to elect as rulers those who were seen to be most fitted for the work. Bulwer-Lytton, very true to Atlantian history, says that the Vril-Ya, when they selected their rulers, singled out for their representatives men of wonderful unfoldment and special qualifications and urged them to take office. He states further that there was no clamoring for position, no electioneering strife, no bribery or corruption through people trying to get into Congress or Parliament in order that they may appear a little better than their neighbors; he reviews the past and forecasts the future, in his description of a coming race, and tells you what was in the highest civilization of olden times, and what will be again on a more extended scale in the civilization of the future.

Atlantis of old passed through all the stages of trial and development through which America and France are now passing. Republican and democratic experiments were tried, monarchies came and went, empires rose and fell, and then at last a system of intelligent co-operation arose, embodying all the excellence of the communistic idea with all that is truly good in a parental form of government, united in an absolutely democratic form of administration.

The land was abundantly fruitful, highly cultivated, favored with a charming climate from end to end, and occupied by an intelligent, industrious people who had carried their labor-saving appliances to such a point that all their manual work was performed automatically, the people devoting themselves to intellectual and artistic studies of every kind. They soared in the air, travelling with wings as mechanical appendages; they had a perfect system of aerial navigation, and in their air-boats sailed in the calm atmosphere surrounding that beautiful land, which was itself a terrestrial paradise, as easily as vessels cross water to-day in calmest weather.

All this points to the glorious coming days when the new Atlantis shall be established all over the civilized globe. Society will yet show itself capable of taking the most romantic theory of the most enthusiatic prophet and reducing it to science, showing man's absolute power at length over the elements, but only after he has first mastered his own lower nature.

Men and women of Atlantis were in blessed equality; no striving on the part of one for supremacy over the other, they acknowledged their equal rights and offices, and came together in the highest marriage relation as mothers and fathers of children whom they loved, not one of whom they unwillingly bore. In those bright days of old the highest civilization expressed itself in such perfect education, such pure religion, such high art and equitable government, that to-day with all our boasted pride and civilization we look back that we may pattern after the ancients. You admire the splendid temples of old so much that when you build a new cathedral or coliseum you endeavor to imitate ancient architecture instead of seeking to improve modern imperfections. Every one admires the ancient models, and with all our "superior culture" we have to acknowledge that the finest poetry and the most sacred writings belong to a bygone age.

Be it so! These are the rich ripe fruits of a cycle long since culminated, and as we look back and study the history of the old world, let us go forward into the new age, not only to equal, but to surpass, the attainments and achievements which were the loftiest developments of yore.

The new Atlantis, Atlantis reconstructed, resurrected as a phœnix from the pile of ashes, will give to humanity in the days to come even more perfect religion, manners, government, and art than these prehistoric people ever knew: for Whittier's words ever prove correct, —

> "The new transcends the old
> In signs and wonders manifold."

Aspiration.

Eternal Fountain of all goodness, our Father and our Mother, who art in all the heavens and in all the earths; Thou who art in all the seas, the winds and hurricanes, the earthquakes and the storms; Thou who art in everything which men call beautiful, and in all things which men call adverse, when they understand not Thy purpose, when they realize not the beauty of Thy plan; Thou who art all in all, the Eternal One blessed forever and ever, we lift our hearts and minds and voices unto Thee, the infinite spirit, with glad acclaim, praising Thee that we live in a beautiful universe governed by an all-wise and all-loving law.

If in the law of nature there are mysteries we cannot explain; if there are wonders we cannot decipher, and marvelous doings beyond our ken; may we in humble trust and fervent love acknowledge Thee now and at all times as the guiding and inspiring power of all, working out a glorious destiny for all Thy children, and ever preparing for the sons and daughters of men a larger heritage and a more glorious possession than they ever forfeited in the destruction which has fallen upon the wondrous places of olden time.

If we turn our eyes to the earth and ocean beneath our feet, and observe the footprints of the storm and tempest — where'er we turn our eyes; if nations once most powerful and victorious lie low in ruin, and their place is now the habitation of the bittern and the owl; if we see no longer the gay and festive crowds marching through imperial Rome, or following the philosophers of Greece to halls of learning; if over all the Orient the temples are desolate and the fires extinguished upon their altars, — may we know that Thou dost ever kindle anew the fires of aspiration in the human mind, and sendest fresh fire from heaven to give evidence to all humble and honest seekers after Thee, that Thou dost answer all thy suppliants by the fire of truth which cometh down from spheres supernal, purging the dross and separating precious metal from base alloy.

May we know that in the glorious Eden-time yet to come, in the paradise yet to be found on earth, men will realize more than the poet's dream, more than the prophet's expectation; and that the lion and the lamb, the little child and the serpent, as Thy servants of old foretold, will, in peace and harmony, dwell together,

May we know, O Thou eternal fountain of all goodness, that though Thou art in the storm and in the deep waters, Thy way is ever love conjoined with wisdom. If friends more loved than life have been called away as with a flood, to realms beyond the tomb, then through the rifted clouds, from out the opening heavens may we behold them with the eye of the spirit and listen to their glad voices with the ear of the spirit, hearing them singing together and seeing them rejoice as they walk in white, proclaiming there is no death, but only translation; may we see them risen and ascended, beckoning us on to the bright worlds where now they dwell. May we feel the guidance of heaven's beckoning hand: may we listen and obey the entreaties of all loving voices that call us to a higher and nobler life; and though it be upon the wreck of all that sense holds dear, may we gladly turn to the Spirit of Truth as our only guide and counselor, and fixing our minds steadfastly upon those incorruptible treasures of the spirit which neither time nor death can ever touch, find in our own souls a new paradise, a kingdom of life and love wherein Thou dost dwell forever, revealed to the hearts of Thy children. Amen.

ORIENTAL THEOSOPHY. — BRAHMANISM AND BUDDHISM.

It is indeed impossible to deal exhaustively with these two most stupendous religious systems of olden time, and it would be futile to enter upon labored arguments to establish the priority of one or the other. They are both unmistakably of very great age, dating back into what is commonly called prehistoric antiquity. Our endeavor will be to compare the two, not to settle any mooted question regarding age or doctrinal superiority.

The chief difference between these two systems is, that Brahmanism deals principally with abstract metaphysics, Buddhism with practical philanthropy. The Brahmanical system of thought is indigenous to the East, and profoundly metaphysical. When Mrs. Eddy makes the statement, "All is mind; there is no matter," she uses a phrase in harmony with all spiritual understanding of the universe; but such a conception certainly did not originate with her, nor even with the Greek philosophers of more than two thousand years ago; it is an echo from perhaps the oldest system of thought extant on earth — ancient Brahmanism — which recognizes Spirit as the incorporeal Brahm, the only Reality, the all in all of Being. Matter (Maya) is nothing but illusion, though a reflection of the All (Spirit). The material world has no existence save as a reflection of the spiritual, which is the only real world, as Spirit is the only reality. This doctrine of the sole reality of spirit and the utterly illusive character of matter can be traced back through thousands of years to the Vedas, which embody the profoundest system of thought known to the East. But this system of abstract and unapplied metaphysics often addresses itself to the intellect alone, not to the affections; consequently it frequently fosters personal spiritual pride and self-righteousness, out of which has grown many a system of caste, giving undue authority to a ceremonial and priesthood. Any attempt to convert the world to absolute Brahmanism to-day would be futile. People who love to revel exclusively in abstract ideas are not as a rule benevolent.

Buddhism is entirely different from Brahmanism; as a religion it is ethical rather than creedal, and delights entirely in benevolent action. Brahmanism frequently looks to the salvation of one's own soul; Buddhism asks the higher question, "What can I do to save others?" The most frequent question of the individual in the world of to-day is, "What can I do to advance my own prospects? how raise myself to some high condition in this world or another?" Now all selfish consideration represses what is noblest and best in human nature. Gautama (Buddha) renounced everything, became a mendicant friar, and gave to the world a religion so nearly resembling that of Jesus, that we cannot contrast the two, there being no essential variance between them;

we can only compare, and seek to harmonize popular ideas concerning them. Buddha did not originate his teachings; he found them in the sacred Vedas, Puranas, and Upanishads. Buddha was a great Brahmanical reformer, as Jesus was a reformer among the Jews. Jesus never protested against the law or the prophets, only against the spurious aristocratic element that had crept into Judaism and exalted the teachings of the Talmud above the Thorah or Mosaic law. Gautama taught, five and a half centuries earlier than Jesus, the same truth, that all religion must be made practical. Buddha disregarded, as he grew in spirit, all the austerities of the Brahman creed, and devoted himself so entirely to a life of lovingkindness, that he exalted moral perfection far above intellectual accuracy; he reduced the purely metaphysical ideas of his countrymen to practice, and founded a system purely ethical; a pure religion carrying into effect the grandest teachings to be found in all the world. Buddha had attained in his earliest youth (at eight years of age) to the understanding of all philosophy and science, and all through his life he felt in his heart the religion of the Spirit; but not until he reduced it to daily, hourly practice did he attain to the state of perfect blessedness (Nirvana). While meditating under the sacred tree he saw all his past embodiments, reviewed every link in the chain of his existence as it had been forged by the effort of his own spirit, and learned in this moment of divine revelation that everything which had prepared him for Nirvana was the good he had done, not the intellectual eminence he had attained. A merely intellectual comprehension of Theosophy is not a road to salvation. Salvation springs from the practical exemplification of truth in our relation to our brethren. Our progress along the road cannot be judged by intellectual accomplishment, but only by our spiritual growth. We cannot estimate real progress by the amount of knowledge stored up in the mind, for we do not always find saints in professors' chairs, or sinners clothed in rags. Spiritual good is always our essential good, the good of our affections, not the truth of our intellects; though in a perfect condition of dual unfoldment, it is needless to declare, we shall be both intellectually and spiritually developed.

Brahmanism, as we understand it, was originally a pure, spiritual religion, proclaiming the essential oneness of all life, and regarding matter as an illusion of finite sense. But in the lapse of centuries the lofty ideal of primitive Hindu sages was obscured by priestly arrogance, till, as in the case of Israel, prophets became fewer and fewer, while priests and sacrificial ordinances multiplied on every hand. There is but one Spirit; whatever appears to exist separately from that Spirit is but illusion; this was the protest of ancient Brahmanical Theosophy against all materialistic or sensuous conceptions of the Universe. Para-Brahm, the Infinite Unknown, inaccessible to the intellect, was the sum and substance of the ancient teaching. Modern philosophers in the West talk of the Unknowable, — a foolish word, for none can measure prospective knowledge. Theosophy contents itself with speaking of the Great Unknown; and this eternal mystery, though beyond all our present power to solve, may be so far understood by us in the future as to appear quite well known by comparison with our present ignorance.

As the mortal senses can never discern spirit, it is quite useless to argue with confirmed sensualists concerning Deity, as they are quite destitute of the first requisite for considering the question fairly; and to some extent it is also futile to discuss the divine problem with intellectualists who scoff at intuition, and declare reason to be all. Such people may be quite honest, and live clean lives, but they are in the state of the "dog," as the term is used correspondentially in the Scriptures; the former class are corresponded to by "swine." To attain to knowledge of the Supreme Being it is necessary to acknowledge and liberate the divine element in man, the "spiritual man" who can and does discern the things of the Spirit, but takes no cognizance of outward forms of sense. As no one can really serve two masters, it is vain to expect any great contribution to spiritual knowledge from those who are immured in sense and worldly pursuits, and it is equally unlikely that the world will receive very much assistance in mere money-making from those Cheelahs and Adepts who devote themselves exclusively to spiritual considerations.

There is a prevalent belief in the West to-day that the Oriental religions counsel at all times a life of the most rigid and painful asceticism; that they would urge their followers to completely renounce every earthly obligation as well as pleasure, in attaining to adepthood. This view is erroneous; though it is true that there is a strong ascetic element in Hinduism as there is in Roman Catholicism; and the two systems, when carefully analyzed, will be found to teach about the same thing concerning prayer, penance, mortification, etc. In the Roman Catholic Church there are two distinct sets of commandments: First. Those binding on everybody. These include the Decalogue and certain rules of the Church concerning confession, communion, fasting, alms, attendance at Mass, etc. Second. Those which pertain only to members of religious orders, and these orders are by no means equally strict. The Carmelites and Poor Clares differ in their discipline from the Benedictines, Dominicans, and others whose churches are plentiful all over the world. In the Catholic Church, just as in ancient Brahmanism, there are again two distinct views as to the most effectual means of attaining the highest blessedness. In the "Lives of the Saints," by Alban Butler, and that much more Anglican view of the subject taken in a similar work by Baring-Gould, the writers distinctly prove that some eminent mystics in the Church, many of whom wrought miracles (works which excited wonder because the multitude could not duplicate them), adopted the idea that pure contemplation of perfect holiness excited in the devotee the intensest love of righteousness and conduces to the attainment even here on earth of ineffable beatification; while others insisted that scourgings of the flesh, fearful flagellations, and other horrid exercises of self-imposed torture, were necessary to free the soul from carnal bondage. Is it not probable that the founders of different orders judged the world by themselves, and, being persons of widely different temperament, they each commended only that discipline which seemed appropriate to their own needs? For this reason the Popes have sanctioned many orders, and the "infallible" Church confesses to freedom in discipline, but rigid uniformity in doctrine. Many Catholic priests of unquestioned orthodoxy disapprove of the persecution of "heretics" to the death, and consider the fiery martyrdoms of the sixteenth century the result of grievous error in ecclesiastical discipline; but these same priests would render themselves liable to immediate suspension and ultimate excommunication, were they to show any toleration for the doctrines taught by those same "heresiarchs" and their condemned followers. With this explanatory digression we will now take up the two opposing elements in Hinduism, one of which is sublime and the other hideous, leaving the reader to use his own judgment in accepting or condemning whatever comes to him in an Oriental guise, alleging itself to be "Eastern wisdom."

Pure, undiluted Brahmanism (an absolutely metaphysical system) is no doubt the most ancient religion of the East; but Buddhism, which seeks to embody the divine idea in a perfect man, may be almost as ancient. The two systems are probably almost contemporaneous. To-day they exist side by side in Asia as do Judaism and Christianity in Europe and America. Brahmanism deals with God out of Buddha; Buddhism sees God only through Buddha, as Christianity sees God only through Christ, which view of Deity Judaism stoutly rejects, as the Jewish mind fears it is only a species of idolatry or polytheism; but polytheism is not necessarily idolatrous, nor is it really opposed to Monotheism when inferior divinities are never permitted to usurp the throne of the Infinite in the mind of the worshiper. The Jewish Kabalists, though they never swerved in their allegiance to the fundamental proposition of Judaism, "God is one," admitted nine orders of Sephiroth as emanations from the Supreme, each one of which, according to the Kabala, constitutes a distinct hierarchy in the invisible world. Moses, though never deified in Israel, is regarded by all orthodox Israelites as the greatest man who ever lived, — a man to whom God spoke as He has spoken to no other; but the distinctly mystic element in Judaism has always clustered around the person of Melchisedec, King of Salem (abode of peace). He, as priest of the Most High, was a greater man than Abraham; for, when Abraham met him he did obeisance before him, and offered him loaves and wine in token of his superior rank as a priest of the unchanging order of the Spirit. The Hebrew name for Deity, Jahveh, or Jehovah, means the self-existent being. Adonai (the term used in the Hebrew ritual) only signifies Lord, which is a title of doubtful meaning, and suggests to the mind familiar with Greek literature, Adonis, the god of beauty, whom the Greeks never considered the equal of Zeus, who, in his turn, was subordinate to the nameless, ineffable Power which, when Stoicism was in the ascendant, was called Fate, to which gods as well as men were always subject.

It is so impossible for the finite mind to content itself with the infinite and absolute in idea, that every religious system on earth has added Spiritualism to Monotheism. These two systems are not antagonistic in the minds of those who can grasp both; for the latter is but a manifestation of the former which, while unmanifest, is incomprehensible. Who was the personal Lord who spake to Moses from the bush at Horeb, and from the summit of Sinai, who appeared to Elijah in the wilderness, and constantly manifested himself as an angel to the patriarchs? Surely, not the Infinite Eternal, whom no man has seen at any time, but a messenger from the invisible world, near enough to the plane of man's comprehension to be intelligible as a personality, and yet far enough removed from ordinary limitations to be a master in wisdom to those with whom he conversed. We know the purely subjective type of mind will repudiate this explanation, and contend that objective spiritual phenomena never occur, but people think they take place when they are hallucinated. While those who argue thus are often very spiritually minded people who are quite sure they enjoy interior silent communion with the Divine Spirit, we must differ from them in all kindness, when they tell us that only subjectively is spiritual truth revealed to man. The subjective or internal revelation is, no doubt, the highest, but all are not prepared to receive it; therefore there is always an accommodation of truth to the varied necessities of mankind.

So impossible does it appear to revel only in the thought of the infinity of the unmanifest Supreme Being, that those uncompromising metaphysicians, the ancient Brahmans, soon discoursed of a trinity by means of which the infinite Brahm was revealed in the universe. As there is but one absolute color (white), but three primaries (red, blue, and yellow), and these three spring from one, and melt into one, so Brahma (Creator), Vishnu (Preserver), and Siva (Destroyer and Reproducer) are introduced on the pages of Sanskrit lore as the threefold expression of the sole Infinite. Buddhism here steps in and puts forward its prominent claim, that Vishnu is periodically incarnated on earth as a Buddha (wise one), and that these incarnations of Vishnu are necessary at intervals, to save and redeem mankind. Vishnu as a spiritual power never embodied in human form is a purely Brahmanical idea, and chimes in very well with the Gnostic idea of Christ never manifest in the flesh as a single personality, while Vishnu incarnate as Buddha born of a virgin, singularly precocious as a child, living a life of singular purity, healing the sick, preaching to the poor, suffering much, and then translated without dying, finds its parallel in that far more popular phase of Christianity which deifies Jesus and declares him to be "very God of very God," in a sense in which it would be blasphemy to consider any human being God. The popular view of truth is always more or less beclouded with error in consequence of the very limited view most people are able to take. Certain it is that great masses of mankind grasp some idea, fundamentally true, and then build upon it an enormous structure partly true and partly false. As with Christianity so with Buddhism; the enlightened are but few, while the ignorant are very many, and frequently the exoteric belief of the masses is taken for the esoteric verity known only to initiates. Mr. Sinnett in his "Esoteric Buddhism" has not, in our opinion, fathomed the deeper truths of Buddhism, except here and there. His work is learned, and gives evidence of much research and not a little deep thought; but it is not always theosophical, as it falls into the stupid error so common in Christendom, that literal death, what Shakespeare calls "shuffling off this mortal coil," makes an immense difference in the immediate condition of the individual who has died to the external world. This conclusion is less true than almost the crudest notion of the most illiterate of modern Spiritualists on the same subject, for one will hardly find a Spiritualist in any part of the world who does not know enough to deny this palpable and misleading blunder.

The whole difficulty concerning "separation of principles at death," "shells," "astral bodies," "reliquae of the departed," and many other crude conceptions thrust upon the world as arcane wisdom, has arisen from an utter failure to understand the mystical meaning of the term death as employed by spiritually enlightened writers the world over. "Ye are dead," "I die daily," and similar expressions of Paul in several of his epistles cannot be made to refer to physical dissolution without destroying the sense irrationally; and just as Paul spoke of death and dying in a figurative sense, so did the mystics of the far Orient, to whom, as to the Rosicrucians, the secret of death is transmutation. A more foolish misstatement can hardly be imagined than this we meet with continually in avowedly theosophical publications, which are too often theosophical only in name; and as these misapprehensions are great roots of bitterness, occasioning much strife, contention, and often severe mental distress, we are determined to do our part in presenting what we know to be the truth as opposed to these errors. Mrs. E. H. Britten, though herself a student of occultism, and one who has done much to promote the study of it in others, has written vehement articles against Theosophy in her paper, The Two Worlds, published weekly in Manchester, England, in consequence of this foolish misconception coming so prominently to the front in many places. We wish she had corrected the error more theosophically; but anyway her denunciation of it can have done no real harm to the theosophical movement, as only the tares can perish — nothing can destroy the wheat.

The seven-fold constitution of man, as generally stated by "Esoteric Buddhists," is comparatively easy of acceptance and provokes no reasonable hostility, though to the word principle used in that sense many may take exception, as there is in reality but one principle of life — essential spirit. The seven-fold constitution is really a misnomer, as there is but one life principle according to those who speak most of seven principles, and that one, which is both Alpha and Omega, is called atma, which signifies divine soul, the immortal atom of intelligence which, as a deathless entity, lives unchanged despite all that may occur to its subordinates. This atma, or ultimate unit of consciousness, is expressed in what is termed the spiritual soul, which is the seat of moral perception; this in turn is displayed through the intellectual soul, which is the seat of human reason or intellect, without which man would not be man. Below these divine and human principles are placed the animal soul, which is the seat of instinct and passion; the astral body, which is the invisible form or organism; vitality, which is the connecting link between the astral or immaterial body and the physical frame; and lastly, the physical body itself. As involution necessarily precedes evolution, the first from the spiritual side is the seventh from the material, and vice versa. To give our readers a plain illustration of the idea we present the following table of the constitution of man: —

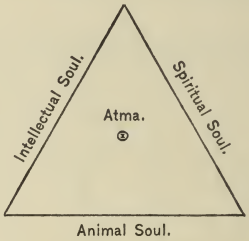
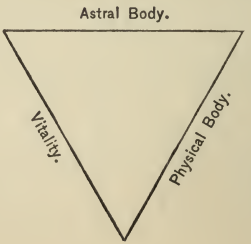
ABSOLUTE UNMANIFEST LIFE.

7. Atma.		Invisible Order.	Involution. Descent of Spirit into Expression. 1. Atma.
6. Spiritual Soul.			2. Spiritual Soul.
5. Intellectual Soul.	LADDER OF LIFE.		3. Intellectual Soul.
4. Animal Soul.			4. Animal Soul.
3. Astral Body.			5. Astral Body.
2. Vitality.		Visible Order.	6. Vitality.
1. Physical Body. Evolution. Return of Spirit.			7. Physical Body.

It will be readily seen by this table that the popular Kabalistic figure of the double triangle is intended to represent the sixfold expression of the one inexpressible life principle; and those who study this will see how vast a truth those healers have grasped, who sometimes, however, cannot very well explain their philosophy, who treat by urging forgetfulness of all but the atma. "God is well, and so are you," is quite true in every case, provided we know what it means. The upward pointing triangle (△) may be read thus: —



The eye, or divine name in the centre, always signifies the immortal life principle, which is one with God, and is all-good in finite degree as the Infinite is all-good in infinite degree. The downward-pointing triangle (▽) may be read thus: —



but it is no real part of man, and thus the fourfold constitution is all that is admitted by those who know the external form to be nothing more than a temporary appendage. Man is one, as there is but one God. To use Brahmanical terms, Brahm is corresponded to by the atma which manifests itself in the following threefold order: Brahma (Creator) in the spiritual soul, Vishnu (Preserver) in the intellectual soul, and Siva (Destroyer and Reproducer) in the animal soul. It is intuition which creates, reason which preserves, and animal impulses which destroy and reproduce expressions. Thus the three loves which Swedenborg says are in the heart of every man can be located; divine love in the spiritual soul, neighborly love in the intellectual soul, and self-love in the animal soul. When these three loves are rightly subordinated, man is an angel; but when they are inverted, he is a fiend. Thus "All is good, there is no evil," can receive a perfect explanation as we learn to know ourselves. Demon est deus inversus (a demon is an inverted god) is an ancient theosophical maxim and teaches us as we study what is perfectly in accord with all the researches of outward science, viz., that everything in nature is innately or inherently good, and only needs to be rightly employed to proclaim its goodness.

Evolution teaches that the component parts of antediluvian monsters have been dissipated, and that after the molecules were separated and eventually recombined, fair and graceful forms took the place of the frightful creations of bygone cycles. When Theosophy lifts the curtain and reveals the inner sense of the first chapter of Genesis, the six days' labor of the soul and its seventh day of rest appear before us as a beautiful allegory of the progress of each individual spirit from untempted innocence to celestial purity. Innocence differs from purity in that it is dove-like harmlessness, but nothing more; while purity unites the wisdom of the serpent therewith, and is a permanent condition from which no fall need be feared. The four states mentioned in "Esoteric Buddhism" as lying beyond the grave, can be easily comprehended if we know that Avitchi, the lowest of them, corresponds to hell, a place, or state of remorse and misery, entered upon only by those whose motives have been malicious, and who have purposely worked to injure others. A peculiar feature of this condition is that while it is not and cannot be eternal, it appears everlasting to those who are suffering in it, and from this cause Dante in his "Inferno," and Swedenborg in his "Heaven and Hell," have pictured it as though unending. Avitchi is only possible to the very worst type of men conceivable. Kama-loca is an Oriental synonym for purgatory, and really means nothing more than a progressive condition after death, which the majority of persons must experience, for they are not low enough for Avitchi, nor high enough in the moral scale for Devachan, which is the Sanskrit name for paradise, a condition of calm repose and sweet content, the well-earned reward of an active and self-denying life on earth. Nirvana means ineffable blessedness, and describes the state of the soul when finally released from the need of further planetary pilgrimages.

the Eastern doctrine, and explains the old idea of the seven worlds in harmony with astronomy, at the same time giving us a very intelligent glimpse at the object of planetary creation. As there are seven notes in the musical scale, A, B, C, D, E, F, G, so in a scale of worlds there are seven planets; but the same world does not always represent the same note: there are always seven worlds in each scale, and as a world progresses, it strikes the octave note and becomes the commencement of a higher scale, at which time there is another world ready to enter the scale as lower A, from which this advanced planet has departed as higher A. Say, for instance, that at present in this solar system, Mercury is A; Venus, B; Earth, C; Mars, D; Jupiter, E; Saturn, F; and Uranus, G. Neptune must be A in a scale above. In the order of development a world must either go forward in the scale, or go to pieces, and drop out of it. Some people think the later fate befell one planet in this system, and that the Asteroids are the fragments of this disrupted orb. Some very interesting views on astronomy will be found in the section entitled "Electrical Christian Theosophy"; therefore we will not pursue the theme further at this point, neither will we enlarge upon Karma, as that is treated at length in a section devoted to it. In bringing this lecture to a close we will content ourselves with declaring that a fair-minded study of Hinduism leaves the student amazed at its agreement with Christianity esoterically interpreted, which everywhere forces itself on the student's mind. Verily there is but one esoteric religion under many names.

THROUGH THE AGES.

A Study of the Soul's Progression through Repeated Earthly Experiences.

It is almost impossible to touch upon the profoundly interesting subject of the repeated embodiments of the human soul, or the plurality of terrestrial existences, without feeling something of that pressure of antagonistic thought which beats against the minds of those who are seeking to solve life's mighty problem, and from the prejudiced thoughts of a multitude who seemingly must dogmatize where they have no light, and appear as though compelled to unkindly, even fiercely, denounce all who have received a ray of truth from any source except such sources as they, in their arrogance, suppose to be alone creditable, because in consonance with their own predilections. From science we have nothing to fear and everything to hope; but from blind and self-conceited sciolism we ask no quarter and seek no indorsement.

The objections to the doctrine of repeated embodiments, so far as we have heard them, are without exception crudely materialistic, personalistic in the narrowest sense, and not infrequently vulgar and insulting. For several years the author of this volume and many, many other persons have through the public press importuned the objectors to this great mystery, as it appears to so many, to state reasonably, logically, and consistently, without puerility or venom, their best answer to this dogma, as they term it, and to which they manifest such senseless and irrepressible opposition; but in vain. All arguments to prove it false have turned out weak when not spiteful; and though all over the world a controversy has been waging for many years, and is not ended yet: we have yet to see a single answer to the central claim, that divine justice, impartial equity, is only thus displayed. The innumerable inequalities apparent on every hand imperatively demand some just explanation. Those who oppose the theory of re-embodiment never answer the questions which are put to them. If they are theological bigots committed to some antiquated church dogma which is sure to be a perversion of some occult truth, they content themselves, and strive, though usually quite unsuccessfully in this age, to satisfy their interlocutors with the time-worn and depressing reply, "We must not speculate on matters of religion, God having revealed to us in the Bible and through the ministry of the church all he intends us to know in this life; probably in the hereafter what is now mystery will be made plain."

If the objector be a Spiritualist, he usually commences with an utterly illogical statement concerning relationships, entirely forgetting that no relation which is simply of earth, in any way pertains to the spirit. Persons may be very near earthly relatives and at the same time bound to each other by the closest spiritual ties;

but it is equally common for those who have no tie of blood between them to be exceedingly near to each other in spirit, while the closest earthly bonds often betoken no spiritual relationship whatever. Not only do those Spiritualists who oppose the theory of re-embodiment utterly fail to realize the truth concerning real relations; they confound the terms identity, individuality, and personality so bewilderingly that only one idea is expressed by these three words, each of which when rightly understood conveys a totally different idea. Identity pertains to the soul, individuality to the mind, and personality to the body. In a very fascinating story, published in three volumes by C. L. H. Wallace, Oxford Mansions, London, entitled "Through the Ages," the gifted author, who remains anonymous, brings forward argument after argument in favor of this much misunderstood but most important fact of repeated embodiments, and answers very powerfully the leading objections to it. For those who are not particularly attracted to philosophical essays, such a novel is very helpful and instructive. The same remark may apply in great measure to "Karma," by A. P. Sinnett, which is obtainable everywhere at purely nominal cost, — fifteen to thirty-five cents, according to style of binding and size of type. For those who are really anxious to seriously investigate this great subject we would recommend a work entitled "Reincarnation," published by the Occult Publishing Company, 120 Tremont Street, Boston; also, "The Soul," a series of teachings given through the mediumship of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, published by William Richmond, Roger's Park, Illinois.

Both of these works are most interesting: the former is historical, comparative, illustrative; the latter, positive and didactic in style and reasoning. Of course, manifold questions will arise on this subject in the minds of all who are seeking the light its consideration may help to afford. It is not to be expected that so vast a theme can be dealt with off-hand; nor, in the present stage of general knowledge, need we expect a thoroughly consistent statement of the whole case from the lips or pens of all its numerous advocates.

Allan Kardec, the noted Frenchman, whose name, or rather nom de plume, is so intimately associated with the doctrine of re-embodiment in Europe, was by no means an ultimate authority on the subject, nor did he ever profess to be. He was among the kindest and most modest of men, say those who knew him best. His sole desire was to advance the cause of truth and human progress; to this end he freely gave time, money, energy, and all he had to bestow, reserving for himself only sufficient means to enable him to live quietly in Paris, in rooms largely devoted to the work so near his heart. In the early days of Spiritism in France, the apartments of this noble man were freely open to earnest investigators in the field of psychic science, while all the sensitives who came in his atmosphere found him firm but gentle, grave but kind, ever anxious to give the utmost latitude to individual expression, and then to diligently compare the teachings given through different channels the one with the other, until he found a sufficient concord in the general statement to justify him in publishing them to the world in the Revue Spirite, an excellent journal he was then editing. Four of his principal works — "The Spirits' Book," "The Medium's Book," "Heaven and Hell," and "Genesis" — are now for sale in English at the Banner of Light establishment, — 9 Bosworth St., Boston, — at $1.50 per volume. "Heaven and Hell" is, in our opinion, the most intensely interesting of the series to those who are desirous of considering the matter from a religious standpoint. No matter whether or not one is prepared to accept all that is put forward concerning the sources whence the teachings were derived; wherever they came from, they are excellent, and whatever may be their defects in the opinion of any, no one can justly accuse them of glossing over a palpable weakness or creeping out through a small crevice when a question pertaining to universal equity is on the tapis.

As we look over the earth to-day we see any number of varieties in human condition, and we are naturally led to inquire, Why are things as they are? Theology with its "divine mysteries" may satisfy those who do not feel deeply on these matters, and the future life as mapped out by Spiritualists may seem quite satisfactory to those who are contented with an evasive and partial reply. That everything is for the best, that God does all things well, that all will be fully compensated in the hereafter, may be expressions of a great truth; but the question still remains unanswered, Why are people so terribly unequal now? To this question Theosophy fearlessly addresses itself, and by having recourse to the wisdom of the ages presents the nineteenth century with a philosophy fully in accord with the doctrine of evolution, and also in perfect consonance with every exalted religious sentiment. Evolution is unthinkable if there be no such a base for it as involution supplies. We may trace every organism back from the most complex to the most rudimentary, to a single germ cell; but such an original cell must contain within it all possibilities of future expression, or the development of a higher type could not take place. In the light which involution supplies, evolution is no longer insoluble; for, back of the germ is the spiritual monad, or soul, the living entity, the conscious designer and builder of forms, which is never really confined to any material tabernacle, but uses one after another, the palpable organizations we behold, through which to display its latent talents. James Freeman Clarke, whose essays on Oriental religions are exceptionally fine, tells us in his "Ten Great Religions," a most marvelous production, which all students of Theosophy should study, that while he claims to actually know nothing of transmigration, its truth or error, he feels convinced that the enlightened of ancient time and Orient clime did not teach the vulgar notion entertained by the illiterate, that human souls after the dissolution of their physical bodies pass into the forms of animals; but that the theory of transmigration was really an idea of evolution: therefore the various developments of inferior organisms by the human entity preceded birth into human form instead of succeeding the death of that form. Now if evolution be accepted for the human race at large, why not for every unit in particular? What is there foolish or repulsive in the theory that the vital spark of divine life animating a human organism to-day, built an inferior form in ages past, and that, ever proceeding along its upward way, it is continually advancing toward perfection in expression. "Art Magic" and "Ghost Land," those extraordinary works published about 1876, by Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, who declares them to have been written by "one who knows," and that one not herself, — she being only their translator and editor, — both take the ground of pre-existence, though they do not favor the idea of repeated embodiment in human form. In both those volumes a theory of "elementals" is ingeniously put forward to explain the genesis of the individual soul of man in a rational manner. Such theories are intensely interesting, and well worthy of consideration. We should imagine those who consider them conclusive must believe that some human entities have advanced further in the elemental kingdoms prior to their manifesting in human form than others; and if this conjecture can be fairly argued out, it certainly may do much to remove the terrible blot on the posture of the universal plan, placed there by the dogmas of those who deny both pre-existence and re-embodiment.

A singular work, "The Light of Egypt," for which great claims are made by the author, who holds to being exceeding wise, and who expresses acrid hostility to "Esoteric Buddhism," which he unsparingly denounces and in many places grossly misrepresents, puts forward a somewhat similar view, and were it not for his denunciation of others his work would be very readable throughout: as it is, he, in common with all others of his school who seek to deny whatever they do not understand, misrepresents the purpose of successive embodiments in the most important instances, and makes the doctrine of Karma (consequence) signify a harsh, unreasonable, vindictive, unfair system of punishment, while it is exactly the reverse, — a perfectly equitable plan of education. To many minds the works of Kardec savor of a doctrine of expiation of sins committed in a former existence far too strongly, as also do certain writings of Anna Blackwell, still extant, some of which first appeared many years ago in Human Nature, a London periodical not issued at present. But the stress laid on expiatory suffering is often due to the urgent quest for a satisfactory answer to the query, Why do we suffer? which will not down. In dealing with this topic we desire to be particularly lucid and cautious, and shall therefore carefully avoid all technicalities and seek to present the subject so that any intelligent child may understand it. The human soul, according to Hindu Theosophy, is quite distinct from the spiritual soul, which is its originator and on which it depends for everything. This human soul, the offspring of the spiritual, requires discipline, all of an educational character. It must forfeit its primeval, automatic innocence, and eventually attain the royal height of perfect purity in which, to use a Gospel metaphor, the wisdom of the serpent is united with the harmlessness of the dove. During probationary stages of growth the human soul must develop its own consciousness, and from choice, not compulsion, follow in all things the dictates of spiritual desire. To accomplish the perfect individualization of this subordinate consciousness, it is essential that the soul should experience to the full the result of sowing and reaping according to its own will. There are no rewards and no punishments in the usual but wrongful acceptance of those words. Throughout all periods of progression, each individual reaps what he sows, and his next sowing is in large measure dependent upon his last reaping. There is no particular private destiny marked out for any individual; there is a common race destiny to which all are subject, and this destiny is simply destination. If one man sows grapes and another thorns, one will reap grapes and the other thorns; but there is no law compelling one to sow fruit and another weeds; the law is imperative only in its declaration, — "No man can gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles." If any one desires figs he must cultivate fig-trees, for figs will grow upon no other boughs. If one desire grapes he must cultivate grape-vines, for grapes are produced nowhere else and in no other manner. Thus we cannot say that men are either rewarded or punished in the conventional usage of these terms, but all take the consequences of their own acts, be those acts at a given time remembered or forgotten, and the consequence is itself at all times, under all circumstances, the best thing which could possibly happen to the person who rejoices or suffers by reason of its happening.

Such puerile absurdities as an illustration drawn from whipping a dog for the wrong it committed when a puppy, put forward with all the assumption and dignity imaginable, in "The Light [more correctly the darkness] of Egypt," prove the person who used so ridiculous and false an analogy to be anything but enlightened on the question he perverts. To take up his own dog and puppy simile, we can prove his reasoning false on his own ground; for had he understood the doctrine he assails he would have known that in its reference to canines as well as men it would operate thus: A man (or a dog) has contracted an injurious habit when a youth (or a puppy), the consequence of which has entailed upon him certain suffering, which suffering grows out of the act itself: such suffering is not a judicial punishment in the popular sense; it is a result, and as such in no way dependent upon memory or forgetfulness of the act which occasioned it. Now if the penalty following the act proceeds from the act as naturally as grapes grow on grape-vines and figs on fig-trees, how can one pronounce the suffering in any arbitrary sense a punishment? But our philosophy does not desert us at that point by any means; it carries us much further into an understanding of universal rectitude, by assuring us that the penalty is educational and remedial. Thus what we suffer is not intended to punish us for doing amiss, but to lead us to where we shall not err in future. The best medical doctors all agree that pain serves a double end; it calls our attention to some error, and at the same time is caused by an effort of nature to heal a wound; consequently we do not need nor should we seek exemption from penalty, but deliverance from the ignorant or perverse mental state which occasions suffering, and which is outgrown by means of suffering. The whole doctrine of Karma when reasonably explained is a simple recognition of the perpetual operation of immutable cause and effect. Sin produces suffering, and suffering wipes out the sin; just as when one's garments are stained they need cleansing, and to cleanse them means work.

The present system of incarcerating criminals appears to us entirely wrong, while capital punishment is an offense against reason, justice, and humanity. Hospitals, penitentiaries, industrial schools (miscalled such), lunatic asylums, and a host of other semi-barbaric institutions are no safeguards against crime; those who advocate them as necessities are utterly blind to the real wants of society. The idea of punitive expiation seems to have so befogged the minds of a majority, that it is well-nigh impossible to all at once clear the mental air sufficiently to let in the light of reason upon the popular mind concerning this subject. No life is for punishment, no experience is to pay some one out in a harsh, vindictive sense for some error of a previous existence; but effects will follow causes in the natural order, and hence, if the effect of previous folly is present suffering, is not that suffering a result which cannot be avoided, and which will in due time produce the peaceable fruit of righteousness? Theosophy teaches that all souls are equal; that the first expression of every soul is at the foot of the ladder of progress; every rung is a distinct term of experience, while the spaces between the rungs are periods passed in the invisible state. During the interim between embodiments the soul is neither unconscious or inactive, but still moving forward, till, when that stage of experience is at an end, the next ultimated expression, though in a material form, is always the next step in the forward order.

Some very vulgar errors are exceedingly common, and among them none more prevalent than the belief that "reward" and "punishment" can be determined by one's outward circumstances; that the rich are always favored while the poor are invariably under chastisement, is a very popular but most insane mistake. Some rich people are very happy while others are wretched; the same is true of the poor; neither riches nor poverty can then be regarded as indicators of spiritual, moral, or intellectual status; but wherever we find real nobility, sweet contentment, and pure enjoyment, in a word, blessed satisfaction with one's condition whatever it may be, we witness tokens of spiritual unfoldment. All that we can ever see our way to teach or advocate on this subject of successive embodiments is, that in the cycle of the ages everything is equalized, no one is favored above another; those who are now born in the inferior races will some way be born in the superior; those who are now superior have once been inferior; all start at one point, all ultimately arrive at one goal. The manifold discrepancies of the present will all be cleared up in the light of the future, so that we shall all realize that whatever occurs is for the best; every obstacle we meet we need to encounter and overcome.

But before we can grasp this philosophy we must study the nature of death.

Death to a Theosophist means death to old conditions, the death of the animal instincts, followed by a resurrection to spiritual consciousness, which, like a glorious Phœnix bursts its bonds when freed from the control of earthly passions. This death is truly represented by the butterfly emerging from the chrysalis, or by such emblems as the Easter egg. Death is a casting-off of an outer shell, deliverance from the trammels of the senses, as the spiritual life-principle works its way upward. Resurrection is the triumph of spirit over the thralldom of sense. A great deal in all of us needs to die. As animals we die never to rise again; but when our outer clothing is cast aside, we, i.e. our real selves, ascend to higher states of conscious life. Death, when understood in its true significance, means spiritual elevation, not physical dissolution. The apostle Paul rightly exclaims, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" In this saying, his meaning is that death is only a casting aside of an outgrown shell, as a once imprisoned bird breaks from its calcareous environment, and rejoices in deliverance from its prison. There would be no fear of death if people did not depend on the body for happiness. We should be willing to wear it, and use it as long as we need it, but be ready to cast it off when it can be of no further use, with no doubt of the spirit-world being a better state than this. Strive to make it a matter of perfect indifference to you whether you remain here or go hence. We are always at work in the spiritual universe. There is no real difference to the spirit between birth and death, and as we rise to a consciousness of our real being we deny that we ever were born or ever can die; we realize that we ARE forever. We affirm that we have nothing to fear from death, and we thereby overcome its power to bereave us of what we prize and love. Those who live in the spirit pass to the unseen state without any suffering; they gradually dismiss their physical environment, until the ultimate stage appears only like passing through a beautiful gateway of transition, as it appeared to those great adepts, Enoch and Elijah. Is it necessary that a house should tumble down because we are ready to move out of it? need the body we are ready to vacate first become foul and loathsome? The true philosophy of Being is expressed in Longfellow's immortal couplet, "Dust thou art, to dust returnest, was not spoken of the soul." Soul has a prior existence to the body, and "returns to God who gave it." The experience of a spirit on earth may be likened to that of a child at a boarding-school, or of a youth while an apprentice to a trade away from home. He remembers his home with love, and enjoys it on his return as he never could have enjoyed it had he never left it. The "elder brother" of the Prodigal Son, though *un*fallen was the inferior of the two, as he had not the tender loving spirit of the father toward his brother, who, though fallen, had risen again. The prodigal, who returned to his home, had fought life's battle, and won its prize. We develop from manhood to angelhood, as a child develops from infancy to maturity. The glory of the angel does not equal that of the archangel, but the archangel was once a man, as the man was once an infant. All reflections that lead to an intelligent recognition of Theosophy bring us to a point where we comprehend the true relations of spirit and body here and hereafter; they therefore aid us practically to an incalculable extent in our endeavors to effectually banish all errors and superstitions which produce misery on earth.

We regard the physical body as a necessary tool in the hands of a spiritual workman. Our bodies are constructed for a definite purpose; they are tools for work as well as dresses to wear. They are brought into existence from necessity. The spirit forms its body as a workman constructs his tools. If the question arises, "Why, then, do we not all have the bodies we would like?" we must bear in mind that we cannot always externalize our thought perfectly, even in the making of a dress or coat. We have not as yet perfect power over material, even with the best patterns before us. People are often very much dissatisfied with their own efforts, and much prefer the workmanship of others. The ideal always antedates the actual; a perfect expression of the ideal is reserved for a condition in this world, or some other, where we have gained complete ascendency over all material; then we shall be clothed upon with bodies of glorious spiritual form. There is no such thing as creation of substance, but only creation of form. Forms come and go, substance abides. When bodies are formed nothing comes into being, and when they die nothing goes out of being: there is only a change in appearance. Creation is organization, expression; seeming death is simply dematerialization, the disappearance of some object from the realm of mortal perception. From the standpoint of the Eternal there can be no death. There can be no change in divine law, but there is frequently great change in our conception of it; there can be no change in truth, but only in our views of truth. All outward things change, because outward things are manifestations of finite ideas: all intelligence moves in incessant but ever-diversified activity. Why do worlds change, why do they advance from infancy to old age, and thence to reabsorption into the element whence they sprang? Their changes from first to last are resultant from the condition of some unseen mind working out its capabilities in expression. An organ may remain in one condition during all the years you are studying music, but you are capable of evolving at one time far more intricate harmonies from it than you could at another; the capacity of the organ has not changed, but the musician has; the organ has never been educated, but you have. Planets and human bodies, as we behold them outwardly, are constantly acted upon by intelligences who are always advancing.

The story of Pygmalion and Galatea, in which the statue comes to life and is made to speak, is illustrative of the truth of spiritual evolution. The sculptor produces a marble form by means of his intellect and affections, which somewhat embodies his ideal; he breathes his life into the work of his own hands; it could never become himself: still the statue was made to breathe. Man's outward form can have no life in itself, but it is an animated statue made by the soul; it is will and affection manifest in form. We may even fancy the soul's animated statue to have a wavering, wandering will of its own, which often knows better than it does. Everything we call objective in mineral, vegetable, or animal form, expresses some mental condition; it is an embodied result of mental breath, but not always a faithful reproduction of the one who breathes. Human souls have doubtless lived for ages before they expressed themselves in mortal form. Man is the creator of everything below him. It is far more reasonable to state that the action of a human mind made a monkey than that man ever was a monkey. Man, as a spiritual entity, is now and always in the spiritual world. If our thought has passed through the animal and vegetable kingdoms, they have naturally proceeded from the mind of man previous to his building a form, in which his thought could more perfectly express itself. We can only understand evolution in the light of involution. We never are embodied; we live now and ever in the spiritual state, but the soul gives forth various impulsions, which produce forms, and endow them with more or less perfection. When we rise to conceive of ourselves as we really are, we shall know that we have never been on earth at all, our real selves have created mortal forms, and endowed them with life, as the sculptor created and endowed the statue.

The next question which arises, is, "How can we know each other in spirit?" We know each other in soul-life by nothing that is manifest to sense. Do we any of us really know ourselves? does the lower know the higher nature? Most people live so much in the lower nature that they cannot know themselves in spirit. The "fall of man" is his losing sight of his spiritual nature amid the busy scenes of external activity. The lower ego must find the higher ego before man can, in any true sense, be said to know himself. In the deepest sense we never had mothers, and never were born. Our spiritual being did not commence with mortal birth, but our spiritual entity was the cause of physical conception. Spirit causes mothers to become mothers through a spiritual impulse, too often unrecognized. No woman can give life to a child. We acknowledge spiritual Deity and spiritual humanity. Man must come to an understanding of his true self, and of the principle of spiritual being, before he can know his own soul, and walk in the light of the Spirit, which is the only true Being.

[ORIGINAL POEM.]

THE LAW OF GROWTH: THE PRIOR EXISTENCE OF THE SOUL, ITS EARTHLY DISCIPLINE, AND RETURN TO ITS PRIMAL HOME.

From the sphere of spirit, the realm of the soul,
The spirit descends to earth,
And here takes on its external form,
Born of earth's changeful birth.
For here it must strive for a while
On the earth with all forms of sense,
To develop all power from within itself,
And gain wonderful recompense.

The soul in the realm of the soul above
Is like an unplanted seed,

Like a beautiful acorn that yet will grow
To an oak, whose living seed
Shall be scattered through distant ages,
Over ocean, land, and sea;
Through the many worlds that roll in space,
Amid heaven's immensity.

The law of growth is this wonderful law,
That the spirit contains within Whatever power or majesty
Is unfolded; for it can win
No added power by the earth's control,
Though earth can display the power of soul.
Like a seed that is planted deep in the earth
Nothing is added thereto,
Though the rains have descended, the sunbeams shone,
Though the balmiest zephyrs blew;
Though man should cultivate the soil
And irrigate with care
The place where the seed is sheltered,
Yet the harvest will declare
The special form of the special seed,
And no other can spring from the seed,
But the body expressèd as that special flower,
For God gives to each seed its especial dower.

If the soul of man is embodied here,
And bound to the earth for a while,
Like an alien pilgrim away from home,
While the heavens above it smile;
If weary and worn and ofttimes sad,
The spirit shall turn for light

And ask of the rolling orbs above,
For their testimony bright;

And ask of the wondrous fields of space,
"Oh, what is God's decree?"
All worlds and all souls will answer that Throughout eternity
The law of growth by God's mighty power
Ordains the expanding seed,
And its outward manifestation here
Of what is within — indeed

It may seem that all earthly care,
That all earthly pain and loss,
And all the burdens one may bear
And the heavy weight of the cross,
Are unneeded by the soul,
And you may complain to God
And ask the wherefore and the why
Of griefs that spring from the sod.

But angel hosts in their bright array
Would bring you this wonderful dower,
Would tell you that all their glorious songs,
Which are their spirit's flower;
That all the music and the crown,
And the brightest lights above,
Are answers to the spirit's cry
For more room to unfold its love.

If among the cherubs and seraphs fair
A soul to its master shall say,
"Oh, may I go down to toil on the earth
And travel life's mystic way?

I see the archangels passing fair,
In their hierarchies of light,
And I know though innocent and pure—
My robes are not so bright.

"I hear of their deeds of great renown,
I read in their love-lit eyes
The wonderful story of victory gained;
And when I with ecstasy
Look on you my angel guide, I ask,
'Why am I not such as thee?'"
The angel answers the infant soul,
"My child, if you come to me
And ask of my glory and wondrous state,
Inquiring the reason why,
I must tell you of struggle on many a world,
In many a time passed by;

"Of the gate of birth and the gate of death
Ere my soul was rounded forth
In the splendor of that innocence
Which triumphed over wrath;
In the splendor of that perfect love
And of that wisdom bright
That links me to the radiant realms
Of cloudless heavenly light."

If the soul shall again exclaim,
"I would be such as thee;
Is there no way whereby I may Gain such a high degree?
Are there no means for me to trace
The pathway to the skies?

Oh! can I never wear the crown,
Can there never in my eyes

"Shine that light of wisdom divine Which in yours is more bright than day?"
The angel makes answer: "The way is dark
And long, and thou must stray
For many a cycle far from those
To you the dearest and best,
And toil on earth full many a time
Till thy soul is fully blest."

Then the fairy child of angelic light,
The cherub and seraph fair,
Consents, yea, desires to leave its home
And the beauties over there.
For into the waters of "Lethe" dark
The soul must needs descend,
And then a child is born on earth;
As the soul its path doth wend
Adown from the skies so fair,
The trailing light from above
But dimly lights its earthly way,
And dimly foreshadows its love.
And a child is born with many a tear,
And imprisoned a while in sense,
The captive spirit must sigh and groan
And patiently wait its recompense.

But after all toils of earth,
When the battle is fought and won,
When the life of the spirit is rounded out,
Then more glorious than the sun —

Not cherub nor seraph, but angel bright,
  At length an archangel fair,
In one of the highest spheres of heaven —
  The soul can then declare;

"I have fought the fight, I have won my crown,"
  For the soul goes back again,
Like the prodigal returning home,
  With experience not in vain.
And the soul then turns to the angel guide,
  Who makes answer, "Thou'rt such as I,
For the life thou hast lived, the toil thou hast borne,
  Has lifted thy spirit on high."

Then all the ages, the weary years,
  Full of trials and sorrows below,
To quickened memory pass along
  As a wondrous fantastic show:
And the panorama is all outspread,
  And the many lives in one,
Like many a link in a golden chain,
  Will prove how the work is done.

Through long, long growth to the perfect tree
  From the little angelic seed,
Is the soul's unfoldment to perfect light,
  For life is blest indeed.
And you need not complain, you need not sigh,
  And you never need shed a tear,
For all the burdens that here you bear,
  Though they last through many a year,

Are at length exchanged for a crown of light
  Where the flowers can ne'er decay,

And the victory gained, through eternal years
Is your joy, and your light will stay.

Then work ye well and bear your load
Whatever the burden be,
Knowing your earthly discipline
For a glad immortality
Is for growth to the planted seed
Which, pure as a snow-white dove, Finds at length in the home divine
Perfect wisdom blent with love.

A FURTHER STUDY OF EMBODIMENT. — THE LAW OF KARMA (SEQUENCE), AND HOW IT OPERATES IN DAILY LIFE.

THE preceding lecture has led us up to where we can affirm that though all spirit is in essence good, it needs experience to unfold its capacities. The soul prior to embodiment is like an unplanted seed; physical form gives it opportunity to expand. Many think that souls come to earth merely for expression, in the smaller sense of that word; but if after a struggle through many existences the soul were only converted to its primal state, all effort and earthly discipline would be of no avail whatever. All souls are equally pure in essence; but the soul is not powerful like God; it has no such knowledge as God possesses. If our knowledge is finite and His is infinite, there must be an infinite difference between infinite and finite power; therefore we can understand eternal progression, which means our unending advancement in power and knowledge. God is the only infinite: He is all-powerful Love and Wisdom. Eternal good-will, the pure beneficence of the Infinite brings all beings into existence and endows them with the power and privilege of perpetually drawing nearer to Him in their own consciousness. We are constantly advancing nearer to infinite knowledge and power, but the goal is always beyond us. The human soul is as pure as God, but capable of infinite advancement in knowledge. Souls are embodied on earth to acquire and to unfold, as well as to express. The efforts of finite souls bring worlds and bodies into existence. As soon as we have learned all we can in this present state, and there is therefore no longer need of our further embodiment on earth, we advance to a higher planet. When we have outgrown all love of earth and all yearning for it, we shall live only in spirit; but so long as we retain earthly attractions, they will draw us into realms where earthly experiences can be gained. The earth is a magnet to us until we have overcome all sensuous attraction, and put away all "childish things" through the higher development of understanding. We are drawn to earth just so long as any desire for earthly things lurks within us, and we are often brought (seemingly) involuntarily into whatever outward state corresponds to our mental condition. When we attain to that perfect state of growth of which neither eye nor ear nor heart can yet conceive, we reach the true "home of the soul," the eternal world, or "kingdom of heaven," the absolute Nirvana of unalloyed and perpetual bliss. We have then reached the end of our journey, so far as our spiritual pilgrimage is at present perceived by any of us. What further heights there may be for us to climb, in states beyond our present conception, altogether removed from time and sense, none should attempt dogmatically to decide; though of this we may feel assured, that the conscious immortal entity, the real ego, will be forever reaching out to a yet more glorious destiny.

In the Kabala the statement is made that all worlds and forms are brought into existence, not by En-Soph (Supreme Wisdom) directly, but through the action of subordinate deities designated Elohim. There can be only one supreme life, infinitely good; but the one contains the multitude. Souls always have existed and always will. In the eternal world it is always NOW. Each individual soul can say "I am that I am" in being, though not in existence. Existence is but an external manifestation of being. The unembodied soul is as perfectly pure and divine as the Eternal Soul, in the sense of spotless innocence at least. In our highest conception of ourselves we know we are perfectly pure, but we must learn to distinguish carefully between the divine soul (Atma) and the human soul. The divine soul creates (or emanates) the individual human spirit; the divine soul is the ultimate atom of self-conscious life which physical scientists have never discovered; they can only discover molecules and monads, which are aggregations of atoms, but never do they find an atom. The absolute atom is entirely beyond recognition by means of the five bodily senses, and can only be apprehended spiritually. This divine atom, in its endeavor to express itself, creates the "spiritual soul," which is a secondary emanation; the divine soul belongs to the Elohim, and is a child of God. It is the human spirit which needs earthly discipline and experience. Now we cannot any of us begin at the top of the ladder. Everything originates in spirit; matter is the lowest vibration of spirit. We see everything on earth, as it were, through inverted lenses, for we see effects without their causes. Jacob's ladder symbolizes embodiment for experience; it represents the descent of spirit into matter and its return to its source. There can be no self-existent matter; there is but one eternal homogeneous substance, but this is heterogeneously expressed. Matter is the lowest expression of this one substance, and is non-existent in the realm of cause, for in absolute reality ALL IS SPIRIT. The esoteric doctrine admits matter only as an appearance in time to sense: spirit alone is both Alpha and Omega. The spiritual soul, the human soul, and the animal soul form a trinity in expression; but the Atma is the sole origin of all. The spiritual soul is expressed through intuition, the human soul through reason, and the animal soul through instinct. We all possess these three so-called principles. Intuition is a moral sense, reason is purely intellectual, while instinct is animal perception. We outgrow animal perception as we lose hope in certainty and belief in knowledge, or as we lose the shell when the bird emerges from it, and the bud as it becomes the flower: we shall at length conquer all limitation. Theosophists usually place the human soul (intellectual principle) between the animal soul which tends to earth and the spiritual soul which soars heavenward: though intellect may often aspire, it is constantly vibrating and faltering in its allegiance between spirit and matter. It is for each individual to decide whether he will voluntarily unite himself with the spiritual universe, or remain susceptible to lower influences. If he choose the latter, it must result in moral suicide or death. Each one must individually decide whether he will live after the flesh or in the spirit. Herein is contained the meaning of all allegories setting forth the temptation and fall of man. If there were no lower states in the universe, we could not reach the higher. Intellectual culture alone is not sufficient for mankind, for many intellectual people give themselves to vice. The spiritual soul, through intuition, like a good genius, is ever urging us onward and upward; while our evil genius (animal soul) is ever attracting us downward toward its own plane. The fourth principle in man (animal soul) must be the servant of the fifth, and the fifth of the sixth, or chaos (discord) is inevitable. This subordination of the lower to the higher answers the old question concerning good and evil, light and shadow, which constitute the foreground and background of existence; but it is light that reigns forever; the shadow does its work and is then absorbed in the light which alone made it possible. In the light of re-embodiment, the idea of punishment is partly true and partly false. By punishment we do not mean retaliation, but means for unfoldment, education, and expansion through suffering. We must understand what we are, before we can comprehend our mission, or conceive why we are embodied at all. Man spiritually is a perfect unit; in manifestation, a trinity in unity: the upward-pointing triangle represents the mental, the moral, and the spiritual in man, while at the centre shines the central sun, Atma, the true Ego, the individualizing principle, which is forever the child of God, and, like its divine Author, incapable of sin, sickness, or sorrow.

Varying degrees of unfoldment account for differences in people, but these differences are only external. The divine soul of man is the child of God, and never varies from goodness or holiness; the soul being perfect in purity, even while expressed on earth. When we sin, we do not live in union with this divine principle. All we recognize of ourselves ordinarily is very much less than our true selves; we have never made a full discovery of what we are, or of our real powers. Sons of men, in rare instances only, have come to know they are sons of God. Many have come to a better understanding of this divine truth than others. Whenever we dwell on the successive embodiments of spirit, we endeavor to show that all is in harmony with God's perfect law of justice, in consequence of which there can be no respect of persons. The Buddhist doctrine of Karma is simply an Oriental mode of portraying divine justice as always acting impartially; its entire philosophy is a vindication of divine justice in an application of the law of spiritual involution and physical evolution in every individual case. The doctrine of evolution teaches falsity when not interpreted spiritually. How often we hear of a man's being superlatively gifted, when in reality his gifts are powers acquired in a previous expression of his soul when he worked as others work now who are acquiring similar gifts. There is no way of justly explaining the marked differences between people which we all observe, but by the law of Karma, or sequence. If all persons to-day enjoyed equal knowledge of truth, all would appear equal; if we all knew the right and did it, we should be entirely free from pain and trouble; but do we all, in our present expression, have equal opportunities of knowing the truth? Are there not multitudes on earth to-day who have no adequate opportunity of acquiring spiritual knowledge? The reason is found in the law of Karma, which Theosophy explains.

Karma regulates our opportunities. In the use we make of them we create good, and in misuse, or failure to utilize opportunity, we make evil Karma. One may have the opportunity to learn certain things, while his nearest friend may be so situated as to never find such knowledge within his reach. Why? because he had not grown to meet such opportunity. Then in relation to external affairs, take an example: Two persons may advertise for a position; one obtains a favorable reply, another receives none. Thus does Karma operate in daily life. Some persons have "gifts" others cannot cultivate. But remember we are never at a standstill; we are making Karma perpetually. Our past has made our present, and our present is making our future. We only live one life after all, but our experience of life is divided into many parts, and just as our present is the result of our past, our next condition will be the result of our present efforts, for we are incessantly manufacturing Karma. We are creatures of past Karma only so far as immediate opportunity is concerned; to-morrow we shall be swayed by the Karma we are making to-day. No endeavor is by any means valueless. Whatever gift we possess, whatever possibility of advancement is now ours, is due to something we have learned in our past, when we laid up the treasure which is now ours. As it teaches that everything finally rests with the individual, the doctrine of Karma is, therefore, most encouraging, hopeful, and inspiring, not depressingly fatalistic as so many people misunderstand it. What is fate? Not something arbitrarily imposed upon us: our present condition is but the result of our previous life. Whether we remember making Karma or not, our Karma is of our own manufacture, and this is our present limitation. We rise beyond this through better effort in this existence than we made in our previous one. The soul in its first embodiment has no Karma. When we have conquered Karma we are controllers, not creatures of circumstances any longer. To attain to a Karmaless condition is to complete the cycle of embodiments, and attain Nirvana.

Some people seem "darlings of fortune," while others are always "unlucky." It is a false theory that states it to be God's will that some should enjoy all the blessings, and others endure all the hardships of life. In regard to our failures when we try hard to succeed, and all the events we do not as yet understand, we must conclude we have not grown to where we can always attract, or be benefited by what we desire. Our trials are preparations for a state where we shall receive all we crave when we crave only good. There is some good and adequate reason why we have not succeeded hitherto; but past failure is no evidence of future misfortune. All failure has done something for us; it has been a means of development, and as we progress we are not really the persons who failed, so there is no reason why we should not succeed in future. King Bruce of Scotland, when in prison, watched a spider fail in spinning his web six times, but succeed with the seventh attempt. The six failures made the success of the seventh effort possible. This spider was a working illustration of the universal principle of growth. The spider had not gained the experience and skill after the fifth attempt it had acquired after the sixth, when it had developed to a condition which culminated in success. In all life's endeavors we win the prize only after humiliation and defeat. The triumphs of the successful embody the proposition that some people have outgrown the states in which others still are. All souls have the same to conquer, but at a given moment all are not equally far advanced. We should take all the humiliations we experience as a needful part of our education. There is really no luck or fortune, but one road for all to travel, — the path of growth. We must all climb one ladder of effort. Whatever comes to us is a result of our position on the ladder, and our position to-day is the result of all the steps we have taken hitherto. The understanding of Karma causes us never to dread ultimate failure, never to look forward with forebodings as though any were doomed to failure, but to press hopefully onward with such opportunities as are born of past accomplishment. Without special prophetic vision we can all see the results of our previous experiences in our condition at present. If we can bear fame and riches without haughtiness, and fill a high position well, we shall not need to sweep crossings in a future embodiment. The good ruler does not return as a slave, but despots must acquire humility through humble service, learning the blessedness of ministration in the lowest positions. Whatever good one has earned one retains forever. As everything is a direct effect of some cause, every one should feel, "I have only to make a proper effort to succeed. I am assured of ultimate success. I am called to pass through no experiences others have not passed through." It is precisely with the individual as with the race, for the race is only a man on a larger scale. The race undergoes what each man undergoes till his final conquest over all material things. We are all growing from an imperfect to a perfect state. We should not look regretfully upon the past, but acknowledge a divine unity of purpose displayed in all experiences.

Instead of the world being about to be destroyed, it is becoming ever more and more perfect. When finally the spirit that has operated upon it withdraws, it will pass into obscuration, but will again be brought forth as a school for other minds, who will in their turn also recede from it. These vast periods or cycles of birth and death are the "days and nights of Brahm," which are ever succeeding each other: but a perpetual monotonous round is not the destiny of any individual; for every individual there is no going back, but, on the contrary, perpetual progress. The world is always a school, in which there are days for action, and nights for sleep. The scholar who once graduates never goes back to the infant school as a learner, but steadily progresses until he at length reaches Nirvana, or heaven

(the highest state conceivable). We shall all at length become Karmaless, and thus outgrow our "fate," and rise superior to everything we now call accident. Our experience on earth qualifies us all for a higher life. Our present state is that of the chrysalis; the next will be that of the butterfly. A poet aptly says, "here in the body pent"; for this state is one of limitation. But it may be asked, Does not the butterfly die as well as the chrysalis? Yes; for all external forms dissolve, but the soul dwells in eternity, and is forever the same. When the distinction between the true identity and the fleeting personality of man is grasped, there will be no further difficulty in understanding ourselves as distinct from our embodiments.

The question is often asked, Does the law of Karma make no provision for the forgiveness of sin? We reply: It is founded on eternal justice, which is the abiding rock of truth. The internal proof of any theory is that it harmonizes with perfect justice. Having a keen sense of justice born within ourselves, we know that whatever is just is true, and that whatever is unjust cannot be true. Justice is the universal solvent, the sole interpreter of all the mysteries of existence. Is the law of Karma just or not? It is often said, "to err is human; to forgive, divine," but we are told that Karma allows of no forgiveness. Is it not less than divine to forgive? Can your highest idea of God be of one who forgets and forgives? Can we believe Him capable of anger, wrath, or resentment? So long as our idea of God is semi-barbaric, so long is the Divine Being endowed by our thought with human limitations, but no longer. God is no more than human if he forgives, and not even human in the highest sense, because forgiveness implies an alteration in the mind of the one who forgives. God can never change his mind, for he is never less than perfect; he can never change his attitude toward his children, though they may frequently change their attitude toward him. God is never angry, though he may appear so to us when we hold anger in our hearts toward our brethren. What a lesson for humanity there is in "neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." Jesus, when on the cross, said, "Father, forgive them" — as an example to the unforgiving, not to ask God to do what he otherwise might not have done; but in tender pity for man's imperfection, to teach man the needed lesson of forgiveness. It is often our duty to forgive others, because we are imperfect; but God, being perfect, can never become angry, and therefore He has nothing to forgive. God is never anything but Infinite Love and Wisdom. It is carnally human to err; it is humanly divine to forgive, because when man forgives he puts away his own error. It was once thought that in the thunder clap God revealed his anger; the lightning flash was interpreted by the Romans as the fury of imperial Jove, but storms are now regarded as footprints of Divine Goodness. The true philosopher sees only infinite love and wisdom in everything; all is good even when incomprehensible. All of God's actions are based on infinite goodness; man's are not. Theosophy gives us this higher conception of an unchangeable Deity. Now if God, Law, and Nature are inseparable; if immutable, Natural Law is the law of Divine Mind, law is simply the expression of Divine Will. We thus get rid of everything but God, and attain to pure Theism. God is the eternal cause present in the effect; the effect must partake of the nature of the cause. What, then, is inexorable, immutable law, but the unvarying manifestation of divine benevolence? Karma is only sequence, effect following cause; and if some consequences of human folly are painful, they are not the less gracious and beneficial.

The operation of Karma often brings us bereavements; but there are no bereavements except to sense. So long as we place our affections on things of sense, we need the discipline of losing their object: thus the bitterest experience is a stepping-stone to a higher affection. True happiness does not depend on external things, but on peace of mind. A bereaved mother might develop a love so pure and unselfish for her child, a love so full of comprehension of what was really best for him, that she would come to know herself forever in the real child's presence. Then there would be for her no more sense of loss or bereavement; she would be more conscious of the spirit world than of earth, and absolutely certain her child was with her and loving her. It is the animal soul in us which continually wars against the spirit. This lower element occasions all our grief. Spiritual science declares death to be only belief; but who entertains the belief? Not the one who appears to die, but they who pass through the bereavement occasioned by belief in another's death. He who is supposed to have died, has not passed through a belief of death at all. If he could speak to your consciousness, he would say, "I am alive and with you, just as before." The belief in death is on the earthly side; the one who has "passed over" knows he has not died. How can a living soul believe in its own death, and how can God know anything of death when all live unto him? How can he sympathize with your physical loss when your friends are not lost? God must see everything in its true light; how, then, can he sympathize with what has never occurred? We fancy people die, but that is our error, and we continually ask God to recognize it. If God is infinitely true, how can he recognize what has no reality, what never took place, and never can take place? If we knew the why and wherefore of all our experience, if we could take the point of view that celestials take, we should see at once that all is good; we should know that trial is good in disguise, and exclaim with Job: Shall we not receive from the hand of God what seemeth good and what seemeth evil? We give two opposing names to one impartial dispensation of divine goodness. What we call good at one time we call evil at another. At the true point of observation we see that all is good; there is no evil; all things are for the best.

When we arrive at this point, truth blots from our vision all sight of tears and sorrow. We then know that the eternal purpose is fulfilled in everything. There must come a period when we shall all know that whatever we have undergone was needful to our unfoldment, but the flower is not foreseen by all when the seed is planted, though the flower is in the seed. Externally speaking, the seed is before the flower, and slowly develops into the flower; but in spiritual understanding, the flower is perfect previous to the seed. The external world will at length become a faithful portrait of the thought of the Divine Artist, but in the present condition of the world the photograph is unfinished. When all divine ideas are perfectly mirrored on earth, the millennium will have come, which is the period of the finishing of the world-picture, when ideas that have always existed in the mind of God shall be perfectly reflected in the mind of man and his surroundings. When God's idea is perfectly reflected in us, we shall be perfectly contented and happy, knowing no further care or annoyance.

Geologists say that the earth is still young; upheavals of nature are but signs of imperfection, the means by which the earth advances to a more perfect condition; by means of cyclones and earthquakes all that is fitted to survive reaches maturity. There is a reciprocal action between earth and man. Physical and spiritual science really teach the same truth. When all prophecies are fulfilled in human experience, and spiritual illumination gilds the page of Scripture, we learn that everything is right now, we lose sight of all evil, and outgrow everything that occasions sorrow, humiliation, or pain. When we feel that a so-called calamity is the best thing that can possibly occur, it ceases to be a calamity in our eyes. There is in every mind an undercurrent of thought that submission is ignoble; we often think that the world would get on better without storms, that if something could avert earthquakes what a blessing it would be; but science teaches all these convulsions are necessary to the evolution of a perfect earth, and harmful only from a superficial point of view. When those who suffer outwardly understand this, they are sufferers no longer in mind, for they feel no anguish of spirit as when they deem themselves deserted by divine goodness. The pessimist thinks all mysterious events are occasioned by blind force, void of intelligence and mercy: this feeling causes much of the misery of the world. If our house is burned, and we feel it to be an experience we need to pass through, we do not really suffer when we recognize a divine purpose working through the fire; for even if it leaves us paupers, we feel it was a necessary part of our education, therefore we can maintain a cheerful spirit in spite of poverty. If we can realize that everything is really for the best, we are able to meet all the difficulties in our way, without letting them crush us to the earth; we cannot in that case feel downtrodden and overwhelmed, as though we thought ourselves the playthings of blind force. The point to be reached is to be entirely unaffected by external things; gaining this point, we have completed our terrestrial journey. However and whenever this result is reached, it marks the completion of all earthly discipline.

We can in some instances exhaust all "bad Karma" in our present life. Those who can do so are often healed or converted to all appearance suddenly. Karma is of all our thoughts, words, and deeds the necessary effect. We have been making Karma through our whole life; it is the concentrated result of all our actions and thoughts during our entire lifetime. The question often arises, Can we change all our conditions in the remaining years of our present earthly life? can we project a force now, strong enough to obliterate all past Karma? If we make a very sincere effort, perhaps we can; but if we live on in a careless fashion, we certainly cannot enter in the future world upon a state of perfect happiness. Remember always that what pertains to an immediate future state is not true of the eternal state; these terms are not by any means identical. What we often call "forever" is not eternity. Through the operation of Karma (sequence), the steady development of individual merit, we get rid entirely of the doctrine of everlasting punishment, which is founded on a misunderstanding of the right application of a Greek adjective which means sometimes long-enduring and sometimes eternal; but sulphur, brimstone, and fire are always symbolical of purification.

Churchmen have made a grave mistake in limiting probation to one lifetime, and in regarding as eternal the period which follows one life and precedes another. It is utterly impossible that a just God should make an eternity depend on our acts in one temporal life; but a temporary result ever follows a temporary cause. With eternity "hell" has nothing to do, only with the life which immediately follows the present; that life we are preparing for here and now. Our immediate future certainly depends on the use we make of this school; and the duties belonging to this world have to be done here or nowhere. A theory that endows this life with such importance, making this world a vitally important world, inspires us with energy to live well now. We gain temporal reward for temporal good, and suffer temporal punishment for temporal error. Eternal reward for temporal merit would be unjust. When some beautiful, innocent soul enters the spiritual world, bright, pure, and happy, it may have nothing to outgrow; but it may have much to learn, nevertheless. We must develop spiritually in this world if we would enjoy the spiritual state after death. If a talent has not been improved here, it will be taken away there; not finally, indeed, but held in abeyance till another embodiment, when we shall again have it to use. We cannot be truly happy here or elsewhere until we have destroyed all evil Karma, for it is that which causes all suffering and distress, and the only way to destroy it is to do the special good that counteracts the special evil. We can only judge of progress by noting our development toward perfect charity. When we have conquered some particular vice, we have proof of it, for we can then destroy similar vice in others. All the good you think builds up your spirit; all bad thoughts have the same effect on the spirit that bad air or tainted food has on the body. But still another question arises, Have you encouraged enough good thought to more than counterbalance the evil? Often, alas, we build with one hand and pull down with the other. Some lives oscillate continually between good and evil, and thus remain stationary. Whenever we speak a kind word we step forward; when we are unkind we go backward; but even in going back we learn something, for there is progress even through retrogression. Good lives forever; bad Karma, at worst, endures only for a limited time, as it relates only to time; it makes us suffer, and thus we advance by means of it. Karma works as a discipline for our good in every case. To understand this takes from us all disposition to repine at any grief, care, or misery which we have brought upon ourselves. We really suffer only as long as we see no reason for what we endure. Whatever befalls us is the consequence of what we have been. We are reaping our past and creating our future every moment; as whatever we do, say, or think makes fresh Karma. To study Karma is highly practical; for as we can destroy evil Karma by creating good, the creation of good Karma is the work of to-day. Let us make the very best of our past and its consequences, by converting the failure and folly of the past into pure gold for future days. There is no arbitrarily allotted time for any result. There is work for us all to do; and when we have done it we receive the result of that work independent of the time occupied in its performance.

We must strive to eliminate from our efforts all anxiety as to their result, for reward always springs from work done, not from anxiety concerning a future. If we worry, we are almost certain to turn the scales against ourselves. Right must prevail because it is right: truth conquers because it is truth. In a tranquil state of mind we are able to do what we could not otherwise see how to do. All worry disqualifies us for work. If we feel our success to be uncertain, we are apt to fail; but when we do not worry, we walk in light; the light of intuition which is for our universal guidance. We are all far too prone to pray the prayer of doubt and uncertainty. Intuition is an infallible guide which we cannot follow until the higher principle in us is developed. The highest advancement springs from self-forgetfulness. As we become indifferent to our lower selves, we rise to care for the welfare of the whole human race. While we are in our spiritual infancy, we may be cold, haughty, and imperious, which proves we have not grown superior to the tempter (our own lower self).

Jesus, as an incarnation of Truth, was the Light of the world, and lived in perfect harmony with divine law. Both Jesus and Buddha were ripened fruits on the tree of life, in contrast to others who were yet green. If we are sour and acid now, let us not despair, but remember Jesus and Buddha gathered sweetness through earthly discipline. We behold in such matchless lives the perfect culmination of the wearisome stages we are now passing through. Jesus, "perfected through suffering," ascended to his glory, only after having passed through the very experiences whose utility we are so prone to disallow. The very sufferings we find hardest to bear lead most surely to perfection. The most bitter of all his experiences was the infidelity of his friends; the betrayal of Jesus by Judas he surely did not deserve, but through the alchemy of universal justice that heart-rending trial proved the very means by which he was perfected. Only in being faithful under trial can we create good Karma. Every time we meet with a trial or annoyance we have special opportunity to make good Karma; and it is a heavy loss to us if we do not take advantage of it. In the sum of our existence (many links, but one chain), we receive our full deserts. Impressions are made on our spiritual bodies by everything we have thought, said, or done. The law of Karma is a law of perfect compensation.

As there are many terms used by Theosophists which are unfamiliar to the general reader, we will seek to explain a few of them. We understand by Devachan, for instance, simply a night between two days, a Sabbath between two periods of activity. Devachan is the Buddhist's paradise, a place of rest, but not of perfect enjoyment. It is natural that all should look forward to a state of perfect happiness eventually, but man's ideal state is capable of an entirely better explanation than is ordinarily furnished by Theosophy. No one could greatly enjoy resting, and never returning to a state of activity. The Second Adventists' theory of sleeping in the grave is a corruption of the Buddhist idea of Devachan. Nirvana is a state where activity will be perfectly restful, and where perfect rest will be active enjoyment. The spirit on passing from earth sometimes needs a period of repose before it wakes up to active consciousness; but there is no heavenly state which is one of idleness. Perpetual motion is the law of existence. Rest does not mean idleness, or stagnation, but only a temporary suspension of our mental activity, as during a vacation or holiday. The soul at some time reaches a point where it has no longer any occupation connected with earth. In Devachan, or "the spirit world," we all remain until we are prepared for another term of activity, and during our sojourn in that state we grow quietly but surely, as physical bodies grow most in sleep. The "spirit world" will yield us the fruitage of the life we are now living;

we shall reap there as we have sown here; then we may after a while enter upon a new embodiment, but we cannot then be at once wise and noble or of very great use to the world, if we have hitherto sown evil seed. Consequences run from one life to another, but eventually work themselves out. God does not forgive sin, as orthodoxy teaches, but we outgrow past errors. When we have outgrown all evil desires we become Karma-less. The tree of life is the tree of the knowledge of good only. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil is the tree of discipline on which Karma grows, and thereon rewards and penalties grow together.

Everything that comes to us must redound to our final good; it cannot possibly be otherwise. If some of us had eternally fewer difficulties and trials than others, we would have fewer opportunities for progress, and may we not ask, "Does God give more opportunities for unfoldment to some than to others?" "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations;" it is always some lower element in our nature not yet overcome that tempts us. The animal soul is our tempter and the only devil there is. Only through resisting this tempter can we develop strength of character. No one is spiritually great who has not made an effort to become great, either in this or in some past embodiment. All past experience is stored up in the mind, but we are not always aware of it. We have far more accumulated experience than we know anything of, for we do not express on earth more than we now need. Wendell Phillips was naturally a man of great capacity, but he never would have greatly distinguished himself had not the great need of the age made its demand upon him. He would in any case have been a graceful speaker, but not the great and thrilling orator he was in the days when the antislavery conflict was at its height, had not that great cause appealed to the ability within him. We are not all equally imbued with power, because only a few have undergone such discipline as to have stored within them great latent capacity.

In our next embodiment we shall not begin where we left off in this, but where we ended in the spiritual state following this embodiment. If we live impurely now, it will leave us in a state of mental exhaustion, so we will have but small chance to progress; we shall have to struggle with tremendous odds, but may, nevertheless, win a great victory. No condition is hopeless, and no child was ever born for punishment. This world is not a hell, but simply a school where all have opportunity to learn; no fate hangs over any head ordaining failure, though some have to struggle very hard to make life a success. The doctrine of Karma teaches hope and inspires to effort; it does not encourage reconciliation to the inevitable, because nothing in the fatalistic sense is inevitable; we all have opportunity to make good Karma now, and thereby secure happiness in our next embodiment. If one succeeds in developing character here, his spirit goes into the spirit world (Devachan) bright and beautiful, prepared for bliss in the next embodiment. A martyr's crown shines brightest of all in the life beyond. For such lives there is compensation whose glory no words can portray.

Our heaven is always what we make it. Whatever is our idea of heaven we will realize. Every one receives what is the very best for him. We have all conceived of something we think of as perfect happiness, but some of us are capable of enjoying far more than others: it would take far more to satisfy one than another; but if we are faithful in this life, we shall attain in the next all the happiness we can appreciate. Some we know can apprehend beauty in music and art that ordinary people cannot detect. Some can drink copious inspiration from a landscape; others cannot appreciate it at all. The difference in people is so great that, if we could measure the actual amount of their enjoyment, one person when thoroughly happy would appear in capacity like a small-sized goblet; another, like a gallon vessel. The Indian of the North American prairies has no higher idea of the future state than of happy hunting-grounds: his sole ambition is to reach that desired goal, which would not, with our higher desires, in any way satisfy us; but the Indian would exclaim, "Great Spirit, so good to give me all I want"; he could not enjoy anything higher. If one has lived an artistic life, he might imagine a beautiful city, with scenery of gorgeous description, where treasures of beauty are freely outpoured. All can receive happiness in the ideal world they have pictured to themselves. The man in his study is no happier with his books than is the child in the nursery with his toys; the child must grow mentally to the stature of a man before he can enjoy a man's books. If we strive for the highest growth we can conceive of, we awake after "death" to all the glories we can enjoy. There can be no absolutely perfect reward except for an absolutely perfect life. The more advanced the soul, the higher its possibilities of enjoyment. This view of the future life will at once strike the reflective reader as in perfect accord with "Many mansions in the Father's house."

How can we meet our friends in heaven if they are re-embodied? is a question which perplexes many; let us try to answer it: There is often a very long period between embodiments, — the intervals are referred to in the New Testament as ages. "The world coming to an end," "a new heaven and a new earth," and similar expressions, often refer to lapses between embodiments. We need not fear that if our friends are re-embodied we shall not meet them in the spirit world. We do not realize the dual life we are now living, and this is the reason why we cannot realize spiritual communion more fully than we usually do. This world is not man's native element; we are at times obliged to retire from it; this earth is a workshop, from which we need temporary retreats; we have to withdraw frequently into our natural element to find rest beyond the realm of dreams. From unbroken slumbers we awake recreated, strong, and full of peace. In the realm of spirit our spirit has enjoyed a higher fellowship than we can outwardly realize, but we experience the result in renewal of energy for all states of life. When embodied on earth, we are like amphibious animals, living between two elements. We, in perfect repose, go out of the material element into the ocean of spirit, and we could not do our work on the dry land if we did not occasionally rest in the water. We must strive to realize each other now, not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

When we reach a higher state of being, we shall neither know nor care what external form our friends may wear, since form does not contain spirit. The earthly embodiment is only a garment, an external projection of spirit: the substance must not be confounded with the shadow it casts. We (our real selves) always were, and we always shall be, in the spirit realm; we must learn to know each other in spirit now, if we would know and understand what we really are. The soul retains its perfect individuality in the spirit world, independent of external expression. When people express a desire to meet their friends in the life beyond, they often fail to realize in what spiritual union really consists. We should very soon grow tired of rigid outer personalities. Nothing external could forever satisfy us. We live forever in the life immortal, and true unions pertain to the unchanging state of the soul only.

As a supplement to this discourse, we append some thoughts on the true relations of

THEOSOPHY AND METAPHYSICAL HEALING.

Considerable misapprehension has prevailed in some quarters on this subject; but metaphysical healing is really Theosophy applied to health, metaphysical healing being the utilization of the spiritual power in man for beneficent ends. It is the desire of adepts to bring this truth before the world for the benefit of all mankind. The metaphysical movement has come before the world through the direct action of master-minds, belonging to the most important orders in the world. The principle of metaphysics is the principle of Eastern wisdom, and it is only just to Theosophy and the wisdom of the East to make this statement. Mrs. Eddy says she obtained it from a study of the Bible. How did Dr. Quimby and others receive it? It matters not. These flashes of light which have come to different minds have all proceeded from orders that have for ages held this truth, which they give to the masses as they are able to receive it. Those who receive it intuitively do, in a certain sense, as they claim, receive it from God. Metaphysics and Theosophy are perfectly at one: mediumship has often been an erratic manifestation of spiritual power, but in its highest phases it is strictly theosophical, though in its lowest it is nothing more than "gray magic." No one can be a successful healer unless he lives a pure life, in conformity with the teachings of the science he professes to hold dear. By perfect devotion to spiritual truth and the good of humanity, all can exercise the power, the use of which Jesus taught to his disciples.

Every true healer is a true Theosophist, for he endeavors to turn the attention of his patients from matter to spirit; he insists upon the culture of the spiritual nature, and the establishment of noble relations with the psychic world, which will enable man to inherit all things worth inheriting. Our external forms receive an imprint from every thought which enters our minds. We believe in the perfect physical regeneration of the body through psychical means, and contend that this can only be accomplished through the action of the highest thought: when the higher nature is appealed to, it drives out what the lower nature has accreted. The elixir of life is not a drug, or the blood of an animal, but the life that springs from the interior principle, — the Logos, the true Ego, the Life of God within us. In our highest condition we undertake to heal no one; but as the sun radiates light and heat through the solar system, so do we radiate health when we are in health. Every soul in eternity can perceive only good, be receptive to, and express only good.

The man who has really found his soul sheds blessing everywhere; he can go nowhere without healing the sick: wherever he goes he carries a beneficent influence which he unconsciously dispenses as freely as the song of a bird or the perfume of a flower. We shall never develop into such a condition, however, unless we love to do good to mankind universally. Let us cultivate our higher principle for the sake of the good we can do. All power is ours when we are in Divine Understanding. Life is a battle, and only they who fight the battle win the prize. Spiritual healing is more than mental healing. Mind-cure is an inadequate expression.

Spiritual illumination is necessary for perfect healing. A proper metaphysical treatment closes the door upon error and opens a door into heaven; it is often like opening the window in a room full of foul air so as to let in a fresh, cool, sweet breeze, which soon purifies and harmonizes the apartment. This is what thought does, when we affirm: "I am spirit, one with God; I am perfectly well in my interior, immortal being." When we thus relate ourselves with the Infinite, we open a window nothing can ever close. Sometimes in the minds of the afflicted there are windows opening to most disagreeable places; a spiritual treatment shuts that window and opens another to a bed of roses, as it were, letting in thoughts of peace, and harmonizing all with celestial planes of intelligence. Spiritual truth opens the avenues of the mind to the knowledge of being; it conduces to right living, to traveling in the right way, to the overcoming of all discordant thought; it enables us to enter upon our rightful heritage of eternal life and blessedness. Every such treatment should be educative; the healer should develop a spiritual atmosphere by benevolent thought. Trust in God; rest in Spirit; work without anxiety as to results. In giving ourselves up to spiritual influx, we are yielding to the Holy Spirit, which is far better than relying on our own mentality. When one treats with personal will he soon becomes exhausted. Treatment coupled with doubt is worse than none at all; when you are agitated and do not leave all to God, you are giving wrong mental medicine, — your thought, not God's thought. You cannot fail when you are in truth, for it is God's will that every one should be well and happy.

Theosophy recognizes seven senses: Spiritual Science seeks to develop the sixth and seventh senses, through which we come into conscious relation with the astral and spiritual worlds. When we study Spiritual Science, we study everything there is; for spiritual knowledge is the only solvent of life's mystery. Some Theosophists we know take a mistaken view of spiritual healing, owing to a false view of astrology, or planetary influences. Now astrology and alchemy are true sciences; they are the spiritual side of astronomy and chemistry. Theosophy teaches that we were born when certain influences were in the ascendant, because of the Karma we brought with us from past experiences: this caused us to be conceived and born just when we were. Our "brooding stars" are due to our Karma; but Karma is to be vanquished, it is not to govern us. The perfectly unfolded soul is represented astrologically in the twelfth chapter of Revelations, as a woman clothed with the sun, in contrast to Adam and Eve, who were represented in the garden of Eden as naked, signifying ignorant though innocent; that is, in a state of moral infancy. Their adoption of clothing signified growth in knowledge through experience. Eve, though innocent and perfect in virgin beauty, wore no crown; chaste as marble, pure as ice, with beauty unsullied, she was still no queen, no conqueror. She is the representative of infantile innocence, but one to whom no one need apply for advice or instruction, as she has no knowledge of the world, or its trials. While fair and pure, she was only a little child who could not serve as teacher, counselor, or guide. Now gaze upon the other picture, — a woman standing in regal glory, clothed with the sun, the moon beneath her feet, a crown of twelve stars upon her head; a woman with all the chastity that could be imagined as pertaining to the pure Edenic virgin, but chastity combined with all — commanding knowledge, intelligence united to purity, love married to wisdom. Between these two, a great gulf is fixed; but it is the Edenic woman who has developed into the radiant queen of the Apocalypse. We may take Eve to represent a susceptible person who always "takes on conditions"; when tempted by the serpent (error), she is utterly unprotected; but the light that clothes the apocalyptic woman is the armor of the Spirit which envelopes her from head to foot and paralyzes the serpent. Jesus placed before us, as our goal, a glorious condition that is still beyond us, the union of the dove's harmlessness with the serpent's wisdom.

Now what is the esoteric significance of the apocalyptic figure? The sun corresponds to our spiritual nature, the moon to our physical, or animal nature, and the twelve stars to our different intellectual powers. Many astrologers tell us, "the wise man rules his stars." The true Theosophist, in whom divine wisdom is regnant, rules his own intellectual powers, compelling them to act as servants to the divine soul (atma) as the visible sun rules the planets which revolve around it. Our atma is the sun in us; the true ego is the spiritual sun. The moon represents the animal nature, a mere satellite which must be subjected to the intellect, while both mind and sense must obey the Spirit. This is the true planetary correspondence of the powers within ourselves. As planets revolve in space, they are continually discharging electricity into the atmosphere; the recent perihelion of several has had a great deal to do with the present tumult and unrest in human society all over the world; but all these influences being mortal, they afflict only those who are on the mortal plane of thought and affection. When we cultivate our soul power, when we are clad in armor from head to foot, no arrows or bullets can pierce our armor. When we live in the Spirit, by constant at-one-ment with the interior life, we clothe ourselves with the sun, subdue the moon (all carnal passions) beneath our feet, and earn a diadem of twelve stars, signifying the perfect development of our intellect (the twelve stars refer to all zodiacal influences). A thoroughly rounded development is a regal crown. As we live in the light of spiritual truth we become ever more and more invulnerable, no matter what hydra-headed monster makes war upon us; our heels, being cased in armor, blunt the serpent's fangs, and the spiritual armor with which we are clothed, not only protects us, but radiates an atmosphere which purifies the air for every one else to breathe; it generates a counter-influence of good that destroys evil, as light dispels darkness. When this is understood, we shall learn how useless it is to expect to succeed in spiritual work merely through intellectual accomplishments. Verily, the spoken or written word of truth carries conviction by the sheer force of sound argument to many minds, but much more than argument is needed in breaking down the stronghold of error and letting in the light of truth.

LECTURE XII.

THE MYSTERY OF THE AGES. — THE SECRET DOCTRINE CONTAINED IN ALL RELIGIONS.

Is the world ready to receive esoteric truth? is a constantly recurring question. All must admit that every one is not prepared for theosophical teaching in its most intricate form, though every one is ready for something. Jesus condensed in his parables all the wisdom of the ancients; they were both sublime and simple. The mental veil is soon rent in those who give themselves wholly to truth, but it conceals the inner meaning of truth from the world at large. The spiritual mysteries of all religions are now being revealed, although the materiality of the present day tends to dwarf the minds of all who do not enter fully into the consciousness of spiritual being. When man really knows himself, he knows God. He who cannot find divinity in himself has only developed his fourth principle (animal soul), life being to him only a round of eating, drinking, and similar indulgences. We see many people who are animated bodies, but little more; they have occasionally better moments, but their souls have not yet shone through their organisms to any extent. Then there are others who have no consciousness of spiritual existence, yet are often actuated by a pure benevolence that puts to shame professional sanctity. Many feel a spiritual impulse they are unable to express through their lower nature. Many people are not yet prepared for profound occult study or theosophical investigation, which really comprises religion, philosophy, and science.

Theosophy in its profounder aspect is not intended for children, but for men and women in understanding, who are the only people qualified to deal with the great problems which it presents to the world, — problems which call for the most earnest and persistent study. We should not give that which is holy to dogs; we should never force advanced ideas upon unprepared minds, but be ever ready to impart instruction to those who seek it. Whatever we learn truly we never unlearn; all teaching is progressive. We must impart esoteric truth to the public by degrees, but always teach children in accordance with foundation principles. Teaching must be pure in order to be good. Give milk and water where people are not ready for stronger food, but never prevaricate when you withhold, nor adulterate when you omit. The needs of human nature are very varied; each mind requires a phase of truth adapted to its particular understanding. A Theosophist should in the righteous sense be "all things to all men" to save all. Conduct the student, as in music, through scales and exercises to the works of the great masters. If we apply divine wisdom, as it was applied on the day of Pentecost, when the disciples spake in divers tongues, we shall divide the Word of Truth so as to minister to the edification of all who hear it. If we exercise in this age the genuine gift of tongues, we shall preach only one gospel as we teach only one arithmetic and one chemistry, but we impart different degrees of instruction in these sciences as pupils are prepared to receive them: the one law and the one gospel can be adapted to all. Many complain of the unintelligibility of a great amount of theosophical literature, — the language is so mystical, the thought so involved, the ideas and forms of expression are both so unusual that the average reader cannot understand it, they say; but if all things difficult at first were laid aside, pupils might never learn anything new.

The study of Theosophy is like the study of a new science of which the multitude know nothing; an art with which the crowd is unfamiliar. We confront new expressions of old thoughts when learning a new language. Theosophical ideas, even though exceedingly ancient, are new to the world of to-day. The nomenclature often seems new and startling, but is soon interpreted. Kama loca is only a Sanskrit equivalent for purgatory; Devachan signifies the spirit world, or paradise; Nirvana means heaven; Buddha is no more mystical a name than Christ. There is nothing true or useful in Buddhism that there is not also in Christianity. The value of Theosophy is that it demonstrates the absolute unity of all divine philosophy. The general tendency of modern secular thought is toward the rise of the individual, that of Theosophy toward the welfare of the race, through forgetfulness of self; it admonishes us to kill out all sense of separateness, which means divided or opposing interests. We must feel that we are all living one true life, and that is the life of the race, the only life with which we should be concerned. Self-forgetfulness is not antithetical to self-preservation; but human laws must give place to Divine Law; all good earthly laws are included in the one universal Law of Spirit, and that is stated in the formula usually styled the Golden Rule and in the method of the Pater Noster.

There is a rapidly growing desire on the part of all mankind for higher spiritual revelation. Surely none can be so blind as not to see the great and ever-increasing interest which now prevails in all that relates to occultism, which means secret philosophy or science. Theosophy means divine wisdom, but do we not have to search for divine wisdom as for hidden treasure? Without spiritual wisdom we cannot possibly understand life present, past, or future. Theosophy alone unlocks the mysteries of Being. It does not deal with the individual as separate from mankind, but only with man collectively, since the Eternal Being is Father and Mother of us all. All demonstrations of truth to an individual must depend on the mental caliber of that individual and the effort he makes to solve life's problem. Sciences are but various manifestations of one true SCIENCE; there are various departments of knowledge, but knowledge itself is a unit. All religious systems are endeavors on the part of humanity to express its highest ideas, though often but feebly in sign and symbol. Theosophy exerts a uniting, never a separating, influence on those who study it; its adherents become friends when previously strangers. Theosophy does not seek to overturn any creed, but, on the contrary, without deifying any form of religion, symbol, or book, it interprets all symbols, creeds, and books esoterically instead of exoterically, as it recognizes that while the letter killeth, the spirit giveth life. Every true Theosophist is a universal religionist.

Our faculties, whatever they may be, are capable of stimulation in every direction. We must know that we have a special endowment to begin with, but that we are born gifted does not imply that we should not diligently cultivate our gift. It is possible to put our talents out at interest so as to make one talent two, then two will increase to four, and ten will become twenty as easily as one became two. Unto those who have, more shall be given continually. Spiritual growth is valuable here and now as well as in the state beyond the grave. It is not necessary that we all should isolate ourselves from our kindred to develop our spiritual gifts, but we must realize ourselves as living now a spiritual life in the spiritual universe; we must speak and think now as we would wish to in the supernal state. Theosophy claims that we can cultivate and exercise now and here all the powers of the spirit. Spiritual development is within the reach of all, as spiritual endowments are already in our possession. We can all enjoy spiritual illumination and vigor of intellect if we live harmoniously with divine law. Practice alone makes perfect; we can all develop spiritual muscle and cultivate the latent spiritual power within us. Man can use his sixth sense, and so accustom himself to employ it as to find it a reliable guide at all times. We are not so diverse as we suppose; we often think mistakenly that if we were constituted like some other people we could shine brighter than they shine; but Theosophy teaches that genius is after all applied energy, a determination to take possession of our own. We all possess the power within us that characterized the most renowned people who ever walked the globe. We need not ask, "Have I this or that gift?" for when a gift is appealed to, it responds, and can be used as a means of further development or higher culture. All persons really possess the gifts they wish for; what you do not possess you could not care for. Love of anything is due to a power within struggling for expression, which says: "I have chosen you" (not, "you have chosen me"); "I am in you already and want to be used." Our spiritual powers are continually asking to be exercised. This is the real condition in the spirit of every man. As we increase in knowledge of the law of Karma, or sequence, we shall be able to explain quite satisfactorily in every instance why human demands and affections are outwardly as diverse as they are. These explanations we must give a little later in our work, after we have led up to them by taking a hurried glance at Theosophy in general.

In the chapters devoted to Hindu and Persian Theosophy (vide Lectures IX. and X.) we have sought to familiarize the reader with the general scheme of Oriental thought and doctrine; we are now about to enter upon the doctrinal and practical, rather than to continue the historical portion of our work. As book reviews are, we know, expected, and greatly appreciated by many readers who have little time for reading but are desirous of acquainting themselves with as many good books as possible in a short time, we shall now introduce —

"The Mystery of the Ages contained in the Secret Doctrine of All Religions." Under this heading Lady Caithness, Duchesse de Pomar, one of the brightest minds in Europe engaged in theosophical propaganda, has issued from the press of C. L. H. Wallace, Oxford Mansion, London, W. (price 10*s.* 6*d.*),[1] one of the finest and most comprehensive works we have been privileged to peruse. It is a complete digest of universal Theosophy, treating all schools of thought and branches of this vast subject with remarkable fairness and ability, in a manner to attract all and repel no honest enquirer. In a copious preface, excellently worded, the talented authoress and compiler, who has drawn from almost every conceivable source important material for her work, calls attention, with great power and ability, to the identity of all religions at their root. There may be many branches and countless leaves, but only one root, as all intelligences are nourished from one eternal fountain of life, all warmed by the same great central fire of being. All prayers are cries of God's children seeking their Parent, — cries which are never disregarded, even though it often seems amid the mass of worldliness and error in which so many are seemingly engulfed that the originally pure aspirational element, which is the vital germ of religion, had been crushed to death. Overlaid with error it may be, as frescoes in ancient churches have been covered for centuries with whitewash, which, though it has hidden, has preserved them; for at a time of restoration they reappear, fresh as on the day when some great artist, long since departed, placed them there.

Truth alone is immortal; its absolute imperishability was never more clearly demonstrated than now, when from every quarter new forms of truth are springing up, but all animated with the old vitalizing breath of spiritual revelation. None of our readers who have carefully followed us in our hasty scamper over ancient fields of thought and modern inspiration, will be unready to welcome all that Lady Caithness has to say to them. Her work, though very popular, and enjoying a very wide circulation, is scarcely for beginners in the study, unless they are persons whose previous training has led them up to desire arcane knowledge, such as she serves to them in a manner which at once bespeaks the profundity of the savant and the grace of the accomplished society leader. Among the many who are giving time and energy to a dissemination of spiritual truth, no one perhaps is working more efficiently than this truly noble woman, who, while wearing her ducal coronet with all the imperial grace of a noble dame of the ancien régime, mingling freely in high society where she is an acknowledged leader, uses her influence to carry into the gilded halls of wealth and splendor a truth which is surely destined to bring all stations of life into sweet and gracious union, whereas now, unhappily, ill-feeling often prevails among those which conventionalism divides into upper and lower classes. Jesus taught all with whom he came in contact to be faithful in the sphere of action where their special mission lay; and do we not, when we see clearly, behold more real excellence and usefulness among those who adorn the state to which they are born, than among such as go out of their way to carve out for themselves a channel of supposed greater usefulness, where often they are unable to do anything at all?

Some people, envious no doubt of the wealth of others, would object to any man or woman who teaches Theosophy, or anything of the kind, living other than as a peasant; but so we have not learned the Christ (Truth). In all spheres of life great good may be accomplished by those who are in those spheres exerting themselves, as far as in them lies, to do the good which lies nearest to their hand. Jesus said to a very wealthy young man who sought perfection, "Go, sell all thou hast and give to the poor, and come follow me, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven." He said also to another who would be his disciple, but wished to linger to conduct a funeral, "Let the dead bury their dead, but follow thou me." In another place, however, he checked the ardor of an impetuous missionary who would leave his home and kindred to itinerate through Galilee: "Go home." Carping critics might find in these opposite passages marks of discordance in the Gospel teachings; but carping people are always short-sighted and shallow, and quite incapable of looking at any subject from more than one (and that their own) point of view. The broad-minded student of sacred history will soon learn that all truly great teachers were extremely versatile in their thought and doctrine. Though they never contradicted themselves, they were deep-seeing enough to recommend each one who applied to them for advice to do the particular work he could best accomplish in his own place and in his own way; and as the missions of different people differ widely, advice suitable to one would be quite misleading for another. One criterion, however, we have at all times, and that is, be sincere, be strictly honest with yourself, never toy with conviction; and to this we add, never judge or condemn another who does not act as you would, or rather, as you think you would were you in his place.

Nothing illustrates the old adage, "It takes all sorts of people to make a world," more than Theosophy. All sorts and conditions of men, women, and children are necessary to the completeness of the human family and the performance of life's multiple duties. This fact Lady Caithness elaborately illustrates in her charming theosophical mosaic, for which she has culled from all the spiritual and mystical flower-gardens of the world their choicest blossoms. At one time we are introduced to a poor, half-naked fakir, seeking to attain supreme blessedness through a life of complete renunciation of all external joys. Almost on the same page we read of the spiritual attainments of some who have adorned the highest stations in Church and State. The true catholicity and marked absence of prejudice in the work of Lady Caithness constitute its great charm. In one sense it is not a consecutive narrative, as it presents a series of dissolving views, so to speak, of great characters, memorable events, and noble systems. The information it gives is very exact, and supported by innumerable references to writers of high standing, and in this respect it renders a very valuable service to the student by whetting his appetite for more knowledge, and then informing him just where he can find it. In her copious and beautifully written preface, the gifted authoress launches upon her subject at once, and throws down the gauntlet, without delay, for materialism and dogmatic theology to pick up, if they will. She makes few, if any, unsupported statements, and ventures but very few personal opinions. She says in effect, Here are facts; deal with them as you can. Conservatism and radicalism are united throughout the volume; and is it not the province of Theosophy to conserve truth and destroy error? — a task which can never be fulfilled by either the diffident servant of popular tradition, or the ruthless iconoclast who sees no good in any system in which he finds some error.

The book opens with an allusion to the famous story of Hiero of Syracuse, who proposed to Simonides the question, What is God? He replied after long and earnest study, "The longer I consider this question, the more obscure it seems to me." Cicero endorsed the statement of Simonides, and through all classic literature it appears that even the very greatest minds, who sought for knowledge of divine truth by means of intellect alone, were baffled in their search. All persons who have been reared in the Christian faith, and do not wish to surrender it, will find in "The Mystery of the Ages" a strong vindication of the esoteric claim, though the same book deals quite mercilessly with fabulous and injurious dogmas, which have arisen from time to time in days of general ignorance and oppression.

The book proper is divided into twelve very long chapters, each of which will prove well worthy of reading carefully at least a dozen times. Milk is the exception, strong meat the rule, though the most intricate and unusual topics are dealt with with surprising clearness, in vigorous classic English. The first chapter, which is "introductory," commences with the statement that a study of Theo-Sophia (Divine Wisdom) "alone enables man to feel that divine love which is the supreme good, and the manifestation of the Eternal in his own being." In the second chapter, which is on "The Theory and Practice of Theosophy," a long list of valuable books for reference is given, at the head of which stands "Hermes Trismegistus," translated by Professor Wilder. This work, and many others recommended, are for advanced studies, and should be read after "The Mystery of the Ages," to which it is a concise introduction. Extracts are also given from "The Perfect Way," by Anna Kingsford, which can be obtained for $2.00 from any bookseller, and will well repay re-perusal, though some of its statements are severely contested by many Spiritualists, who think it does not teach truly concerning the post-mortem existence of the soul. This chapter ends with the most true definition of universal religion — which Theosophy is, or it is nothing. "Our Temple is a Pantheon, admitting all Divine Ideas and excluding only the demoniac; but before a God-Idea is admitted it should be mathematically examined as to whether it is truly Divine." When this rule is strictly applied, all ideas of a Supreme Being will be rigidly excluded, save that glorious monotheistic conception, which is the very essence of the Theosophy of all climes and ages; an idea gaining an ever-extending hold upon advanced minds everywhere, that one Infinite Spirit lives in all universes and is the life of all. Thus, in a last analysis of all things, we arrive at spiritual (not material) pantheism, and, exclaiming, "All is Spirit," we agree that God (Infinite Good Intelligence) is all in all.

Chapter III. commences with a treatise on "The Secret of Mythology," and most ably argues down the gross materialism of many would-be savans, who can see nothing but literal astronomy clad in fanciful disguise in the sublime mysticism of the Hermetists of old, who taught spiritual science while teaching at the same time much of importance concerning the physical aspects of nature. The science of Correspondence, familiar to all students of Swedenborg, opens up a wide field for diligent research; and though some Swedenborgians cling too closely to the letter of Swedenborg's writings, the "New Jerusalem Church" is doing far more than any other body of Christians at the present time to "open up the interior sense of the Word." But what is God's Word? Is it a book or is it Man? Human nature is surely God's inspired volume, in a much deeper sense than the best literature can be; for, were not men inspired rather than parchment scrolls in the days of old? and does not the Bible itself inform us that in the brightest days of Israel's history there were living prophets, oracles, and voices? and that only in a degenerate age, when the celestial voice was not so plainly heard, did men feel obliged to turn to the written law and testament? And what, we may ask, is a testament but a legacy, — a something bequeathed, left behind by one who can no longer come in and out among us? Scriptures are, no doubt, all susceptible of an interior interpretation, as, instead of being written by ignorant men, they were the work of the exceptionally enlightened; and though in their present translated forms they contain many blunders, and were not at the start in the original necessarily infallible, no unprejudiced scholar can doubt for an instant that they were wise works of wise men, written in a double manner, intended to preserve literal history in a substantially correct outward guise, and to preserve for all coming generations the spiritual wisdom in possession of the writers. The letter is often sacrificed considerably for the sake of the spirit; but the spirit is never sacrificed to accommodate the letter. Thus, literally, bibles are no sure guides in matters of history, though they are repositories of the deepest truth the world has become acquainted with. These remarks apply equally to many bibles, and it would be well for Swedenborgians to remember their leader's words concerning the word of the Lord hidden in Great Tartary, if they ever feel disposed to unduly exalt one canon and repudiate all others.

Chapter IV. continues a discussion of Hermetic Theosophy in a very able comparison of Egyptian and Christian Gnosticism. From this exceedingly valuable and scholarly chapter we make the following brief extract, regretting our limited space peremptorily forbids more: —

Christianity, the outcome of a Neo-Hermetic Gnosticism and opposed to the sensualistic cult that for ages disfigured the ancient religious systems, had in the first centuries of its establishment a hard struggle for existence. "Gnosis," individual experience, knowledge of God, was the Center, the great Arcanum, and the Mystic Christ. The sanctuary of Christianity is Theosophy. Christianity would have perished as the ephemeral teachings of the so-called false Messiahs of the Jews, had it not been that it was established by those ignorantly deplored and abused Gnostic Heresies. Gnosis, the sanctuary of Christianity, being attained to by some earnest, striving souls, life and reality was given to the new system by their enthusiasm.

Chapter V. introduces us to the Theosophy of the Brahmans, Magi, and Druids. Chapter VI. treats on Buddhist Theosophy. Both these chapters are exceedingly interesting and very important; but we have touched sufficiently, perhaps, on these topics in the lectures or essays devoted specially to their elucidation, so we will not say more about them here, but pass on to Chapter VII., entitled "Pagan Theosophy." In the treatment of this thoroughly classic theme, Lady Caithness introduces powerful arguments to show how its exclusiveness was demolished by two Jews (Jesus and Paul), who by preaching the Gospel to the multitude broke up the aristocratic hierarchies which flourished in the Roman Empire in their day. Concerning the Eleusinian and Bacchic Mysteries we have spoken in another place, but will here introduce a fine passage concerning the philosophers: "Nearly all ancient philosophers were not only Initiates, but also Esoterists, teaching Theosophy under the veil of allegory. They were all spiritual teachers, and their Philosophy was Theosophy. Material terms were only used as symbols for spiritual things." If this fact were only realized in modern universities, where Greek verse is parsed and translated without the student being led to imagine there is anything of merit in it beyond the rhythm, how living collegiate studies would become where now they are dead and lifeless as inanimate marble. Orpheus, Hesiod, Xenophanes, Empedocles, and many other famous bards of ancient Greece have sung pure spiritual truth in lines now usually regarded as devoid of any valuable meaning. Let Theosophy awaken the thoughts of the multitude, and Ezekiel's vision of dry bones will be realized in our universities.

The eighth chapter, on "Semitic Theosophy," contributes a great deal of valuable information on the Kabbala. The Hebrew religion is very appreciatively dealt with, and truthful reasons for Levitical ceremonies assigned. It is doubtful whether the Jews, as a people, ever understood the spirit of their religion to any great extent; but the Sages undoubtedly understood something very different from the vulgar conception of the populace. The most fantastic ceremonies, when traced to their origin, are all found to be reasonable, and calculated to benefit the place and time, where and when they were instituted. Much information is given concerning the Nazarites, who were prophets, and as such unpopular with the priests, who were ever apt to despise prophesyings; prophets being living mouth-pieces of a continuous revelation, while priests are jealous custodians of the manna which fell the day before.

Chapter IX. treats of "The Sufis and Mohammedan Theosophy." In analyzing the character of the founder of the religion of Islam, the authoress is very ready to credit him with many solid excellencies, though she does not claim him to have been anything like a perfect character. The very word Islam means resignation, or entire submission to the will of God. In its theoretical part it is called Imân, Faith; in its practice, Sin, Religion (or Wisdom), which contains the ritual and moral laws, inculcating four chief duties, — prayer, almsgiving, fasting, and pilgrimage. The belief in angels forms a prominent dogma; they are created of fire, and stand between God and man, — adoring and serving the one, interceding for and guarding the other. Besides angels there are good and evil genii. The poor will enter Paradise five hundred years before the rich; there are about a hundred degrees of the various felicities which await the pious, and those who go to heaven find exceedingly sensual delights prepared for them. There are, however, higher degrees of recompense of a purely spiritual kind, for those who are of a higher and more spiritual nature, and who on earth have lived the inner life of the spirit rather than the outward life of the senses. Some curious historical facts are quoted to prove Mo-Ahmed "the 10th Avatar or Theosophic Messenger from the Logos, or Divine Wisdom." The grand Mosque at Constantinople significantly named "Santa Sophia," which is divided into four stages, is remarked upon as setting forth four stages through which the initiate passes during his probation, till he reaches the divine arcanum. Before concluding this section Persian Theosophy is interestingly alluded to.

Chapter X., on "Christian Theosophy," is very fine; and had we not written so much on that score ourselves we should be tempted to quote largely from Lady Caithness, who deals with it with a master-hand. We will just give a few extracts which convey the entire pith and marrow of the difference between Esoteric and Exo-teric Christianity, which is hourly becoming more apparent. "'The Son of God died for my sins,' is far more pleasing to an ordinary mind than the truth that he must die to his sins in order to become a true Son of God. Jesus, imparting the true Gnosis, or knowledge, to those who for generations had been deluded by sacrificial perversions of religion, was with necessary emphasis regarded by his disciples as the Divine Light becoming manifested to those who sat in darkness." "Theosophically, then, the Gospels are the histories of an inward and regenerating principle, called the only begotten Son of God, which is the Saviour of humanity; for it redeems man from the prison house of earth; and the development in him of this principle transforms the Son of Man into the Son of God. Call it the Spirit of Truth, or call it Love, or Life; or call it Wisdom, the Logos, or the sixth Principle in man, as do the Buddhists; or the Keystone of the Arch, as do the Royal Arch-Masons; or the Head-stone of the Corner, as do the Scriptures in certain places: it is always the highest state to which man can attain. It is, in fact, 'to put on Christ.'" Read in this connection Matt. xvi., which gives an account of Jesus saying to Peter that he will build his church on a rock, and we shall the better understand the esoteric foundation of the spiritual (not the outward) catholic church." To the Gospel-writers Christ was the invisible Holy One of Israel, seen through the veil of the Old Testament; not merely the Spirit of the Old Testament, but Life itself that was before Abraham, or, as Christ calls it, the Spirit of Truth that should guide us into all truth. This was the secret of those earlier Theosophists, the Essenes, and was regarded as a great mystery, called the 'Mystery of Christ,' because it is certainly not of a nature to be communicated by any external process, for it must be felt and lived before it can be spiritually understood." "Jesus of Nazareth was a soul in its last earthly embodiment whose life was a model; a pattern life, of matchless purity and devotion to duty. Had he been more than perfect man, he would have been too exalted to be an example to humanity. We utterly fail to see how or why, with any show of consistency, those who believe in the successive embodiments of the human spirit until it reaches perfection, can dispute the fact of an occasional case in point occurring as an illustration of the fact that the human spirit in its final embodiment on earth, manifests the perfect character, to ensure which, all preceding embodiments have been a necessity." "The Christ is indeed the central or spiritual Sun of human life; the source of its better inspiration, and the genius of its supreme evolution and final ascension."

Chapter XI., on "The Theosophic Interpretation of the Bible," commences, "all that is true is Spiritual; no chapter in the Bible bears (only) a physical meaning. For Matter as it now exists shall cease, and all that is of it, but the Word of the Lord shall endure forever. And how shall it endure except it be purely Spiritual; since, when Matter ceases, it would then be no longer comprehensible?" Then follow extracts from "The Perfect Way," which we hope many of our readers will procure and study, though it is not a book for beginners by any means, and we conceive much harm to be often ignorantly done by commencing with advanced treatises instead of elementary text-books. Our aim is to introduce excerpts from advanced works, rather to show the simplicity of the spirit than to exhibit the complexity of the literal form of Theosophy. "The Science of Correspondences Elucidated,"[1] by Edward Madeley, is a large and very helpful work for those who can glean knowledge when presented in a form acceptable to Swedenborgians. It certainly is a treasure-house of wisdom for many Sunday-school and Bible-class teachers who cannot feed their classes with literal husks and consider they have done their duty, and who would be the last people in the world to throw the Bible overboard and substitute simply ethical treatises by modern authors. Lady Caithness' words on this subject are numerous and deep; they are of a character to greatly interest scholars, and at the same time are sufficiently simple to be useful to every thoughtful and fairly instructed reader. Her quotations from the Fathers of the Church, Augustine, Origen, and others, are exceedingly apposite; but it is not necessary to study the patristic writings to gain a spiritual insight into the meaning of inspired documents. Every one may be his own priest and key, if he but faithfully seek illumination by aspiring ever toward the highest and abstaining in thought, as well as in word and deed, from all carnality.

The concluding chapter, the twelfth, commences as follows: "The knowledge or revelation of God comes to the world in cycles or waves"; and ends with the following quotation, "When, after an earthly pilgrimage of many centuries, the wandering Jew prototype of unbelieving man shall return at length to Jerusalem (state of peace), he will find himself in the midst of a great multitude assembled from every quarter of the world, and gathered around an altar on Mount Moriah (height where truth is manifested). He will look at the officiating priest, and his eyes will overflow with tears as he will exclaim: 'Tis He!' and fall down at His feet. He will regard the holy offering which the pontiff raises above the heads of the crowd, and with a deep-drawn sigh, he will again exclaim, 'Tis He!' and will worship Him the second time. He will look around on the multitude as far as his eyes can reach, and recognize Him in each one of his brother-men, and will cry with a sob, 'Tis He again! He is present in all! 'Tis He everywhere! 'Tis always He!' and he will sink down in the deepest adoration. At length he will look into the depths of his own being, and then his heart will melt with love and gratitude, for he will at last discover Him in his own heart. His selfhood will have become transmuted into that of the Christ, and the work of regeneration will be finished."

Thus ends, with an exquisite extract couched in the most fervent prose poetry, "The Mystery of the Ages," by the Duchesse de Pomar, a work almost without a peer in modern literature, written by a woman whose presence in the world is a perpetual benediction, and in whose own graceful and actively useful life, Theosophy finds one of its truest exponents.

Deeming the following extracts from an article entitled, "The Test of Theosophic Interest," published in The Path of January, 1889, of more than ordinary interest and instructiveness, we give them to our readers as a sequel to this chapter: —

The test of Theosophic interest is precisely the test of every other kind of interest, — What one will do to promote it. And here, obviously, two considerations arise.

The first is, that no act which is superficial, or perfunctory, or for personal benefit, can at all gauge devotion to a cause which is both impersonal and deep-reaching. It is easy to descant on the glory of a system so elevated as the Wisdom-Religion. It is as easy to proclaim one's own appreciation of its tenets. It is not difficult to attend punctiliously the meetings of a Theosophical Society, and to absorb with readiness, perhaps with profit, whatever of truth may be there disclosed. It may not be easy, but it is entirely possible, to read every theosophical work of repute, to extract its main thought, and to digest well the learning acquired. And yet, very evidently, the first two are exercises only of the voice, the last two only of the mind. If Theosophy was a matter of the breath or the brains, this participation in it would not only be salutary, but ample.

In truth, however, Theosophy gives but a light benediction to either the mere talker or the mere student. It by no means undervalues sincere homage or zealous inquiry, but it is so intent on the work of transferring interest from the lower to the higher levels of being, so eager to excite the unselfish enthusiasm for others' good, which, subordinating its own advancement, shall be most thrilled at the chance to advance Humanity, that its ideal is the man who is exerting himself to help others, rather than the man who is exerting himself to get ahead. . . .

Of the three objects contemplated in the establishment of the Theosophical Society, the first and greatest is the promotion of Universal Brotherhood. But this does not mean merely a sentimental recognition of a general human fraternity; it means an active beneficence toward the rest of the family. And if correct views, loftier ideals, richer motives, finer principles, healthier aspirations are more attainable through the theosophic system than through other systems of faith or morals, the Theosophist is best serving the interests of his brother-men by giving that system all the publicity he can. . . .

The second consideration referred to at the outset is that the test of theosophic interest is not the absolute amount of help given, but that amount as related to the capacity of the giver. Five cents, five hours, constitute a far larger proportion of one man's available means or time, than five thousand dollars or five months do of another's. Hence it is not the figures, but their fractional value, which determines the extent of the interest. Just so is it in every other human interest. How much one cares for a relation, for a friend, for a philanthropic cause, for a public object, is unerringly shown by the proportion of outlay he devotes thereto. And this does not mean a careless profusion with superfluous goods, but the cutting-off of personal indulgences, cherished but dispensable, for the better sustentation of a cause, — in other word, self-sacrifice. Nor does self-sacrifice mean the sacrifice of other people, as some think; the bearing with great fortitude privations one does not share, the consecration of money or time or effort which really belongs to one's family or entourage. It means the sacrifice of yourself, of your own habits and enjoyments and expenses, in order to build up a cause you profess to love. And the extent to which this is done gauges the proportion of your love for that cause to your love for yourself.

Now Theosophy is not unreasonable or captious. It does not advise any man to starve himself, or to wear rags, or to scout at the conditions of life in the civilization wherein he was born and which express the laws of sociology. It does not enjoin monasticism or seclusion, or parsimony, or want of public spirit, or abnegation of social amenities, or one-sidedness, or bigotry, or folly under any name. We are to be men, rational men, civilized men, cultivated men; and we promote no noble cause, least of all the noblest, if we are unsocial, unpractical, or fantastic. But while all this is true, it is equally true that in one's own private affairs, in that sphere of personal belongings outside the claims of others, and wherein absolute freedom is unquestioned, the test of theosophic interest is directly applicable. It is, as has been shown, the proportion of time, money, literary or other effort one is willing to give up. . . .

What is there for me to do? Everything that you can do. A word, a hint, a tract, a volume, a subscription. If it costs you nothing, your interest is nothing. If it costs you little, your interest is little. If it costs you till you feel it, then it is that you feel your interest. And when you yourself, body, soul, and spirit, are devoted to the doing, when you thrill with that topic as with no other topic, when your pleasure is in self-sacrificing efforts for its promotion, when you forget yourself, have lost yourself, in it, then will you have become in measure what are the Founders, — may one not even say, what are the Masters themselves.

These bold, noble sentences were signed, "HARRIS P.," who evidently is a very earnest worker for the Society, whose interest he holds so dear. We have only extracted from his able and eloquent plea such passages as refer to consecration of time, money, and all one has to give to one's highest ideal. As to joining or working for the Theosophical Society, every individual must decide for him or herself. Our counsel is, work wherever you feel your work lies, and because you feel it lies there. Care not where or how others work; ask not for their commendation, nor be depressed if their criticisms are unfavorable. Fidelity to the inner light, to the esoteric Christ, the illuminator of the world, will alone enable us to unravel the "mystery of the ages," and so solve life's problem as to enable us to know that "all is good."

LECTURE XIII.

PERSIAN, GREEK, AND ROMAN THEOSOPHY.

As the Persian religion has excited so much attention on account of the dualism which is considered its leading feature, and as Persian ideas have without doubt found their way largely into the Hebrew Scriptures, any treatise purporting to give an outline of universal Theosophy would be singularly incomplete were no reference made to the grand old faith of the Parsees, many of whom are to-day sojourners in Hindustan, where they form a distinct community, carrying on their worship in their own peculiar way, much as do the Jews in Christian communities, where they trade with Gentiles freely, but in all religious matters keep quite distinct from those about them.

Zoroaster, the name by which the alleged founder of Parseeism is generally known, stands for a divine incarnation, much as Buddha does among his followers, and as there have been several Buddhas, so there have been several illumined teachers, from whose actual lives the biography of the traditional Zoroaster has been compiled. Some historians place the date of Zoroaster at 6000 B.C.; others make him a contemporary of Abraham; others, coeval with Pythagoras. As these dates differ by thousands of years, as well as centuries, it seems incredible that the same personage is intended in all instances; it is far more reasonable to conclude that some illumined teacher has left a record behind him dating back to 6000 B.C., while another lived in the days of Abraham, and again another in the lifetime of Pythagoras.

The name Zoroaster, or Zurthost, really means a spiritual messenger, aglow with sacred fire, and one who brings light to the world, as fire emits light and heat to its surroundings; one, moreover, who consumes the stubble of error and purifies the gold of truth, by separating from it the alloy with which on earth it has been mingled. As Christ, Buddha, Krishna, and Zoroaster are all spiritual titles, they have never been used exclusively with regard to any single individual. The Zend-Avesta, or four chief sacred books of the Parsees, are in some respects not at all unlike the Hindu Vedas and the Hermetic writings of Egypt, which so closely resemble each other as to be almost indistinguishable. The main feature of Parseeism is its doctrine of eternal fire, which is the one absolute divine element, from which all creation issues, and to which it all returns.

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews must have been greatly a Parsee in spirit when he said, "Our God is a consuming fire"; but so were almost all the Old Testament writers, for scarcely ever do we hear of a divine revelation unaccompanied by fire. The pure Fire-Spirit of the Parsees and the Hebrew Jehovah, who is the God that answers by fire, according to the Book of Kings, are almost identical in conception. Swedenborg also compares divine life to fire, and says that heat corresponds to love, and light to wisdom; therefore, as God is perfect love and wisdom, fire is the only element to which He can be likened; and this is a thoroughly reasonable and acceptable view, as fire is the only all-purifying and incorruptible element: earth, air, and water are subject to contamination, and often conducive of disease; fire is all-purifying, and can never suffer pollution.

To show the universality of the Divine Spirit and God's immanence in the universe, the Parsee priest, when preparing the sacred fire, would kindle a flame in several places, and then, to show forth the truth that the divine life is the innermost life of all that lives, would take only the pure essence of the flame, refined through many symbolic processes. In Olcott's "Address to the Parsees" we have a fascinating account of how the fire is brought from heaven, the "missing spirit evoked by the adept Prometheus." In recent novels we have come across many allusions to these ancient and suggestive practices, and stories containing such references are always eagerly read, showing that a popular interest is at last awakened in the great religions of the world. Such an awakenment of popular sentiment cannot but help forward the glorious cause of universal brotherhood, — as we only need to know each other better, to love each other more.

As we pursue our studies in ancient religions we are struck ever more and more with the wonderful unity in the spirit and essential teaching of all; and more and more convinced that the recent materialistic reaction, momentarily assisted by a cursory glance at a few scientific discoveries, will soon have passed entirely from the minds of reasoning men. On no subject has more ignorance been displayed than with reference to the true meaning of the "six days of creation." Zoroaster's teaching on this subject may be interesting to those who are studying comparative cosmogony. It is said that at his initiation he acquired the following idea of the formation of the globe, which was slowly evolved during six gigantic periods of time, of indefinite duration, and which are termed Gâhambârs, meaning ages or cycles of great length. In the first, the heavenly canopy was formed; in the second, water was brought into existence; in the third, the earth became solid; in the fourth, vegetation sprang forth; in the fifth, animal life was slowly evolved; and in the sixth, the animals culminated in man. The seventh period is the day of the advent of the Messiah, when the sun of our solar system will be extinguished, and Pralaya, a period of rest from all striving, will begin.

There can be no doubt that the Persians as well as the Hindus were deeply versed in the sciences of involution and evolution, and it is an ignorance impossible to the learned to berate ancient scriptures, and attribute them to unenlightened romancers. They all contain an inner meaning, and are in a sense masonic documents. This is particularly true of books like Daniel and the Apocalypse, which are almost wholly correspondential; but even those in which the historical element far more largely preponderates, are by no means simple records of local mundane events. The Supreme Being is considered by the Parsees to be revealed to man only in the purest essence of fire; the sacred fire is never allowed to go out in the temples, where it burns as a perpetual reminder of the immortality of the soul as well as of the ever-living Deity. In time, the Persian religion presents us with two divinities, or rather with a divine being (Ormuzd) and a diabolical spirit (Ahriman); but these are brothers, and though they contend for a while, they are at length reconciled. Thus the distinct teaching is that evil, having a beginning, must have an end; Good, being beginningless, is also endless. As the zodiacal element enters into all systems, it would not be difficult to connect the six good spirits who proceed from Ormuzd with the six summer signs, and the six evil spirits which issue from Ahriman as the six winter signs, and then in the restitution of all things, so firmly believed in by every devout Parsee, trace the growth of man's conception, from belief in evil to acknowledgment of good only. Beginning with March 25th (Lady Day) and ending with September 29th (Michaelmas), the good powers were always recognized as in the ascendant; while beginning with Michaelmas and ending with Lady Day, the evil powers were considered regnant. But no ultimate triumph was ever conceded to aught but good; hence one of the grandest festivals of the year was invariably celebrated in the middle of winter. Though in time the Parsees believed in a perpetual conflict between good personified in Ormuzd and evil in Ahriman, in eternity good alone was to triumph. Thus the Parsees were very early Universalists, and taught exactly what Hosea Ballou and other American preachers of modern times pro-

Persons who read one bible, and one only, can hardly understand the one they read: thus, the ignorant and bigoted classes are composed, on the one hand, of those who worship one bible, and on the other, of those who hate one bible. The enlightened student of comparative theology, who has read and studied several bibles, neither accepts blindly nor blindly condemns; he reasons and compares, with a view to finding the underlying truth in all systems of religion, knowing from experience that all truth cannot be found in one. Rev. Leighton Parks, rector of Emanuel Church, Boston, in a very charming volume, entitled "His Star in the East: A Study of the Early Aryan Religions," has many very interesting facts to relate concerning the Parsees, as well as other Oriental bodies, among which nothing is more important than the part played by Parseeism in moulding Hebrew and, more latterly, Christian thought and literature. Previous to the time of the Babylonish captivity, the Jews seem to have known nothing of an accuser, or Satan; but in the days of Ezra, when the Scriptures were re-written, this distinctly Persian personage appears prominently on the scene. The serpent of Genesis ii. may have come from Egypt, also the two classes of serpents mentioned in the story of the journeyings through the wilderness, as two diametrically opposed aspects of the serpent were familiar to the Egyptians of old. The elevated serpent signified wisdom, and was a very imposing emblem of eternal knowledge and immortal life, while the serpent in its lower attitude was the symbol of carnality, and to be trampled under foot by the higher human nature. The Egyptian devil, Typhon, is regarded by some as the prototype of the Satan of the Book of Job; but this latter character corresponds so exactly with the Persian Ahriman that there can be little doubt of their proximate identity, i.e. the Hebrew Satan is the Persian Ahriman with a little different local coloring.

Now, when the Parsees taught that Ormuzd created six gods, and that Ahriman also created six gods, and therefore in time the universe was subject to the equal sway of good and evil, they intended only to illustrate that, despite the prevalence of darkness equally with light on earth, light alone reigned in eternity. Thus the rival deities are found to be one in their source and one in their destiny. As light is the most befitting emblem of knowledge, so darkness corresponds to ignorance; but there can be no two opposite substances or realities in the universe. God is light, and the only reality; Satan is darkness, and therefore but the shadow of God. When once this sublime truth is realized, there will be no further misunderstanding or lack of solution of the problem of life. Evil is no good, as darkness is no light and ignorance no knowledge. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," occurs to our mind at this time as a most philosophical, as well as charitable, construction to put upon human error and misdeeds. But if there be no crime in ignorance, it is surely a most undesirable and decidedly unsatisfactory condition; therefore let us seek enlightenment, and do all in our power to illumine the path of those who yet wander on in darkness. If "sin is mistake," let us use every agency we can employ to rectify that error.

Education, though sometimes severe as a discipline, is never spiteful or retaliative in its methods. When one is cold, you bring him to the fire, or let the sun shine on him, and warmth, the universal invigorator, is the only stimulant needed in cases of drowning, etc.: whatever is given to stimulate is intended to warm; a warm body is a living organism; a cold one is a corpse. Thus is tribute hourly paid in the Far West in these later days to the grand conception of the ancients that fire is life, and life is fire; for where the fire goes out animation is extinct, and to reanimate the frame, the flame must be rekindled. As it is cold when the sun does not shine on us (i.e. when something intervenes between us and its beams), so our ignorance is the shadow to remove, and when this is removed, we know one only God, and all false notions of duality are exploded.

The true dualism of reason and intuition in man is the dualism of heat and light, which ever proceed from the one parent source — fire. Fire is both hot and bright: coal may be hot within when not bright without; but there can be no flame without heat, though there can be heat without visible flame. When we remember that heat corresponds to love, and light to wisdom, and that both are expressions of the one divine element, fire, we shall understand the spirit not only of Zoroastrianism, but of Swedenborg, for the great Scandinavian sage taught thousands of years later what the gifted Persians taught long before the Christian era, concerning the divine nature and its twofold manifestation in the visible universe. Purity was and is the watchword of Parseeism. The little colony of Parsees now resident in Bombay (but few are to be found in Persia) are scrupulously exact in their injunctions concerning purity, and though unfortunately not as a rule deeply versed in the spirit of their noble ancient faith, they are noted, wherever known, for extreme cleanliness of mind and person. They consider outward as well as inward purity the one grand essential of religion. As they consider all the elements sacred, they will not bury or burn the bodies of their dead, but expose them to birds of prey after they have deposited them in high "towers of silence." While at first mention this practice may repel many who think lovingly of cemeteries, and may not quite accord with the wishes of those who favor crematories, still there is nothing whatever repulsive in the thought when one becomes accustomed to it, and a Parsee funeral is so conducted that the most reverential and fastidious can be offended at nothing in the ceremony.

Differing in some respects widely from the Parsees, the Greeks first and then the Romans, in their elaborate system of polytheism, which, however, always ran parallel with pantheism, sought to behold in every object the divine life manifest. No Oriental religion was ever quite without its polytheistic and pantheistic elements; but the two united in the highest Greek philosophy and art, and it was at Athens, rather than anywhere else, that the highest conception of the divine manifestation was grasped in a perfect presentation of beauty. Beauty, perfection of form, a complete ultimation of the divine loveliness, — this was the Greek ideal, and those who can see to any depth below the letter of the classics, know that classic lore is a rich, deep mine of the purest golden ore. Beauty is divine; divinity must ever be beautiful: we turn with a sigh of discontent amounting to repugnance from all exhibitions of extreme asceticism to the matchless BEAUTY of Greek Theosophy. There we find the one infinite life displayed before our enamoured vision in a million different forms of grace and beauty. Polytheism is the multiple manifestation of pantheism, which is the acknowledgment of the one indivisible immanent life. If Greece, and then Rome, through abominable sensualism, defaulted the exquisite models of the original Theosophy, primitive Christianity spiritualized them once more, and they live in true Christianity to-day, though most unfortunately popular Christianity has denied the spirit of the classics, as it has thrown a veil over its own spiritual scriptures, too often, alas, perverted to most unworthy ends.

Pythagoras, who flourished in Greece about the time of Gautama in India and Confucius in China, was one of the greatest teachers whose imprint has been traced on the pages of history. His philosophy was pure Monism, and yet in his elaborate system of numerals he allowed for an infinity of expressions of the one life. He was thus both pantheist (believer in the divine immanence) and polytheist (one who recognized the measureless variety of the divine manifestations). He it was who taught his scholars that all numbers might be lost, but the number one must remain eternally, for one is at once the greatest and the least, the All and the Atom. Socrates, who lived a century later, was the great Athenian publicist, the one who gathered a vast concourse of people in the open thoroughfares, and educated all who came to him outside the academic halls. He taught nothing but what all the learned agreed to. His offense consisted in speaking unvarnished truth to the common throng. Monopolists hated him, and had him put to death; but the spirit of his teachings remained in his favorite pupil and brilliant successor, Plato, who was more politic than his master, and thus escaped martyrdom. Socrates was the speaker, Plato, the scribe of Athens, at a time when error was coating over the beautiful Greek Theosophy which the Apostle Paul proclaimed in his magnificent oration to the Athenians on Mars-Hill.

As we shall attempt to show in succeeding essays, primitive Christianity was a further development of much that had preceded it from Greece and Rome. Christianity received multitudes of converts, and to accommodate their peculiar needs, Paul at least thought it desirable to be "all things to all men," an expression which the malicious can easily twist into a confession of insincerity. The right-minded man or woman sees it, however, in a totally different light, and can easily perceive that the chief fault of later missions has been that missionaries have treated all religions as hopelessly false, with the exception of their own, which they have proclaimed entirely true. Such an attitude is as ignorant as it is unkind, and brings upon its advocates the hatred and scorn of those they might otherwise enlighten and bless. We are very sorry to see so many intelligent men turning away from religion because of the utterly stupid manner in which the subject has been broached to them.

Workingmen in the first century were the mainstay of the spiritual and socialistic movement, which after a while took the name of Christianity, and soon after the adoption of that term seemingly began to degenerate. Early Christianity was a progressive eclecticism, and its endeavor was to unite the world. Rome and Greece were its cradles, and from Egypt and Persia it gathered the accumulated wisdom of many centuries. Greek Theosophy lives in the fourth Gospel, where the Logos, or divine word — the expressed divinity — is spoken of as perfectly embodied in an ideal human form, but by no means confined to any personality, as it is the universal light and world-wide enlightener. Theosophy alone can explain the Scriptures, revive pure religion, and unite the world: thus in India it invites the natives to return to the essentials of Hinduism; in Persia it urges the people to return to the old-time wisdom-religion of their forefathers; and in Christendom it invites the masses to the spirit of the Gospel, and prepares an additional banquet for collegians, by unfolding to them the spirit of the classics. Study mythologic lore with new eyes: let Plato speak to you afresh, as you no longer regard him as a pagan; and the classics as well as the Bible, and the poets as well as the prophets, will all teach you the one great truth, that we are all brothers, and remove from your minds forever the hateful thought of a capricious deity and a restricted revelation. Listen to the philosophers and poets of Greece and Rome as to the sages of the Orient, with ears no longer dull of hearing, and you will see for yourselves that there is but one religion, spoken in many tongues.

Dr. F. L. H. Willis, a gifted and learned scribe, says, in an article which recently appeared in the Banner of Light: —

It was in the sacred seclusion of her own room that the consecrated Greek or Roman maiden sought in faith and prayer to reveal the will of heaven. Although she called her Heavenly Father by the name of Jove or Jupiter, yet with an ardent heart she clung to the sacred life that united her to the spiritual realm, and with trusting faith called down the gifts of heaven to her mortal consciousness.

All the ancient Latin and Greek poets present to us the beauty and power of this faith in divine things. History is full of facts that testify of the truthfulness of this sacred gift of the past, and although the veil of ignorance shrouds much of the beauty, yet there gleams forth a supernal light to show us how near to earth was heaven, even in the days of idolatrous Greece and Rome.

Cassandra, who, like many mediums of to-day, had to bear the imputation of insanity, was one of the great prophets of the Trojan nation. She was princess of Troy, but was subject to the divine impressions. It was said that her ears were unstopped so that she could hear spiritual voices, and her prophecies were literally fulfilled. The destruction of Troy and her own death she repeatedly foretold. Her prophecies proved not to be warnings. They were unheeded by her nation, and it had to learn wisdom through sad experiences.

The Roman Emperor Julian declared that he had familiar communications with divine beings. He says they awoke him from sleep by touching his hand or hair, and that he knew them so well that he could instantly distinguish their voices and their forms.

Pausanias, the Roman historian, says that in the temple of Æsculapius at Epidaurus, a pillar was erected in memory of Hyppolitus, who had been raised from the dead, and Strabo says the temples were full of the records of such miracles as healing the sick, raising the dead, making the blind to see, the deaf to hear, the lame to walk, etc.

Enlightened minds of Greece and Rome did not worship the many gods, but only one Supreme Spirit, considering the minor deities as only impersonations of the attributes of the one great Deity. With this view we can readily see how the beauty of the universe could call forth reverence, and the strength and wisdom thereof excite adoration. Thus also we learn how definite and clear to these old Greeks and Romans must have been these ideas of spiritual visions and realities, for notwithstanding they often said the gods gave the visions, they must have considered all spiritual appearances as coming through individual intelligence in the spirit-world.

Socrates, one of the greatest philosophers of any age, had implicit faith in spiritual presence and power. His demon or genius was his constant adviser. He listened to its voice reverently, and its promptings were his inspiration. He believed that every one had a heavenly guardian, who constantly attended him until death, when it returned to a higher and diviner life. It is related of him in Grote's History of Greece that when he was accompanying the army of Xenophon he became entranced, and so great was his absorption that he took no notice of anything transpiring around him. It was under the scorching sun, and he was standing; but he remained motionless while the whole army passed by, and all efforts to arouse him were in vain. After he came out of this condition he said he had been talking with a spirit.

Xenophon in his "Apology" says: "I call this voice of Socrates the divine, or spiritual influence." Socrates himself says of it: "One day when I was about to cross the river, I saw the usual spiritual sign which prohibits me from doing anything. I seemed to hear a voice also."

Our modern wise men have been greatly puzzled by the avowal of this faith, in so great and wise a man as Socrates. Some have said it was the voice of conscience, others that it was imagination; but his own testimony and that of Xenophon is, It was a spirit.

Plato had a similar faith, though perhaps more clearly defined than that of Socrates. He says of spirits: —

"Their office is to go between gods and men; to convey and interpret to the gods the prayers and offerings of men, and bring to men the commands of the gods. Deity can have no immediate intercourse with men. All communication between gods and mortals is carried on by means of spirits, both in sleeping and waking."

In another place he says: —

"They are clothed with air, wander through heaven, hover over the stars and abide on the earth. They behold unveiled the secrets of time to come, and regulate events according to their pleasure."

He too believed that every human spirit received at birth a guardian spirit, who accompanied him to the end, and witnessed all his thoughts and actions.

In Plato's "Ion" there is a remarkable dialogue which we have space to but briefly mention. Ion asks Socrates why it is that when he is reciting the poems of Homer, he should do it with a power that deserted him with respect to all other poets. Socrates, in reply, proceeds to unfold the most wonderful and beautiful theory of divine inspiration, and closes with these words: —

"You, O Ion, are influenced by Homer. If you recite the works of any other poet, you get drowsy, and are at a loss what to say; but when you hear any of the compositions of that poet you are roused; your thoughts are excited, and you grow eloquent; for what you say of Homer is not derived from any art or knowledge, but from divine inspiration and possession. As the Corybantes feel acutely the melodies of him by whom they are inspired, and abound with verse and gesture for his songs alone, and care for no other, thus you, O Ion, are eloquent when you expound Homer, and are barren of words with regard to every other poet. And this explains the question you asked wherefore Homer and no other poet inspires you with eloquence? It is because you are thus excellent in your recitations not through science, but from divine inspiration."

Pythagoras professed to communicate directly with spiritual beings through visions. Aristotle furnishes us with an elaborate and remarkably strong theory of dreams as inspired by spiritual beings.

Apollonius of Tyana, a follower of Pythagoras, cured diseases and predicted future events. "Do you imagine," says he, "that spirits are anything else but souls? It is not strange that souls should come to souls, and impart knowledge either by a touch or a glance."

In this manner we might go through the whole list of Grecian and Roman poets, philosophers, and wise men, giving their faith and their declarations, but we have brought from these two nations sufficient evidence for our purpose. They all harmonize, and all are clear and definite on this faith in spirit-communion. It was at the foundation of all their religious belief, and it was the inspiration of their religious fervor. All the poetry and the imagination of Greece in the days of her intellectual grandeur rested on this basis of belief in Spiritualism, and from out the half-clouded radiance we find fact and theory, and the divine power of God in man.

As we thus lift the curtain of the past, and bring back its history, the record of its thought and feeling, how full of beauty is the diviner part of man's nature. In spite of all its weakness and folly, its ignorance and sin, it has blossomed forth into individualized characters of great beauty and perfection, and in revelations of wonderful truth and spirituality. Should we not become more humble and less arrogant as we learn thus of the revelations of divine truth given to all men in all ages? Should we not become more thankful as we learn of the certainty of inspiration in all times, more studious as we learn of the laws that govern the spiritual condition, and more hopeful as we learn of the power of beautiful facts and phenomena over philosophy and religion?

While the golden hue of the intellectual days of Athens and of Rome has dazzled the students of our colleges and schools, let us see in it the simplicity and beauty of divine inspiration, and thus we can bring the great representatives of the past, Pythagoras,

Plato, and Socrates, into the list of those of our own faith, and feel the friendly influence of their lives reaching even our own age and time.

Thus have Greece and Rome borne their testimony, and added glowing links to the chain of evidence that brightens as it winds down through the centuries.

LECTURE XIV.

CHINESE THEOSOPHY. — CONFUCIANISM.

An article in the August, 1887, number of the North American Review entitled, "Why am I a Heathen?" from the pen of an educated Chinaman, Wong Chin Foo, has been read and commented upon by perhaps millions of people all over the United States, and its circulation has been by no means confined to America. The article itself, though deeply interesting, is by no means remarkable from a literary point of view. The writer evinces no profound acquaintance with his subject; his reasons for remaining a "heathen" are quite commonplace; they are, nevertheless, of such a character as to deeply impress the average reader, and without discussing the actual literary merits of this singular effusion, we cannot restrain an expression of gratitude to the writer for the very concise and definite manner in which he has stated his reasons for upholding Confucianism and objecting to become a Christian. It may possibly be a surprise to some people to be told that Chinamen, as a class, are neither atheists nor idolaters, but believers in one Infinite God, in the immortality of the human soul, and in future rewards and punishments proportioned to the merits of all who receive them. To the unenlightened and untravelled

American or European the Chinaman is an idolater, paying homage to some grotesque and miserable fetish to be witnessed in a Joss house, and certainly the aspect of Chinatown and the Chinese in California is not always likely to dispel this illusion; but then, what can be said of the illiterate Roman Catholic peasantry of Europe, and their forms of devotion — of the adoration paid to wayside crosses and images of saints often appearing like children's tawdry dolls? The priests do not inculcate idolatry, and the most ignorant Romanist would indignantly repel the charge of idolatry if brought against him; but appearances, all must confess, foster rather than dispel the opinion of the uninstructed stranger. The Chinese religion sanctions idolatry no more than does the Christian. Confucius worshiped idols no more than Jesus; and though his day was five or six centuries earlier than that of Jesus, his teachings were in many instances identical in spirit with those of the great Galilean master. It may be interesting before proceeding further, to briefly review the life and teachings of Confucius and contrast them with those of Jesus.

The time when Confucius was born was one of those marked eras in the history of nations which invariably produce great and gifted men. The Jews were just returning to Palestine after the Babylonish captivity; the Greeks were triumphing over Xerxes, the Persian; thus the world was in a state of peculiar readiness for some great intellectual and moral luminary who should enforce the essential truths of all religions, and so put forward the fundamental principles of morality, that government and the social order might be reconstructed on a higher base than previously.

It is singular that one so highly gifted and so eminently successful as Confucius should have given way to melancholy in his later years, and pronounced his mission a failure; but great souls are exceedingly sensitive, and their ideals so immeasurably higher than those of the populace around them, that what would be termed triumph by the majority seems almost defeat to them, and we may pertinently ask if ever during the physical lifetime of a seer or sage, he wins that glorious victory over prejudice and wrong which is his ultimately in unlimited degree? The temperament of Confucius was scholarly and sedate, yet there burned within him the most ardent and enthusiastic ambitions, not for his own aggrandizement, but for the elevation of his nation, and indeed the whole human family. It is well to note the precocity of many great heroes and heroines of history. Their boyhood or girlhood has usually been marked by some special streaks of brilliancy, and he whose career we are now considering was no exception to this rule; indeed he was one of its most forcible illustrations. At seventeen his biographers tell us he held the high office of inspector of grain, a position of trust and responsibility, and we are assured by Wong Chin Foo, in his article in the North American Review, that in conservative China offices are held only by those whose competency has led to their election or appointment; so we may feel sure Confucius must have been a singularly bright and capable boy to be promoted to such a station while so young in years. This appointment gave him the very opportunity he needed to show of what pure metal he was made. So conscientious and just was he in his every transaction that he won one of the highest marks of distinction a rising young man of business can possibly obtain. He was feared and detested by usurers, cheats, and merciless monopolists; he could neither be bought nor sold; integrity was the polar star of his life; honesty the only air in which he could breathe without suffocation. At nineteen, at which age he married, he enjoyed promotion to a much higher office, that of inspector-general of fields and herds, and in that superior place he continued to show in a marked degree those traits of manly excellence which had shone so conspicuously in him while he adorned a lower sphere. We may here take notice of the thoroughness with which a really great man does everything he essays to do at all. A great man's motto invariably is, "Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well"; or he translates the Christian maxim, "Whatsoever your hands find to do, that do with all your might" into daily and hourly practice. All over the land, under the guidance of Confucius, agriculture was so improved that waste lands were rendered fertile, and the necessaries of life were everywhere cheapened and improved. Such faithful service to his country was not allowed to pass unnoticed; his fame increased, his reputation spread, till even at court his name was mentioned with respect and admiration.

His mother, whom he loved devotedly, and for whom he entertained a feeling akin to worship, passed from her mortal form while her beloved son was still a very young man. Contrary to many despicable Eastern customs, which exemplify the degrading theory of woman's inferiority to man, Confucius so ordered the conduct of his mother's burial that no honor shown to his father's remains might be omitted at the interment of his mother. Whatever may have been the previous rites of burial among the Chinese, since his day it has been the unfailing custom in China to show equal respect to male and female departed. The words of Confucius on this subject are quoted as a maxim, "Those whom we have alike loved in life should not be separated in our respect in death." After his mother's passage to the unseen state, Confucius spent three whole years in retirement; giving up his public work and resigning his emoluments, he spent three of the best years of his life, from twenty-four to twenty-seven, in the study of truth, meditating on questions of immortal import to mankind. That very grief, which to him partook of the form of the sorest bereavement imaginable, opened his eyes to the Great Unseen; a business career no longer held any charms for him; the commonplaces of material existence seemed to him as nothing in comparison with those great questions of life and death which make the thoughtful man forget time and space as he strives to realize the stupendous facts of infinity and eternity. In the freshness of his bereavement his meditations were of a somber cast; it was only with great difficulty he could lay hold on the truth of immortality. Reared as he was in ancestor worship, he could but feel the influence of the spiritualistic ideas with which the mental air he breathed was fully charged; still a vague unrest possessed him, and while he retained implicit faith and reposed his entire confidence in Deity, whom he called the Principle of Life, there was a vein of pessimism in his philosophy which tended to sadden its founder, and in after years to enervate his followers.

It may be instructive as well as interesting to inquire somewhat closely into the Confucian idea of God, which is without doubt a very exalted one, though possibly, in the eyes of some, slightly pantheistic. In a conversation said to have taken place between Confucius and one of the princes of his country later in his life he expresses himself thus: "Chang-Ty (the Chinese term for the Supreme Spirit) is the universal Principle of Life — the faithful source whence all things have proceeded. To show gratitude to heaven is man's first duty; to show gratitude to ancestors his second." He explained how, after having rendered thanks to the Universal Spirit from whom all things flow, our hearts naturally turn lovingly to those departed worthies and beloved teachers and friends through whose instrumentality our minds have been directed toward the Supreme and our feet turned into the path of obedience to divine commandments. Duty to God can never be separated from duty to man; gratitude to God is inseparable from gratitude to man; we never find a great and good man or woman in all the annals of history who is not noted for filial devotion and respect shown to the great and good who have gone before.

A feature of the doctrine of Confucius, which may seem to some to condone the vice of idolatry, is very easily explained if we can comprehend the exceeding subtlety of his intellect and his deep spiritual consciousness of the omnipresence of the Infinite Being. He never discountenanced the symbolic rites and practices of his countrymen; on the other hand, he gave them the sanction of his approval, justifying them in words like the following: "Under whatever title man renders worship; whoever may be the apparent object of it, and of whatever nature may be the apparent ceremonies, it is always to Chang-Ty that one renders it, and it is Chang-Ty who is the object of veneration."

In reading O. B. Frothingham's "Life of Theodore Parker" we meet with passages in that great preacher's sayings when in conversation with Italian Catholic priests, strongly reminding us of the above quotation from Confucius. When Parker witnessed the devotions of the people at the shrines of their patron saints and listened to their intercessions, he calmly remarked that God probably cared little or nothing for the language in which petitions were couched, but everything for the state of mind and heart which led to prayers being offered at all. On one occasion he boldly said he did not think God would be offended if an honest though ignorant child should call the Eternal Parent St. Cecilia. The Roman Catholic priest to whom he made the remark was shocked, and said such views supported idolatry. How singular it seems that the very persons who are most addicted to seemingly idolatrous practices are the very ones who can see the least deeply into the spiritual truth they enshrine and hide. Probably this is due to the fact that those alone are highly gifted with spiritual discernment who have outlived the mental condition for which such forms constitute needed pabulum. Confucius, twenty-four centuries before Parker, was as uncompromising and devout a theist as he, and the very comprehensiveness of his pure theism enabled him to find the true God everywhere, in everybody and everything, and thus make excuses for all imperfection, though crime was hateful in his sight, and vice a target at which he directed his sharpest and surest arrows.

In many respects Confucius might be called a religious Rationalist; natural instead of supernatural religion won his confidence; his mind was too large, his sympathies too universal to permit of his taking that contracted view of revelation so prevalent among orthodox Christians. His whole system being founded on a recognition of universal justice and impartiality, he could not escape the conclusion that all the nations of earth, and all men individually, are accepted of God in proportion to their uprightness.

Wong Chin Foo truly says, the Calvinistic idea of predestination, with its awful doctrine of election for some and reprobation for others, has no place in the Confucian philosophy. It must be carefully borne in mind that Confucius stands before the world as a philosopher rather than as a theologian. He never endeavored to form a religious sect; his whole aim and ambition was to save the state; and knowing, as all wise statesmen must, that a nation's security depends on its morality, he rendered sacred all secular ideas and duties, carrying practical religion into daily life and commercial enterprise, instead of allowing it to be regarded as a thing apart, to be brought into requisition one hour a day, or one day a week, while all the rest of the time can be devoted to purely material endeavors.

Religion, rightly defined, is the science of righteous living; and as rectitude is as necessary in the holder of a civil as an ecclesiastical office, a true philosophy must needs be theological (as was that of Plato), if theology be defined, as it is by able etymologists, to mean first and last the knowledge of divine truth. As all religious concepts have a more or less direct bearing on the affairs of every-day life, a statesman or man of business needs to be fully as religious as one whose profession permits him to style himself a reverend minister of the Gospel.

The mind of Confucius turning as it did to moral philosophy, and the supreme object of his life being the reduction of moral theory to practice as a safeguard and savior of the nation, he early abandoned his political and business career and devoted his time and strength solely to the interests of philosophy. Like many another hero of the Old World, though he had a glorious ideal before him, he was always directing his own gaze and that of others to an ideal past. History informed him of a time long past when the government was purer and the people holier than in his day; and forgetful of the proverb, "Distance lends enchantment to the view," he permitted his mind to revert too frequently to olden days. This tinged his thought with sadness. It fostered deep regret and often hindered the advancement of the very cause in which all his energies and sympathies were enlisted.

Being of an artistic turn of mind, refined in his tastes almost to the verge of fastidiousness, he would frequently withdraw from all associates and turn to music and the sister arts for rest and recreation; music (of which he was passionately fond) always delighted him. He also took great interest in literary style and matters of etiquette, and of the use of arms he was not ignorant. His relations with the unseen world were very intimate, but some of his sayings give rise to the opinion that he was more of a Positivist than a Spiritualist.

The best followers of Auguste Comte could heartily sympathize with such exclamations as "The world is open to me; what am I fitted for? What is my place? Shall I live for time or for the long future — for the common weal, or for my own narrow good?" He decided as all noble souls decide. The remonstrances of friends, who told him he was throwing himself away on philosophy and reformatory projects (difficult if not impossible to realize), weighed nothing with him. The most brilliant offers failed to entice him; he was desirous of sinking every personal ambition in unwearied labor for the general good. The "Ancient Doctrine" was his text. All his discourses might have been from the text, "Choose the old paths and walk in them," and as eulogists are apt to overestimate the characters of whom they speak, so Confucius threw a glamour of glory round the heads of the nation's ancestors and held up these halo-crowned worthies as though they were in fact almost more than mortals.

minds to dwell exclusively upon the virtues of the past, totally ignoring its vices. In biblical exegesis this is too frequently the case; it is an error of the gravest type, as it supports pessimism more than all arguments combined. The grand old Hebrew Bible gives us no encouragement in this direction, as it proves its truthfulness, and the wisdom and foresight of its authors in no way so forcibly as in the attitude of impartial criticism it assumes toward patriarchs and prophets as well as common every-day men and women. The patriarchs and sages are not represented as perfect by any means. Their vices and frailties, even their crimes, are fully recorded, so we rise from a diligent perusal of Jewish Scripture, far more ready to thank God for the happy times in which we live and for our manifold blessings, than to sigh over a forfeited paradise in which purity and wisdom blazed in dazzling brightness, and ruled with undisputed sway.

Despite this criticism of the method and mental frontage of Confucius, we can but give our unquestioning sanction to the models he held up as examples to the populace. . . . The ancients, as he pictured them, were gods rather than men. Their historical virtues may have been fancied, but as ideals they were almost matchless. Supposing they were in some instances romantic personages to some extent or even evolved from the fertile fancy of Confucius himself, they were samples of the highest excellence, and in an exemplar we want to see virtue itself exhibited even though as in a romance lay figures may be introduced. Still the Confucian ideal of judicial administration was not perfect.

Certain of his maxims we had better avoid. Those we should avoid are indeed very few compared with those we would do well to adopt; but as he supports the theory of capital punishment as necessary for traitors, in order that social welfare be preserved, we can see at least one serious flaw in an otherwise almost perfect philosophy.

Speaking of office-holders he says, if they were inefficient or indifferent, remove them at once; but if dishonest morally or financially, execute them as traitors. Here we find one of the greatest blots in the recommendations of Confucius. His endorsement of capital punishment shows there is a rotten timber somewhere in his platform of principles. True, the professing Christian cannot take exception to this, for nowhere are executions more common than in avowedly Christian lands. The Christian church has always advocated and supported hanging for murder, and only recently we read of a horrid sensation in France over the guillotine; but it must be distinctly borne in mind that when Confucians execute criminals they are acting in harmony with the teachings of their most venerated leader, while Christians are guilty of a disgraceful violation of the law proclaimed by him whom they profess to regard, if they are orthodox, as incarnate Deity, and if they are unorthodox (Universalist or Unitarian for example), as the noblest specimen of manhood and brightest moral exemplar the world has ever seen.

Wong Chin Foo when he invites the Christians of America to come to Confucius should remember that if they adhere closely to the precepts of Jesus they can gain nothing by transferring their allegiance to the great Chinese philosopher; and if it be objected that Christianity has been in existence over eighteen hundred years and has failed to bless the world to any appreciable extent, bloody wars and religious persecutions having characterized its advance everywhere, we must boldly and fairly meet the issue by denouncing popular Christianity as a system of usurpation, the name of Jesus having been made a cloak wherewith to cover the vilest atrocities and the most disgusting hypocrisy. The religion of Jesus and nominal Christianity are two very different things. The former is a simple gospel of universal charity, the latter a tissue of creeds and dogmas, many of them utterly false and terribly pernicious in their effects upon society. The gospels, however, afford no warrant for such dogmas, all of which were derived from mythology, not from the teachings of Jesus or the older sayings of the Hebrew prophets. Paul, not Jesus, was the founder of creedal Christianity, and he derived his materials largely from ancient Egyptian scriptures, with which his letters to the Corinthians prove his familiarity. His whole argument for the resurrection is based on Egyptian teaching and symbolism, and when he alludes to certain things being written in the Scriptures, we search in vain for them in the Old Testament, and scholars inform us the gospels were not then in existence. The Egyptian origin of many, though certainly not all of the doctrines and ceremonies of the prevailing Christian Church, can readily be proved by reference to history. Paul was a complex character; his was a very learned mind; as a reasoner his astuteness was marvelous; but if the evangelists speak truly, his character was widely different from that of Jesus. He burned to make proselytes, while Jesus protested against proselytism, after the manner of Israelites generally. Jesus was a consistent but extremely progressive Jew, who never attacked the temple worship or the synagogue as an institution. His respect for the Mosaic law was unsurpassed, though he took exception to many Levitical injunctions, and showed little countenance to puerile Talmudic fables.

If Jesus were on earth to-day, his doctrines would find far more favor with progressive Jews than with orthodox Christians.

Jesus, like Confucius, was a political reformer as well as a moralist. He was by no means the "miracle worker" many people suppose him to have been, neither was he an illiterate man as many suppose; for though the secret source of his "letters" was a mystery to his countrymen, he displayed remarkable evidences of learning on many occasions; and when did a man create as much astonishment among the multitudes by knowing so much of "letters" as he did among the doctors at Jerusalem when only twelve? The historical element in the gospels shows us Jesus as a very lovely character. Ernest Renan has eulogized him none too highly, though we think Renan's criticisms a little too sentimental. We can detect fully as much power as sweetness in the character of Jesus. The phrase, "lovely Galilean vision," does not touch all sides of his character by any means, for he was one of the most rigid moralists the world has ever seen; even

Isaiah was never more severe in his denunciation of injustice than was Jesus; but with all his bold denunciation of error he preached love as the only savior of sinners. Once in a while he could dilate grandly on the terrible retribution awaiting the ungodly, but love was the key-note of all his sermons. Love with him was alpha and omega, and it is only in the thirteenth chapter of St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, that that great apostle thoroughly presents the religion of Jesus in its native simplicity. James and John both interpreted Jesus better than Paul on the whole, though they may not have been Paul's equals in scholarship.

Luther was blind indeed when he became so carried away with Paul's doctrine of justification by faith as to reject the epistle of James, calling it an epistle of straw when it is really one of the finest, if not the very finest of all the epistles. Had Luther looked more deeply into the true nature of faith he would have seen that James was the most lynx-eyed of all the apostles, for his interpretation of faith chimes in exactly with the doctrine of Jesus, and is most true etymologically to the sources whence faith (Latin fides, which gives us the English word fidelity) is derived. We cannot contrast the doctrine of Jesus concerning faith with that of Confucius, for the two are one. Confucius extols rectitude; Jesus, faithfulness: and here if we have a distinction at all, it is without a difference, and therefore none in reality. What our Chinese friend Wong Chin Foo objects to, is the very thing we are never tired of attacking, and which we are frequently compelled to rebuke, and that is the mischievous way in which blind belief is confounded with and substituted for genuine faith, which is a virtue, a moral excellence, certainly not a blind belief in ecclesiastical assumptions.

"He that believeth shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be condemned" (sometimes the harsher word damned is used) is a text which has led to the detestable inference that there is but a single step from the gallows to glory, if a criminal only repent at the eleventh hour; and by repentance is meant not reformation, but belief in vicarious atonement. Had that passage been always translated true to its original intent, our Chinese friend would have had no opportunity to enter his protest against the demoralizing doctrines of popular Christianity. For, had no liberties been taken with the original, and had the general tenor of "Christ's" teaching been taken into account, the text would read, he who is faithful (i.e. full of faith in its true sense) shall be saved, he who is unfaithful (faithless) shall be condemned. Here is common ground between Jew, Gentile, and undenominational teacher of ethics. Professor Huxley expresses unqualified admiration for the simple ethics of Judaism as expounded by Micah. Professor Tyndal admires the Decalogue and has frequently advocated the strict observance of the eighth commandment especially. Judaism is the purest of all the world's great religions, its professed doctrines constituting the foundation of all religions. Jesus was no apostate or renegade Jew; he may have been turned out of the synagogue, as many noble men have been,

when the synagogue has been mismanaged by ignorant and bigoted conservatives, as in the days of Spinoza in Germany; but if we are to acknowledge Jesus as "a teacher sent from God," especially if we are to see in him the greatest teacher who ever lived, as Christians claim him to have been, we must revert to first principles, and gladly and contentedly submit to obey the moral law given by Moses to the children of Israel, not indeed in all its literal severity as proclaimed by uncompromising sticklers for the letter, but in that deep and true sense in which it can be fulfilled in love.

We are constantly plied with questions relative to the treatment of criminals: this seems to indicate either that crime is on the increase, and therefore the popular mind is unusually exercised concerning it; or that a wave of merciful feeling is sweeping over the public that is so far changing it as to occasion a drift away from the old barbaric administrations of reproof. There can be but two lawful objects to be obtained by the enforcement of penalties, viz.: the reformation of the offender and the protection of society. We unhesitatingly declare that capital punishment neither reforms nor protects; it may have been lawful in a darker age, but eighteen hundred and fifty years ago the highest thought in Palestine was in advance of it, Jesus seeing nothing in a perfect fulfillment of the moral law which required the taking away of a human life, even the life of one who had slain his neighbor. He distinctly, and with great emphasis, repudiates the belief that God is the author of a retaliative policy: all retaliation he attributes to certain men of old with whom he disagrees; yet he says he came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it. The object of legislation is unchanging; its outward forms are subject to incessant alteration, for with the constant development of human intelligence, and particularly the moral sense, institutions once regarded as essential to the preservation of social order are frowned upon as not only useless, but inhuman. "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" was barbaric justice. No one could call it injustice, for it was exact retribution for the offense committed; one eye exchanged for one eye, one tooth as payment for one tooth, seems perfectly fair and harmonizes perfectly with that crude idea of compensation which possesses the spiritually untutored mind. But Jesus, seeing far more deeply into the essence of the moral law, knew such modes of carrying out the law of justice must inevitably result in a cruel enforcement of justice, untempered by mercy, and wherever love is absent, the reformatory and protective elements in just penalties are alike impossible.

The old prophecies, "whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," and "a life for a life" are references to the Oriental doctrine of Karma, upon which we have entered treating of Buddhism. To interpret prophecy as though it were commandment, leads to gross errors in administration; but only the humane and gentle are gifted with sufficient spiritual insight to discern the true meaning of such profound utterances as deal with the (to ordinary minds) insoluble mysteries of divine government.

Whenever Jesus is really appealed to as an authority by Christians, Christianity loses all its asperity; its contradictions are forgotten, its ecclesiastical savagery is replaced by love, and a fair and lovely vision of divine beneficence supplants the hideous spectacle of a religious inquisition. The cathedral at Seville, in Spain, in front of which, in the open square, bull fights are of common occurrence, is a scandal and disgrace to those who profess to worship Jesus, of sufficient magnitude to justify the harshest accusations by the most rabid opponents of the system. The horrors of the Spanish inquisition, whose blood-curdling details are so often rehearsed as arguments against Christianity, are indeed enough to repel any intelligent or humane Jew or "heathen" from a system under whose auspices such flagrant iniquities could possibly be sustained, and we hesitate not to say that recent persecutions of Jews in Russia and Poland have been vile enough to brand professedly Christian governments with the stigma of perpetual infamy. Yea, and the dealings of modern nations with the Orient, — opium forced upon the Chinese at the point of the bayonet by Christian soldiers. Missionaries, Bibles, ardent spirits, and hosts of dissolute practices, all sent together out to China by Christian emissaries, avowedly bent on the holy mission of sanctifying the heathen, cannot but create a fearful recoil against Christianity in the minds of the Chinese, while in this country so little is done to benefit the Chinamen that the thought of foreign missions must appear ludicrous in the extreme to the serene and placid follower of Confucius, who taught every citizen to mind his own business, to value virtue more than gold, and to let well alone, instead of forever, with feverish haste, rushing after innovations, and living so restless a life that health, happiness, and morality are squandered in the idolatry of the god of gold.

Wong Chin Foo accuses Americans of worshiping the almighty dollar more than God, of building costly temples and other avowedly religious and philanthropic institutions, which they support at the expense of justice and benevolence; and in bringing forward such accusations he is doing what Jesus himself would commend, for surely no one who ever lived detested avariciousness more than he who told his followers not to be anxious concerning any material thing. Strange, indeed, to a "heathen" must be the anomalous spectacle of a people worshiping Jesus with their lips, and practically deserting his precepts with barefaced impudence. Against the religion of Jesus, Wong Chin Foo has not uttered a single word. In his eulogy of Confucius and the Chinese religion he has not betrayed himself into a single extravagance, but he has evidently failed to see wherein Jesus as a moral teacher surpassed Confucius, and may indeed have been that "star in the west" to which Confucius pointed, whose bright shining in days to come he eloquently foretold.

Having alluded to the pessimistic tendencies of the system of Confucius, and to his melancholy disposition, we do not feel it would be just to dismiss our theme without assigning what we feel to be, after all, the true reason for the sadness of the great Chinese sage. So lofty were his ideals, so keen his prophetic foresight, that his spirit looked ahead across the vistas of ages, and saw the ultimate future not only of China, but of the world. The true greatness of all idealism consists in its prophetic inspiration. Realism is cold, lifeless, and inefficient, because it sees no future. Artistic creations are immortal; imitations are all short-lived. Quixotic schemes, Utopian projects, never desert us, because Don Quixote is ever a prophet, and Utopia is our future state of being.

All before us, not behind us, lies paradise without a serpent. The future of the world will witness the absence of every obnoxious beast, venomous reptile, poisonous tree, and contentious man; but the future is often the distant future, and he who thinks it immediate is terribly apt to be disheartened and die in despair of his darling hopes ever being fulfilled for humanity. Isaiah saw the possible future of the house of Israel, and the certain destiny of universal mankind. In his noblest flights of poetry time and distance are annihilated. He sees the whole earth in the coming days of glory, but never yet in the experience of the Jewish people have Isaiah's glorious prophecies been literally fulfilled, and Christianity has certainly been far from the realization of Isaiah's vision. Still Isaiah's words of hope and comfort have kept up the fainting spirits of exiled, persecuted Hebrews, when to be a Jew in Europe meant to be an outlaw, to dwell in a wretched ghetto apart from all the rest of mankind, and be a target at which the most envenomed arrows of hatred and cruel mendacity were perpetually hurled.

Jeremiah, on the other hand, though also a great prophet, never rose to the sublimity of Isaiah, because he was the poet of complaint, while Isaiah was the poet of hope and jubilant exultation. Individual temperament has much to do with the view one takes of life; a restless, eager soul that cannot always feast upon the outlined glories of celestial mountains rising above the clouds in the far distance, falls into depression, often into despair, when darkness intercepts his view, and mists and shadows hide the mountains from his gaze. Confucius could never stand on the top of Mt. Pisgah and view the promised land as the sure and certain possession of his countrymen in his later days. He could not see beyond death, as Jesus or as Moses could. He was disheartened because of the length of time spent in the wilderness, and the smallness of the number of those who would undertake an exodus from Egypt at all. His countrymen had long remained in bondage to hoary errors; they, with characteristic Oriental conservatism, were slow to change. Not only was the distance great between them and the glorious goal ahead, but those who did attempt the march forward walked feebly and falteringly; they crept like the tortoise, while their leader wanted them to run like the hare, and they often turned backward; then when the true import and full significance of his mission was made known to them, many deserted his standard and grieved him with their apostacy for filthy lucre's sake. This was gall and wormwood to his spirit; it pained him deeply. When he was misinterpreted and reviled he never answered back in anger, but his heart was sore, and, with a gentle and pitiful contempt, he lost faith in humanity, esteeming a people hardly worth saving if they would not save themselves.

We think no better simile of the efforts of Confucius can be shown us than the spectacle of a young, energetic man catching sight of a glorious range of mountains, from the snow-capped, light-crowned peaks of which a view of the most gorgeous and extensive scenery can be obtained. The day is fine, the air bracing, the sun brightly shining; it is early morn, the birds are just pouring forth their matin praise; the youth is strong and refreshed for labor, and so near seem the hills, he thinks he can gain not only their base, but reach their summits before nightfall. But, alas for him, he has altogether miscalculated the distance between him and them, and still further has he underrated the length of the journey from base to summit, and the exceeding difficulty of the way. Day after day and night after night go by; he wearies on the road, sinks to sleep one night with the mountains out of sight because beclouded with mist, and thinks at last that he has been a fool for his pains in striving to reach what must, after all, be but a mirage in the desert. After a sleep unusually profound and refreshing, he wakes to find them close at hand. He has traveled further than he knew in the days of mist and shadow, when their dim outlines were scarcely discernible, and at length, after days instead of hours of effort, he finds the mountains there in greater size and grandeur than any far-off prospect could reveal.

Confucius could never know how far along the road he had himself traveled, or how many others he had induced to undertake the forward march, till the clearer light of immortality, after physical dissolution, awoke within him in that realm of revelation where his doubting but ever faithful spirit grasped with an unyielding grip the truth of optimism. A soul so noble could never have been disappointed after death, whatever set-backs he may have encountered on this side of Jordan. His closing hours were marked by peaceful resignation and tender, loving solicitude for the well-being of his country, yea, the world at large, though he made special efforts to secure the well-being of his own beloved children. No more loving father, no more powerful moralist, no more faithful man ever trod the earth: but he had not the all-conquering power of Jesus to abolish death and triumph so gloriously over its dominion as to make his death the door of hope to all who should read of it.

As to the moral and social condition of the Chinese Empire, there are two sides to every question. Wong Chin Foo is evidently a patriot, — in some senses a partisan, — and therefore not an altogether disinterested witness, but we believe him when he says crime is less frequent in China than in England and America. The much-lauded and decidedly overestimated civilization of the West loses much when its restless mammon-worship is contrasted with the reposeful stolidity of Eastern peoples. A careful comparison of Oriental religions, and a further acquaintance with the actual condition of Asiatics cannot but knock some of the conceit out of those pretenders to a monopoly of culture and revelation who calmly imagine Europe and

Without adopting the Christian name, we can end this lecture with the words, "Come to Jesus." We do not invite our readers to Christianity, but to that simple gospel of love proclaimed by its alleged founder. To Wong Chin Foo we do not say, Abandon Confucianism; for there is no Christian society he would be improved by joining; but we do say to him (and perhaps he does not need the advice — he may have already done so), Study carefully the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount, and you may become a missionary to Christians in their own land. You have been rather severe on the Unitarians, but scarcely too much so on any other denomination. Spiritualism, as it is at this time usually presented, might repel rather than attract you, and possibly Theosophy may be too mystical in its appearance to invite your examination. You evidently are desirous of seeing established in America a universal practical religion of good and noble deeds, without cant and without dissimulation. You can find in the ethics of Judaism, and also in the gospel utterances (which are, as Benjamin D'Israeli always said, but an amplification of the Hebrew religion) exactly the material you need to work upon. We are all deeply indebted to you for your scathing though merited tirade against hypocrisy, and trust the American people will so far follow your good advice as to live by all the good there is in the Confucian philosophy, and, not resting there, harmonize their lives with the yet more spiritual teachings of the prophet of Galilee.

Thus may they develop a truly theosophical religion, to which no Confucian, Brahman, Parsee, Buddhist, or any other Oriental need take the slightest exception; for Theosophy is free universal religion (not creedism) in the broadest meaning of the phrase.

LECTURE XV.

ELECTRICAL CHRISTIAN THEOSOPHY; ELECTRICITY THE BASIS OF LIFE; AN ELECTRIC CREED; ELECTRICAL THERAPEUTICS.

In approaching the subject of electricity in this age of marvelous and ever-multiplying electrical inventions and appliances, we are led to inquire whether, despite all the control which man is seemingly gaining over the electric fluid, electricity is not, after all, the sovereign master instead of the obedient servant. A very wonderful and truly theosophical book, "A Romance of Two Worlds," by Marie Corelli, continues to circulate widely all over America as well as in England, where it was originally published. The authoress is evidently a woman of sincere and noble convictions, and uses her facile pen and unusual ability as a novelist, to convey to the minds of her readers something like an adequate idea of the stupendous power inherent in a force about which so few really know anything. Dr. Molière of San Francisco, and other truly eminent physicians who do honor to the profession they adorn, are in exact agreement with Marie Corelli, in declaring it to be their conviction that electricity is the one only vital force in nature; that it can be gathered from the atmosphere and returned to the earth, but is never generated and never destroyed. Dr. Scott, whose various inventions have made his name known everywhere, no doubt tells a great truth through the instrumentality of a hair-brush, when he makes that common toilet accessory declare on its back, which holds a battery, "the germ of all life is electricity." To many who read these words, an idea is at once erroneously conveyed, that if this be so, there can be no spiritual basis of life, for electricity is generally regarded as a blind force utterly distinct from everything we can call mind, soul, or spirit. Such, however, is not the case; this subtle all-pervading force is in its essence purely spiritual, and flows through all the kingdoms and forms of nature as their life-giving principle, or nothing could exist. We cannot affirm that what we are accustomed to call electricity is other than a manifestation of spirit, a phenomenal display of the unitary life-principle which pervades the universe; it is indeed the sole agent employed by intelligence itself in its expressions through the varied and numberless fields of nature. As it is part of the object of this volume to review standard works bearing on Theosophy, in the broad acceptance of the word, we will here introduce extracts from "A Romance of Two Worlds," appending such comments of our own as we may find necessary to insure our readers' understanding of our own attitude to this extraordinary revelation, — for revelation it is; and a revelation, moreover, peculiarly timely when electricity is everywhere the subject of thought and experimentation. As we cannot do more than briefly allude to any one book, no matter how valuable its contents, owing to our limited space, we shall present our readers with only such extracts from Marie Corelli's priceless contribution to literature as seem to us of special interest and importance to students of Theosophy, which means for us the all in all of spiritual revelation.

From the Introduction to the 50-cent edition of "A Romance of Two Worlds," published by Ivers & Co., New York, we extract the following sublime utterances: —

In spite of the doctrines of agnostics and materialists, there is a perpetual, passionate craving in the souls of many for that inward peace and absolute content which can only be obtained by a perfect faith in God and the coming Life Eternal. Materialism does not and can never still the hunger of the Immortal Spirit in man for those things divine, which are, by right, its heritage. Nothing on earth can soothe or console it — nothing temporal can long delight it — in time the best gifts the world can offer seem valueless; while one spark of God's own essence remains alit within us, it is impossible that here, on this limited plane of thought and action, we should ever be satisfied. I do not address myself to those who have forsaken all spirituality — who have made their cold adieux to God, and who, of their own free will and choice, lie down in dust and ashes, with foolish faces turned earthward and hidden from the light — to them I say pitifully, "Requiescat in pace!" for they are as though they were not. It is to those who feel the quick stirrings of a larger, grander life within them — who realize with love and eagerness the wonders of the world to come, and who gaze appealingly across the darkness of present things, striving to see, no matter how distantly, the first faint glimmer of the brightness that glitters beyond the grave — to these I speak, inadequately and feebly I know, yet with all my soul desiring to cheer them, as they climb from steep to steep of high thought and noble endeavor, onward and upward.

The "Romance" has since its appearance been made the subject of much discussion; and I, as its author, have had to submit to a great deal of cross-questioning concerning its theories. I have been brought into contact with many peculiar phases of thought and feeling relating to occultism and clairvoyance, and people of all shades of opinion seek my acquaintance in the expectation of being initiated into something very strange and mysterious — let me say, something vulgarly melodramatic — concerning the spiritual world. Their disappointment is always extreme when they learn that my creed has its foundation in Christ alone, and that I date my spiritual growth in this world from that one Light, containing in itself both the divine and human essence of absolute power, wisdom and purity. "Only Christ!" is the look plainly expressed in their faces; and they turn from me altogether puzzled and dissatisfied. Were I to initiate them — or rather pretend to initiate them — into some new or old form of Buddhism — could I show them some poor trickery such as the vanishing of a box in the air, the turning of a red flower to white, or white to red, or any of the optical illusions practiced with such skill by native conjurers, I might easily be surrounded by disciples of "Occultism" — persons who are generally ready, nay, even eager, to be deceived. But "Only Christ!" — only the old, old story of Divine Love and Sacrifice! — how tame and trivial! No skipping about of chairs and tables — no "dematerialization of matter" — no jumping through a ceiling without making a hole in it — not even a sideboard possessed of voluntary volition — no excitement — no incipient madness — nothing but the well-worn doctrines of Christ which have been dinned into our ears from childhood — how shall anything new come of these?

Many have eagerly asked me: "How can we perform miracles?" "Can we see visions?" "How are we to cultivate the electric Spirit within us?" I have only one reply to make to these "searchers after the unseen": it is this — "With God all things are possible." Without Him, nothing is possible. The power of performing miracles, the gifts of healing and prophecy, and the ability to see beyond the things of this world, are all obtainable, but only through absolute faith in Christ. The smallest hesitation, the least grain of that insolent and foolish pride which dares to deny the very existence of the Creator, the faintest shadow of self-seeking or self-love, and the inner spiritual force is instantly paralyzed. It cannot be too strongly impressed on the minds of those interested in this high question, that nothing temporal, however pleasant, brings any gratification or advantage to the Soul. While pent up in clay it is a cramped and prisoned creature, and unless fed with the divine and heating influences of unselfish love, unswerving faith, high aspirations and pure devotion, it starves and dwindles down to so feeble a flame that, when the body in which it has passed such a miserable existence perishes, it is forced to seek elsewhere for some fresh chance of development. I have explained this fully in the "Electric Creed" which, I may here observe, has been much commented upon, and by some deemed blasphemous — I know not why. Its tenets are completely borne out by the New Testament, which sacred little book, however, has much of its mystical and true meaning obscured nowadays through the indifference of those who read, and the apathy of those who hear. Sunday after Sunday its noble passages are drawled or droned forth by clergymen who have ceased to put any life or soul into their manner of utterance, and most of whom look upon their sacred vocation merely as a means of livelihood. Their congregations appear to listen, but in truth their thoughts are far away — they have "heard it so often," they murmur, with an apologetic yawn. The words, "Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold," fall on dull and inattentive ears: the people are unconscious that in themselves they are fulfilling that prophecy as well as this: "Seeing, they shall not see; and hearing, they shall not understand. . . ."

True spiritual progress and knowledge are shown in the cheerful, sincere, and wholesome life of the person possessing it, and in the encouraging and ennobling influence that life has on the lives of others. Moreover, it is displayed in the buoyancy and tireless energy of the body in which the beautiful, expanding, highly destined Spirit is for a time bidden to work — in the brightness and serenity of the eye, the absence of all depression, the contentment and tranquillity of the disposition and temper. Hypnotism, which is merely animal magnetism called by a new name, and which is nothing but a physical attraction of strong bodies brought to bear on weakly, diseased, or passive ones, has nothing whatever in common with what I may designate spiritual electric force. The professor of hypnotism is able on certain occasions to instil a thought into the mind of his patient, and force him (or her — it is generally a feeble woman who is the subject practiced upon) to act upon it; pain may be soothed, and long trances may ensue, but this power is only temporary. The trance of hypnotism is a stupor, — in it the patient sees nothing worth remembering, even if he could remember, which he never does. This is a positive sign that hypnotism pertains to the material side of existence, and has nothing to do with the spiritual. Many persons — particularly women — who are highly nervous and in a debilitated condition of mind and body, imagine their state of chronic hysteria to be one of supernatural inspiration; and several such overwrought beings have been introduced to me as "wonderful spiritualists," whereas they are only sickly and morbid. True Spiritualism is above all things healthy; it places the human being in a fearless, noble attitude toward both God and Man, and nothing but benefits can accrue from it. . . .

The miracles of Christ were emanations of pitying love and entire unselfishness, performed solely for the benefit or relief of others, without ostentation or pretense at mystery.

I once asked an ardent Buddhist the reason of his preference for Buddhism to Christianity. He hesitated a little, then said: "Oh, I don't know! Anything for a change!" After this, who could doubt the sincerity of his convictions? Certainly, if ever there was a time for a new apostle of Christ to arise and preach His grandly simple message anew that time is now. Such a one should belong to no Church, for in the multitude of churches and their differing and, unhappily, quarrelsome sects, Christ is crucified over and over again, and made to die a thousand shameful deaths. The old forms of preaching do not move the minds of the present generation. There needs fresh fire, more touching eloquence, more earnestness of purpose. And the light of Science must be brought to bear on the New Testament, in which its glorious pages will grow bright with hitherto unguessed mystical meanings if humbly and prayerfully studied. I have often wondered at the density of preachers who, in accordance with the established rule of their order, keep on telling their congregations to "save their souls," without making the slightest attempt to explain what the Soul is. The people taken en masse are never brought to realize the fact of the imperishable inner Self within each one of them — that actual Self which claims as much and more sustenance than the outer body on which we spend such a superabundance of care — care which avails nothing at death, while the attention bestowed on the deathless part of us avails everything. The world is growing surely tired of monotonous sermons on the old Jewish doctrine of original sin and necessary sacrifice. Most truly did Christ declare, "In vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men."

And, as has been set forth in the "Electric Creed," Christ did not come to us as a Sacrifice, but as a means of close communication with God. I consider it both horrible and sacrilegious to imagine that God, the Creator of Love and Beauty, could desire a bleeding victim as a sacrifice to appease His anger, and that Victim part of Himself imprisoned in human form — as if God could feel such an unworthy passion as anger! Sorrow, pity, desire to draw the love of even so small a part of His creation as this earth nearer to His Infinite Protection — these emotions are God-like, and are all displayed in the person of His Christ. This is why I venture to say that the time has come for a new form of preaching, that shall show the Gospel to be one of Love, not Fear. Not because, coward-like, we are afraid to displease God, should we endeavor to purify our lives, but because we know and feel we have a spark of His essence in ourselves that attracts us to Him (and therefore to all goodness) by the force of pure Love alone. Not because we would shun future punishment or desire future joy, but because we know we are akin to Him and He to us, and in that marvelous affinity feel that we would rather perish forever than wrong by so much as a thought the Supremely Beloved. This, it seems to me, is Christianity as Christ meant it: Unselfish love for the Creator, the corresponding cord of which must be unselfish love for all he has created; love radiating like broad sunbeams everywhere without grudge or stint; love for one's fellow-creatures; love for the birds and flowers and all the wise and wonderful workings of nature; love, the first and best nourishment of the spirit within us, which, fed thus, responds like a vibrating harp string to the smallest hint from the Divine master-hand; love which looks beyond the veil of temporal things, and sees clearly with most bright and undazzled eyes; love which is endowed with perfect faith, because, being part of God, it cannot doubt God's existence. And to the immortal spirit possessed of this love, all things are possible — all miracles, all gifts of healing and high influence. But without it all spiritual research is utterly useless. . . .

The distinguishing mark of the true Spiritualist is what I may call Self-rejection. Self stands on one side, as it were, and is no longer allowed to obscure the soul's view of the splendid universe to which it belongs. And I affirm, and will most ardently maintain, that in the teachings of Christ will be found all the secrets of occult science, all the keynotes of the myriad, upward-sounding scales of the highest active spirituality — spirituality that has nothing to do with a morbid imagination and a debilitated or diseased physical frame, but that, on the contrary, is strong and calm, useful and beneficial wherever it works; cheering, strengthening, encouraging, and ennobling all with whom it is brought in contact, and leaving men and women better, happier, and purer for its influence. Such spirituality, the outcome of the electric spirit of Divinity in man, corresponding to the supreme center of Divinity in the Creator, can see and converse with angels — can heal the sick and console the afflicted — can preserve health in the body and beauty in the face and form — can even retain youth much longer than materialists dream of — can meet misfortune as though it were joy, and can triumph in death, knowing Death to be but this world's name for Life.

The idea of Eternity, as depicted in the "Electric Ring encompassing God's World" contained in that part of the "Romance" called "A Miniature Creation," has been for the most part passed over by those who have reviewed my book in the columns of the press, and it is to this I wish briefly to draw the attention of my readers. The Ring is described as perpetually creative and perpetually absorbent. Planets are from time to time drawn within it and again cast forth from it, and of this tremendous electric Force there can be no end, inasmuch as it is the outer circle or atmosphere of the Central Planet of all planets wherein the Creator has His being. The theory is simple, yet by it all the gigantic and minute marvels of the universe are made easy of comprehension — as easy as the explanation of the main-spring of a watch, though an untutored savage would find a watch most difficult to understand. But to the mechanician who has put the watch together and knows how to wind it up, there is no mystery in the seemingly intricate work; and we, who consider ourselves wise, especially when we are called scientists — we who, in the insolent littleness of our limited thought, sometimes presume to dismiss the Creator as no part of His creation — we shall in the hereafter wake up from the troubled dream we call living, to the fact that the great Chronometer of the Universe is quite a simple thing — so simple that we shall wonder at ourselves for not reading its apparent secret before. As the wise king wrote: "The thoughts of mortal men are miserable, and their devices are but uncertain. For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things. And hardly do we guess aright the things that are upon earth, and with labor do we find the things that are before our eyes; but the things that are in heaven who hath searched out? Except Thou give wisdom and send Thy Holy Spirit from above."

I have lately been accused by a leading critic of "imagining a new heaven and earth, and passionately flinging them in the teeth of an obstinate reality that will not conform to them." But I have imagined no theory of which the starting-point cannot be found in the Scriptures, and the only "obstinate reality" I am aware of in this world is death, to which, undoubtedly, all things must conform. Therefore I hope I do "passionately fling into the teeth of that obstinate reality" my glad, grateful, and full belief in the future existence — the coming life of perfect joy, love, and beauty — a life which alone is worth working for, hoping for, praying for, — and compared to which, in my eyes at least, this earth seems but a sort of eclipse — a black disk, obscuring for a time the desired and desirable sunlight — a passing cloud, the movement of which I note with a certain impatience, accepting its shadow, as it falls on my soul, not as an "obstinate reality," but simply as shadow through which sometimes — by the way of the Cross — the light of the veiled Glory shines.

MARIE CORELLI.

The following equally beautiful, powerful, and exceedingly apposite words at this juncture in the world's thought are from the Prologue : —

We live in an age of universal inquiry, ergo of universal skepticism. The prophecies of the poet, the dreams of the philosopher and scientist, are being daily realized — things formerly considered mere fairy-tales have become facts — yet, in spite of the marvels of learning and science that are hourly accomplished among us, the attitude of mankind is one of disbelief. "There is no God!" cries one theorist; "or if there be one, I can obtain no proof of His existence!" "There is no Creator!" exclaims another. "The Universe is simply a rushing together of atoms." "There can be no Immortality," asserts a third. "We are but dust, and to dust we shall return." "What is called by idealists the Soul," argues another, "is simply the vital principle composed of heat and air, which escapes from the body at death, and mingles again with its native element. A candle when lit emits flame; blow out the light, the flame vanishes — where? Would it not be madness to assert the flame immortal? Yet the soul, or vital principle of human existence, is no more than the flame of a candle."

If you propound to these theorists the eternal question WHY? — why is the world in existence? why is there a universe? why do we live? why do we think and plan? why do we perish at the last? — their grandiose reply is, "Because of the Law of Universal Necessity." They cannot explain this mysterious Law to themselves, nor can they probe deep enough to find the answer to a still more tremendous WHY — namely, Why is there a Law of Universal Necessity? — but they are satisfied with the result of their reasonings, if not wholly, yet in part, and seldom try to search beyond that great vague vast Necessity, lest their finite brains should reel into madness worse than death. Recognizing, therefore, that in this cultivated age a wall of skepticism and cynicism is gradually being built up by intellectual thinkers of every nation against all that treats of the Supernatural and Unseen, I am aware that my narration of the events I have recently experienced will be read with incredulity. At a time when the great empire of the Christian Religion is being assailed, or politely ignored by governments and public speakers and teachers, I realize to the fullest extent how daring is any attempt to prove, even by a plain history of strange occurrences happening to one's self, the actual existence of the Supernatural around us; and the absolute certainty of a future state of being, after the passage through that brief soul-torpor in which the body perishes, known to us as Death.

In the present narration, which I have purposely called a "romance," I do not expect to be believed, as I can only relate what I myself have experienced. I know that men and women of to-day must have proofs, or what they are willing to accept as proofs, before they will credit anything that purports to be of a spiritual tendency, — something startling — some miracle of a stupendous nature, such as according to prophecy they are all unfit to receive. Few will admit the subtle influence and incontestable, though mysterious, authority exercised upon their lives by higher intelligences than their own — intelligences unseen, unknown, but felt. Yes! felt by the most careless, the most cynical; in the uncomfortable prescience of danger, the inner forebodings of guilt — the moral and mental torture endured by those who fight a protracted battle to gain the hardly-won victory in themselves of right over wrong — in the thousand and one sudden appeals made without warning to that compass of a man's life, Conscience — and in those brilliant and startling impulses of generosity, bravery, and self-sacrifice which carry us on, heedless of consequences, to the performance of great and noble deeds, whose fame makes the whole world one resounding echo of glory — deeds that we wonder at ourselves even in the performance of them — acts of heroism in which mere life goes for nothing, and the Soul for a brief space is pre-eminent, obeying blindly the guiding influence of a something akin to itself, yet higher in the realms of Thought.

We have not space to review the amazing story which follows the truly remarkable introduction of which the foregoing extracts give a good idea. The authoress proceeds to relate how the heroine of the romance was completely restored to health from a condition of extreme and protracted debility by spiritual electric methods. The narrative is delightfully told, and carries the reader with it from first to last. The scenes are laid first in Italy, then in Paris. In Paris the heroine meets a wonderful electrician, by name "Heliobas," who lives in a beautiful house fitted up with every conceivable electrical appliance for health, comfort, and beauty. His only sister, to whom he is tenderly attached, lives with him. Between her and Marie Corelli's charming heroine a warm friendship springs up, which continues to increase till the gifted "Zara" passes to the invisible world. Her exit from the mortal body is electric, as everything of importance is throughout the story. After her departure from the mortal form, she shows herself in immortal beauty to her sorrow-stricken friend, who, immediately after the vision, carries tidings to Heliobas, who is being misjudged and cruelly insulted by a man of the world, who had been an unwelcome aspirant for Zara's hand in marriage, and who, after her tragic transition, heaped reproaches upon the noble and faithful brother, between whom and his sister nothing but the most loyal and loving confidence had ever existed.

As might be expected in a work of such exceptionally pure tone and ennobling sentiment as "A Romance of Two Worlds," the young lady who had been the recipient of a message from her ascended friend, succeeded by the sheer force of spiritual truth and dignity to quell all disturbance, and make peace between the two men, one of whom was so sorely tried, the other so unspeakably exasperating. We affirm such incidents are true to life, in our own experience, though but rarely we have met grand natures whose royalty of soul and spiritual conquest over usual earthly limitations made them invincible when standing for right, protesting against error. Skeptics who know nothing of consecration to high ideals may laugh to scorn the testimony of the ages to the invincible power of right when supremely trusted in, and courageously upheld, as those who know not what real prayer means may revile that potent agent of spiritual strength and consolation, which is an incessant and most faithful source of lasting good to those who employ it; but, despite the mockery of the profane and the cynicism of the contemptuous, in the midst of humanity to-day, spiritual works are putting to shame all the devices of iniquity, and the true spiritual worker, be it ever remembered, may be a strong man, a delicate woman, or a little child. Power belongs not to coarse animal organisms which generate in copious measure what is generally and appropriately termed animal magnetism, — a physical force possessed by beasts as well as men, — but to a force beyond all physical discernment or discovery, the power of the electric spirit of divinity in man; when this is acknowledged and brought into requisition, the mysteries of Christian Science, Mind Healing, etc., etc., will all be made plain, and the excellences of opposing systems be found in the truth that not what a person believes or professes, but what he is, enables him to accomplish whatever good he works for humanity in seemingly mysterious ways. Teaching is always useful;

those who proclaim truth, even if they live it not, are intellectual benefactors of the race, for they are ventilating knowledge, and thereby assisting inquiring minds that need a ministry which appeals to reason; but those who would be practically, personally endowed with healing grace must live continually so as to cultivate the divine and overcome the animal within them. This essential truth runs through all Marie Corelli's writings, entitling her to high rank as a spiritual helper of mankind.

We will now present our readers with some extracts from "The Electric Creed" which the heroine received in manuscript as a gift from Heliobas: —

From all Eternity God, or the Supreme Spirit of Light, existed, and to all Eternity He will continue to exist. This is plainly stated in the New Testament thus: "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth."

He is a Shape of pure Electric Radiance. Those who may be inclined to doubt this may search the Scriptures on which they pin their faith, and they will find that all the visions and appearances of the Deity there chronicled were electric in character.

As a poet forms poems, or a musician melodies, so God formed by a Thought the Vast Central Sphere in which He dwells, and peopled it with the pure creations of His glorious fancy. And why? Because, being pure Light, He is also pure Love; the power or capacity of Love implies the necessity of Loving; the necessity of loving points to the existence of things to be loved — hence the secret of creation. From the ever-working Intelligence of this Divine Love proceeded the Electric Circle of the Universe, from whence are born all worlds.

This truth vaguely dawned upon the ancient poets of Scripture when they wrote: "Darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. And God said, Let there be light. And there was light."

These words apply solely to the creation or production of our own Earth, and in them we read nothing but a simple manifestation of electricity, consisting in a heating passage of rays from the Central Circle to the planet newly propelled forth from it, which caused that planet to produce and multiply the wonders of the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms which we call Nature.

Let us now turn again to the poet-prophets of Scripture: "And God said, Let us make man in our image." The word "our" here implies an instinctive idea that God was never alone. This idea is correct. Love cannot exist in a chaos; and God by the sheer necessity of His Being has forever been surrounded by radiant and immortal Spirits emanating from His own creative glory — beings in whom all beauty and all purity are found. In the images, therefore (only the images), of these Children of Light and of Himself, He made Man — that is, He caused the Earth to be inhabited and dominated by beings composed of Earth's component parts, animal, vegetable, and mineral, giving them their superiority by placing within them His "likeness" in the form of an electric flame or germ of spiritual existence combined with its companion working-force of Will-power.

Like all flames, this electric spark can either be fanned into a fire or it can be allowed to escape into air — it can never be destroyed. It can be fostered and educated till it becomes a living Spiritual Form of absolute beauty — an immortal creature of thought, memory, emotion, and working intelligence. If, on the contrary, it is neglected or forgotten, and its companion Will is drawn by the weight of Earth to work for earthly aims alone, then it escapes and seeks other chances of development in other forms on other planets, while the body it leaves, supported only by physical sustenance drawn from the earth on which it dwells, becomes a mere lump of clay animated by mere animal life solely, full of inward ignorance and corruption and outward incapacity. Of such material are the majority of men composed by their own free will and choice, because they habitually deaden the voice of conscience and refuse to believe in the existence of a spiritual element within and around them.

To resume: the Earth is one of the smallest of planets; and not only this, but, from its position in the Universe, receives a less amount of direct influence from the Electric Circle than other worlds more happily situated. Were men wise enough to accept this fact, they would foster to the utmost the germs of electric sympathy within themselves, in order to form a direct communication, or system of attraction, between this planet and the ever-widening Ring, so that some spiritual benefit might accrue to them thereby. But as the ages roll on, their chances of doing this diminish. The time is swiftly approaching when the invincible Law of Absorption shall extinguish Earth as easily as we blow out the flame of a candle. True, it may be again reproduced, and again thrown out on space; but then it will be in a new and grander form, and will doubtless have more godlike inhabitants. . . .

Christ's death was not a sacrifice; it was simply a means of confidence and communion with the Creator. A sinless Spirit suffered to show us how to suffer; lived on earth to show us how to live; prayed to show us how to pray; died to show us how to die; rose again to impress strongly upon us that there was in truth a life beyond this one, for which He strove to prepare our souls. Finally, by His re-ascension into Heaven He established that much needed electric communication between us and the Central Sphere.

It can be proved from the statements of the New Testament that in Christ was an Embodied Electric Spirit. From first to last His career was attended by electric phenomena, of which eight examples are here quoted; and earnest students of the matter can find many others if they choose to examine for themselves.

1. The appearance of the Star and the Vision of Angels on the night of His birth. The Chaldeans saw His "star in the east," and they came to worship Him. The Chaldeans were always a learned people, and electricity was an advanced science with them. They at once recognized the star to be no new planet, but simply a star-shaped flame flitting through space. They knew what this meant. Observe, too, that they had no doubts upon the point; they came "to worship Him," and provided themselves with gifts to offer to this radiant Guest, the offspring of pure Light. The vision of the angels appearing to the shepherds was simply a joyous band of the Singing Children of the Electric Ring, who out of pure interest and pleasure floated in sight of Earth, drawn thither partly by the already strong attractive influence of the Radiance that was imprisoned there in the form of the Babe of Bethlehem.

2. When Christ was baptized by John the Baptist, "the heavens opened."

3. The sympathetic influence of Christ was so powerful that when He selected His disciples, He had but to speak to them, and at the sound of His voice, though they were engaged in other business, "they left all and followed Him."

4. Christ's body was charged with electricity. Thus he was easily able to heal sick and diseased persons by a touch or a look. The woman who caught at His garment in the crowd was cured of her long-standing ailment; and we see that Christ was aware of His own electric force by the words He used on that occasion: "Who touched Me? For I feel that some virtue is gone out of Me" — which is the exact feeling that a physical electrician experiences at this day after employing his powers on a subject. The raising of Jairus's daughter, of the widow's son at Nain, and of Lazarus, were all accomplished by the same means.

5. The walking on the sea was a purely electric effort, and can be accomplished now by any one who has cultivated sufficient inner force. The sea being full of electric particles will support anybody sufficiently and similarly charged — the two currents combining to procure the necessary equilibrium. Peter, who was able to walk a little way, lost his power directly his will became vanquished by fear — because the sentiment of fear disperses electricity, and being a purely human emotion, does away with spiritual strength for the time.

6. The Death of Christ was attended by electric manifestations — by the darkness over the land during the Crucifixion; the tearing of the temple veil in twain; and the earthquake which finally ensued.

7. The Resurrection was a most powerful display of electric force. It will be remembered that the angel who was found sitting at the entrance of the empty sepulcher "had a countenance like lightning," i.e. like electric flame. It must also be called to mind how the risen Christ addressed Mary Magdalene: "Touch Me not, for I am but newly risen!" Why should she not have touched

Him? Simply because His strength then was the strength of concentrated in-rushing currents of electricity; and to touch Him at that moment would have been for Magdalene instant death by lightning. This effect of embodied electric force has been shadowed forth in the Greek legend of Apollo, whose glory consumed at a breath the mortal who dared to look upon him.

8. The descent of the Holy Ghost, by which term is meant an ever-flowing current of the inspired working Intelligence of the Creator, was purely electric in character: "Suddenly there came a sound from Heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and sat upon each of them." It may here be noted that the natural electric flame is dual or "cloven" in shape.

For those who have once become aware of the existence of the Central Sphere and of the Electric Ring surrounding it, and who are able to realize to the full the gigantic as well as minute work performed by the electric waves around us and within us, there can no longer be any doubt as to all the facts of Christianity, as none of them, viewed by the electric theory, are otherwise than in accordance with the Creator's love and sympathy with even the smallest portion of His creation.

Why then, if Christianity be a Divine Truth, are not all people Christians? As well ask, if music and poetry are good things, why all men are not poets and musicians. Art seeks art; in like manner God seeks God — that is, He seeks portions of His own essence among His creatures. Christ Himself said, "Many are called, but few are chosen"; and it stands to reason that very few souls will succeed in becoming pure enough to enter the Central Sphere without hindrance. Many, on leaving Earth, will be detained in the Purgatory of Air, where thousands of spirits work for ages, watching over others, helping and warning others, and in this unselfish labor succeed in raising themselves, little by little, higher and ever higher, till they at last reach the longed-for goal. It must also be remembered that not only from Earth but from all worlds, released souls seek to attain final happiness in the Central Sphere where God is; so that, however great the number of those that are permitted to proceed thither from this little planet, they can only form, as it were, one drop in a mighty ocean. . . .

Regarding the Electric Theory of Religion, it is curious to observe how the truth of it has again and again been dimly shadowed forth in the prophecies of Art, Science, and Poesy. The old painters who depicted a halo of light round the head of their Virgins and Saints did so out of a correct impulse which they did not hesitate to obey.[1] The astronomers who, after years' study, have been enabled to measure the flames of the burning sun, and to find out that these are from two to four thousand miles high, are nearly arrived at the conclusion that it is a world in a state of conflagration, in which they will be perfectly right. Those who hold that this Earth of ours was once self-luminous are also right; for it was indeed so when first projected from the Electric Ring. All art, all prophecy, all poesy, should therefore be accepted eagerly and studied earnestly, for in them we find electric inspiration, out of which we are able to draw lessons for our guidance hereafter. The great point that scientists and artists have hitherto failed to discover is the existence of the Central Sphere and its Surrounding Electric Circle. Once realize these two great facts, and all the wonders and mysteries of the Universe are perfectly easy of comprehension.

In conclusion, I offer no opinion as to which is Christ's Church, or the Fountain-head of Spirituality in the world. In all Churches errors have intruded through unworthy and hypocritical members. In a crowded congregation of worshipers there may perhaps be only one or two who are free from self-interest and personal vanity. In Sectarianism, for instance, there is no shred of Christianity. Lovers of God and followers of Christ must, in the first place, have perfect Unity; and the bond uniting them must be an electric one of love and faith. No true Christian should be able to hate, despise, or envy the other. . . .

Now I beseech the reader of this manuscript to which I, Heliobas, append my hand and seal, to remember and realize earnestly the following invincible facts: first, that God and His Christ exist; secondly, that while the little paltry affairs of our temporal state are being built up as crazily as a child's house of cards, the huge Central Sphere revolves, and the Electric Ring, strong and indestructible, is ever at its work of production and re-absorption; thirdly, that every thought and word of every habitant on every planet is reflected in lightning language before the Creator's eyes as easily as we receive telegrams; fourthly, that this world is the only spot in the Universe where His existence is actually questioned and doubted. And the general spread of modern positivism, materialism, and atheism, is one of the most terrific and meaning signs of the times. The work of separating the wheat from the chaff is beginning. Those who love and believe in God and Spiritual Beauty are about to be placed on one side; the millions who worship Self are drawing together in vast opposing ranks on the other; and the moment approaches which is prophesied to be "as the lightning that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, and shineth even to the other part." In other words, the fiery whirlpool of the Ring is nearly ready to absorb our planet in its vortex; and out of all who dwell upon its surface, how many shall reach the glorious Central World of God? Of two men working in the same field, shall it not be as Christ foretold — "the one shall be taken and the other left"?

Friend, Pupil, Reader! Whoever thou art, take heed and foster thine own soul! For know that nothing can hinder the Immortal Germ within us from taking the form imposed upon it by our Wills. Through Love and Faith, it can become an Angel, and perform wonders even while in its habitation of clay; through indifference and apathy, it can desert us altogether and forever; through mockery and blasphemous disbelief, it can sink into even a lower form than that of a snake or toad. In our own unfettered hand lies our eternal destiny. Wonderful and terrible responsibility! Who shall dare to say we have no need of prayer? . . .

In making extracts from books we cordially recommend for perusal, we do not, of course, pledge ourselves in the slightest degree to an endorsement of all they contain. Our view of literature is substantially that taken by Matthew Arnold, which is in effect, that it is a good thing to read a great deal so as to get acquainted as much as possible with the best thoughts of the best thinkers which have found their way into literature. This acquaintance the great essayist and critic calls "culture." Now, in reviewing "The Electric Creed" as a whole, or even such portions of it as we have given in this chapter, we might easily question many of the views therein put forward; but as it does not claim to be an infallible document, had we not better leave each reader to consider and criticise it for himself or herself, without attempting to analyze fully all its stupendous claims? As no human mind can possibly form an ultimate idea of Deity, some may reasonably take mild exception to some of the expressions concerning God; but are we not obliged to clothe our best spiritual conceptions in a proximate language, which may be called (again agreeing with Matthew Arnold) not the exact language of science, but the fluid language of poetry?

> "O thou Eternal One whose presence bright
> All space doth occupy, all motion guide," — introduces the expression,

> "Though worthless our conceptions are of Thee," at the very time when he is pouring forth his very soul in an ardent tribute of praise to the Eternal One, concerning whose perfect goodness, as well as absolute being, he entertains no doubt. Let us not, then, permit a spirit of carping criticism to possess us, till we spurn as false or ridiculous that which is after all the best accommodation of truth possible to our weak understanding. How few there are who can afford to dispense with every outward symbol; nearly every one we meet requires something tangible to lay hold upon; the absolute eternal infinite seems too remote to meet the finite needs of those who dwell amid countless limitations, and are themselves far less than infinite. Our experience has taught us, and is daily teaching us more and more decidedly, that those who are first to cry out against a sublime metaphor, or exalted symbol, make unto themselves idols of the crudest type; thus we gladly welcome as a real help to all who seek ennobled views of life, anything and everything that supplants a sordid image with a sublime one.

Madame Blavatsky said many years ago in "Isis Unveiled," that she had gazed on Gustave Doré's wonderful picture of the Trinity, feeling all the while that the awful silent chaos in the background spoke more of the eternal than the three quite ordinary, though exceedingly well executed figures intended to represent Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Does not the litany of the Church of England, which is also the litany of the Episcopal Church in America, address three persons — and one God? Who and what is the one God beyond the three persons, but the nameless ineffable Para-Brahm of Oriental Theosophy?

With reference to the idea of Christ so stoutly maintained in "The Electric Creed," it is one of those great ideas which must ever transcend every attempt at explicit definition. In the exquisite model of divine humanity presented by the Christian evangelists we recognize a faultless type of man: yes, faultless; we reiterate the word despite all the puerile attempts made by the learned and illiterate alike to find flaws in the matchless character of the world's greatest Saviour. The pattern life is perfect, as we should all find out did we attempt to make it the model of our own. We may insult the loftiest ideal of manly purity as much as we will, but ever to our own detriment, for the world to-day is sick, sad, and sinful just to the extent of its departure from the perfect model exhibited in the New Testament. We care nothing for genealogies and other doubtful points, but we will stand for the unanswerable truth that were the exact precepts of Jesus made the foundation of all our conduct, the world would soon become the lovely paradise it never can be till this is the rule of action. Count Tolstoi, the eminent Russian philanthropist, has said none too much, and spoken none too strongly on this subject, and while we do not commit ourselves, by any means, to all his theories of political economy, many of which are no doubt better adapted to Russia than to other countries, we do endorse to the full every word he has written concerning the gospels as containing a rule of life, which, if exactly followed, would redress all wrongs, and bring the entire human family into perfect harmony in all its members.

As it would be quite useless for us to endeavor to review this marvelous electric philosophy in detail without occupying at least a volume, and knowing at the same time that no words of ours can set it forth as fascinatingly as it is proclaimed in the book under review, we will here introduce a few more choice extracts from the "Romance."

The following is a very greatly curtailed account of one of the most striking spiritual experiences we have ever encountered in literature or heard from human lips; the scientific views it advances must be of interest to all who would study the objects of life. Before the heroine's spiritual voyage through space, this conversation takes place between her and Heliobas: —

"I have a few serious things to say to you before you leave me on your celestial journey."

I trembled slightly, but took the chair he pointed out to me — a large easy-chair in which one could recline and sleep.

"Listen," continued Heliobas; "I told you, when you first came here, that whatever I might do to restore you to health, you would have it in your power to repay me amply. You are restored to health; will you give me my reward?"

"I would and will do anything to prove my gratitude to you," I said earnestly. "Only tell me how."

"You are aware," he went on, "of my theories respecting the Electric Spirit or Soul in Man. It is progressive, as I have told you — it begins as a germ — it goes on increasing in power and beauty forever, till it is great and pure enough to enter the last of all worlds — God's world. But there are sometimes hindrances to its progression — obstacles in its path, which cause it to recoil and retire a long way back — so far back occasionally that it has to commence its journey over again. Now, by my earnest researches, I am able to study and watch the progress of my own inner force or soul. So far, all has been well — prayerfully and humbly I may say I believe all has been well. But I foresee an approaching shadow — a difficulty — a danger — which, if it cannot be repelled or passed in some way, threatens to violently push back my advancing spiritual nature, so that, with much grief and pain, I shall have to recommence the work that I had hoped was done. I cannot, with all my best effort, discover what this darkening obstacle is — but you, yes, you" — for I had started up in surprise — "you, when you are lifted up high enough to behold these things, may, being perfectly unselfish in this research, attain to the knowledge of it, and explain it to me when you return. In trying to probe the secret for myself, it is of course purely for my own interest; and nothing clear, nothing satisfactory can be spiritually obtained, in which selfishness has ever so slight a share. You, if indeed I deserve your gratitude for the aid I have given you — you will be able to search out the matter more certainly, being in the position of one soul working for another. Still, I cannot compel you to do this for me — I only ask, will you?"

His entreating and anxious tone touched me keenly; but I was amazed and perplexed, and could not yet realize what strange thing was going to happen to me. But whatever occurred I was resolved to give a ready consent to his request; therefore I said firmly: —

"I will do my best, I promise you. Remember that I do not know, I cannot even guess where I am going, or what strange sensations will overcome me; but if I am permitted to have any recollection of earth at all, I will try to find out what you ask."

Heliobas seemed satisfied, and rising from his chair, unlocked a heavily bound iron safe. From this he took a glass flask of a strange, ever-moving, glittering fluid, the same in appearance as that which Raffaelo Cellini had forbidden me to drink. He then paused and looked searchingly at me.

"Tell me," he said in an authoritative tone, "tell me why you wish to see what to mortals is unseen? What motive have you? What ulterior plan?"

I hesitated. Then I gathered my strength together and answered decisively: —

"I desire to know why this world, this universe, exists; and I also wish to prove, if possible, the truth and necessity of religion. And I think I would give my life, if it were worth anything, to be certain of the truth of Christianity."

Heliobas gazed in my face with a sort of half-pity, half-censure.

"You have a daring aim," he said slowly, "and you are a bold seeker. But shame, repentance, and sorrow await you where you are going, as well as rapture and amazement. 'I would give my life, if it were worth anything.' That utterance has saved you — otherwise to soar into an unexplored wilderness of spheres, weighted by your own doubts and guided solely by your own wild desires, would be a fruitless journey."

I felt abashed as I met his steady scrutinizing eyes.

"Surely it is well to wish to know the reason of things?" I asked, with some timidity.

"The desire of knowledge is a great virtue, certainly," he replied; "it is not truly felt by one in a thousand. Most persons are content to live and die, absorbed in their own petty, commonplace affairs, without troubling themselves as to the reasons of their existence. Yet it is almost better, like these, to wallow in blind ignorance than wantonly to doubt the Creator because He is unseen, or to put a self-opinionated construction on His mysteries because He chooses to vail them from our eyes."

"I do not doubt!" I exclaimed earnestly, "I only want to make sure, and then perhaps I may persuade others."

"You can never compel faith," said Heliobas calmly. "You are going to see wonderful things that no tongue or pen can adequately describe. Well, when you return to earth again, do you suppose you can make people believe the story of your experiences? Never! Be thankful if you are the possessor of a secret joy yourself, and do not attempt to impart it to others, who will only repel and mock you."

"Not even to one other?" I asked hesitatingly.

A warm, kindly smile seemed to illuminate his face as I put this question.

"Yes, to one other — the other half of yourself — you may tell all things," he said. "But now, no more converse. If you are quite ready, drink this."

He held out to me a small tumbler filled with the sparkling, volatile liquid he had poured from the flask. For one moment my courage almost forsook me, and an icy shiver ran through my veins. Then I bethought myself of all my boasted bravery; was it possible that I should fail now at this critical moment? I allowed myself no more time for reflection, but took the glass from his hand and drained its contents to the last drop. It was tasteless, but sparkling and warm on the tongue. Scarcely had I swallowed it, when a curiously light, dizzy sensation overcame me, and the figure of Heliobas standing before me seemed to assume gigantic proportions. I saw his hands extend — his eyes, like lamps of electric flame, burned through and through me — and like a distant echo, I heard the deep vibrating tones of his voice uttering the following words: —

"Azùl! Azùl! Lift up this light and daring spirit unto thyself; be its pioneer upon the path it must pursue; suffer it to float untrammeled through the wide and glorious Continents of Air; give it form and force to alight on any of the vast and beautiful spheres it may desire to behold; and if worthy, permit it to gaze, if only for a brief interval, upon the supreme vision of the First and Last of worlds. By the force thou givest unto me, I free this soul; do thou, Azùl, quickly receive it!"

A dense darkness now grew thickly around me — I lost all power over my limbs — I felt myself being lifted up forcibly and rapidly, up, up, into some illimitable, terrible space of blackness and nothingness. I could not think, move, or cry out — I could only feel that I was rising, rising, steadily, swiftly, breathlessly . . . when suddenly a long quivering flash of radiance, like the fragment of a rainbow, struck dazzlingly across my sight. Darkness? What had I to do with darkness? I knew not the word — I was only conscious of light — light exquisitely pure and brilliant — light through which I stepped as easily as a bird flies in air. Perfectly awake to my sensations, I felt somehow that there was nothing remarkable in them — I seemed to be at home in some familiar element. Delicate hands held mine — a face far lovelier than the loveliest face of woman ever dreamed by poet or painter smiled radiantly at me, and I smiled back again. A voice whispered in strange musical murmurs, such as I well seemed to know and comprehend: —

I obeyed, half reluctantly, and saw as a passing shadow in a glass, or a sort of blurred miniature painting, the room where Heliobas stood, watching some strange imperfect shape, which I seemed faintly to recognize. It looked like a small cast in clay, very badly executed, of the shape I at present wore; but it was incomplete, as though the sculptor had given it up as a failure and gone away, leaving it unfinished.

"Did I dwell in that body?" I mused to myself, as I felt the perfection of my then state of being. "How came I shut in such a prison? How poor a form — how destitute of faculties — how full of infirmities — how limited in capabilities — how narrow in all intelligence — how ignorant — how mean!"

And I turned for relief to the shining companion who held me, and obeying an impulse suddenly imparted, I felt myself floating higher and higher till the last limits of the atmosphere surrounding the Earth were passed, and fields of pure and cloudless ether extended before us. Here we met myriads of creatures like ourselves, all hastening in various directions — all lovely and radiant as a dream of the fairies. Some of these beings were quite tiny and delicate — some of lofty stature and glorious appearance; their forms were human, yet so refined, improved, and perfected, that they were unlike, while so like humanity.

"Askest thou nothing?" whispered the voice beside me.

"Tell me," I answered, "what I must know."

"These spirits that we behold," went on the voice, "are the guardians of all the inhabitants of all the planets. Their labors are those of love and penitence. Their work is to draw other souls to God — to attract them by warnings, by pleading, by praying. They have all worn the garb of mortality themselves, and they teach mortals by their own experience. For these radiant creatures are expiating sins of their own in thus striving to save others — the oftener they succeed the nearer they approach to Heaven. This is what is vaguely understood on your earth as purgatory; the sufferings of spirits who love and long for the presence of their Creator, and who yet are not pure enough to approach Him. Only by serving and saving others can they obtain at last their own joy. Every act of ingratitude and forgetfulness and wickedness committed by a mortal, detains one or another of these patient workers longer away from Heaven — imagine then what a weary while many of them have to wait!"

I made no answer, and we floated on. Higher and higher — higher and higher — till at last my guide, whom I knew to be that being whom Heliobas had called Azùl, bade me pause. We were floating close together in what seemed a sea of translucent light. From this point I could learn something of the mighty workings of the Universe. I gazed upon countless solar systems, that like wheels within wheels revolved with such rapidity that they seemed all one wheel. I saw planets whirl around and around with breathless swiftness, like glittering balls flung through the air — burning comets flared fiercely past like torches of alarm for God's war against Evil — a marvelous procession of indescribable wonders sweeping on forever in circles, grand, huge, and immeasurable. And as I watched the superb pageant, I was not startled or confused — I looked upon it as any one might look on any quiet landscape scene in what we know of Nature. I scarcely could perceive the Earth from whence I had come — so tiny a speck was it — nothing but a mere pin's point in the burning whirl of immensities. I felt, however, perfectly conscious of a superior force in myself to all these enormous forces around me. I knew without needing any explanation that I was formed of an indestructible essence, and that were all these stars and systems suddenly to end in one fell burst of brilliant horror, I should still exist — I should know and remember and feel — should be able to watch the birth of a new Universe, and take my part in its growth and design.

"Remind me why these wonders exist," I said, turning to my guide, and speaking in those dulcet sounds which were like music and yet like speech; "and why amid them all the Earth is believed by its inhabitants to have merited destruction, and yet to have been found worthy of redemption?"

"Thy last question shall be answered first," replied Azùl. "Seest thou yonder planet circled with a ring? It is known to the dwellers on Earth, of whom when in clay thou art one, as Saturn. Descend with me!"

And in a breath of time we floated downward and alighted on a broad and beautiful plain, where flowers of strange shape and color grew in profusion. Here we were met by creatures of lofty stature and dazzling beauty, human in shape, yet angelic in countenance. They knelt to us with reverence and joy, and then passed on to their toil or pleasure, whichever invited them, and I looked to Azùl for explanation.

"To these children of the Creator," said that radiant guide, "is granted the ability to see and to converse with the spirits of the air. They know them and love them, and implore their protection. In this planet sickness and old age are unknown, and death comes as a quiet sleep. The period of existence is about two hundred years, according to the Earth's standard of time; and the process of decay is no more unlovely than the gentle withering of roses. The influence of the electric belt around their world is a bar to pestilence and disease, and scatters health with light. All sciences, arts, and inventions known on Earth are known here, only to greater perfection. The three important differences between the inhabitants of this planet and those who dwell on Earth are these: first, they have no rulers in authority, as each one perfectly governs himself; second, they do not marry, as the law of attraction which draws together any two of opposite sexes, holds them fast in inviolable fidelity; thirdly, there is no creature in all the immensity of this magnificent sphere who has ever doubted, or whoever will doubt, the existence of the Creator."

A thrill of fiery shame seemed to dart through my spiritual being as I heard this, and I made no answer. Some fairy-like little creatures, the children of the Saturnites, as I supposed, here came running towards us and knelt down, reverently clasping their hands in prayer. They then gathered flowers and flung them on that portion of ground where we stood, and gazed at us fearlessly and lovingly, as they might have gazed at some rare bird or butterfly.

Azùl signed to me, and we rose while yet in their sight, and soaring through the radiance of the ring, which was like a sun woven into a circle, we soon left Saturn far behind us, and alighted on Venus. Here seas, mountains, forests, lakes, and meadows were one vast garden, in which the bloom and verdure of all worlds seemed to find a home. Here were realized the dreams of sculptors and painters, in the graceful forms and exquisite faces of the women, and the splendid strength and godlike beauty of the men. A brief glance was sufficient to show me that the moving spring of all the civilization of this radiant planet was the love of Nature and Art united. There were no wars — for there were no different nations. All the inhabitants were like one vast family; they worked for one another, and vied with each other in paying homage to those of the loftiest genius among them. They had one supreme Monarch to whom they all rendered glad obedience; and he was a Poet, ready to sacrifice his throne with joy as soon as his people should discover a greater than he. For they all loved not the artist but the Art; and selfishness was a vice unknown. Here, none loved or were wedded save those who had spiritual sympathies, and here too, no creature existed who did not believe in and worship the Creator.

The same state of things existed in Jupiter, the planet we next visited, where everything was performed by electricity. Here, persons living hundreds of miles apart could yet converse together with perfect ease through an electric medium; ships ploughed the seas by electricity; printing, an art of which the dwellers on Earth are so proud, was accomplished by electricity — in fact everything in the way of science, art, and invention known to us was also known in Jupiter, only to greater perfection, because tempered and strengthened by an electric force which never failed. From Jupiter, Azùl guided me to many other fair and splendid worlds — yet none of them were Paradise; all had some slight drawback — some physical or spiritual ailment as it were, which had to be combated with and conquered. All the inhabitants of each star longed for something they had not, — something better, greater, and higher, — and therefore all had discontent. They could not realize their best desires in the state of existence they then were, therefore they all suffered disappointment. They were all compelled to work in some way or another; they were all doomed to die. Yet, unlike the dwellers on Earth, they did not, because their lives were more or less constrained and painful, complain of or deny the goodness of God — on the contrary, they believed in a future state which should be as perfect as their present one was imperfect; and the chief aim and object of all their labors was to become worthy of attaining that final grand result — Eternal Happiness and Peace.

"Readest thou the lesson in these glowing spheres, teeming with life and learning?" murmured Azùl to me, as we soared swiftly on together. "Know that not one smallest world in all the myriad systems circling before thee holds a single human creature who doubts his Maker. Not one! except thine own doomed star! Behold it yonder — sparkling feebly, like a faint flame amid sunshine — how poor a speck it is — how like a scarcely visible point in all the brilliancy of the ever-revolving wheel of Life! Yet there dwell the dwarfs of clay — the men and women who pretend to love while they secretly hate and despise one another. There, wealth is a god, and the greed of gain a virtue. There, genius starves, and heroism dies unrewarded. There, faith is martyred, and unbelief elected sovereign monarch of the people. There, the sublime, unreachable mysteries of the Universe are haggled over by poor finite minds who cannot call their lives their own. There, nation wars against nation, creed against creed, soul against soul. Alas, fated planet! how soon shalt thou be extinct, and thy place shall know thee no more!"

I gazed earnestly at my radiant guide. "If that is true," I said, "why then should we have a legend that God, in the person of one called Christ, came to die for so miserable and mean a race of beings?"

Azùl answered not, but turned her luminous eyes upon me with a sort of wide, dazzling wonder. Some strange impelling force bore me onward, and before I could realize it I was alone. Alone, in a vast area of light through which I floated, serene and conscious of power. A sound falling from a great height reached me; it was first like a grand organ-chord, and then like a voice, trumpet-clear and far-echoing.

"Spirit that searchest for the Unseen," it said, "because I will not that one atom of true worth should perish, unto thee shall be given a vision — unto thee shall be taught a lesson thou dreamest not of. Thou shalt create; thou shalt design and plan; thou shalt be worshiped, and thou shalt destroy! Rest therefore in the light and behold the things that are in the light, for the time cometh when all that seemeth clear and visible now shall be but darkness. And they that love me not shall have no place of abode in that hour!"

The voice ceased. Awed, yet consoled, I listened for it again. There was no more sound. Around me was illimitable light, illimitable silence. But a strange scene unfolded itself swiftly before me — a sort of shifting dream that was a reality, yet so wonderfully unreal — a vision that impressed itself on every portion of my intelligence; a kind of spirit-drama in which I was forced to enact the chief part, and where a mystery that I had deemed impenetrable was made perfectly clear and simple of comprehension.

What follows is somewhat theological in character, and may provoke dissent among many who claim much illumination. We cannot abbreviate it without marring its beauty, and therefore refer the reader to the book itself. After the heroine returns from her wonderful journey, Heliobas addresses her thus: —

"When you have educated your Will to a certain height of electric command, you can at your pleasure see at any time, and see plainly, the spirits who inhabit the air; and also those who, descending to long distances below the Great Circle, come within the range of human electricity, or the attractive matter contained in the Earth's atmosphere. You can converse with them, and they with you. You will also be able, at your desire, to see the parted spirits of dead persons so long as they linger within Earth's radius, which they seldom do, being always anxious to escape from it as soon as possible. Love may sometimes detain them, or remorse; but even these have to yield to the superior longings which possess them the instant they are set free. You will, in your intercourse with your fellow-mortals, be able to discern their motives quickly and unerringly — you will at once discover where you are loved and where you are disliked; and not all the learning and logic of so-called philosophers shall be able to cloud your instinct. You will have a keener appreciation of good and beautiful things — a delightful sense of humor, and invariable cheerfulness; and whatever you do, unless you make some mistake by your own folly, will carry with it its success. And, what is perhaps a greater privilege, you will find that all who are brought into very close contact with you will be beneficially influenced, or the reverse, exactly as you choose to exert your power. I do not think, after what you have seen, you will ever desire to exert a malign influence, knowing that the Creator of your being is all love and forgiveness. At any rate, the greatest force in the universe, electricity, is yours — that is, it has begun to form itself in you — and you have nothing to do but to encourage its growth, just as you would encourage a taste for music or the fine arts. . . .

"Look out yonder," he said, in low and earnest tones; "look at the dark blue veil strewn with stars, through which so lately your daring soul pierced its flight! See how the small Moon hangs like a lamp in Heaven, apparently outshining the myriad worlds around her, that are so much vaster and fairer! How deceptive is the human eye! — nearly as deceptive as the human reason. Tell me — why did you not visit the Moon, or the Sun, in your recent wanderings?"

This question caused me some surprise. It was certainly very strange that I had not thought of doing so. Yet, on pondering the matter in my mind, I remembered that during my aerial journey suns and moons had been no more to me than flowers strewn on a meadow. I now regretted that I had not sought to know something of those two fair luminaries which light and warm our earth.

Heliobas, after watching my face intently, resumed: "You cannot guess the reason of your omission? I will tell you. There is nothing to see in either Sun or Moon. They were both inhabited worlds once; but the dwellers in the Sun have ages ago lived their lives and passed to the Central Sphere. The Sun is nothing now but a burning world, burning rapidly and surely away; or, rather, it is being absorbed back into the Electric Circle from which it originally sprang, to be thrown out again in some new and grander form.

And so with all worlds, suns, and systems, forever and ever. Hundreds of thousands of those brief time-breathings, called years, may pass before this consummation of the Sun; but its destruction is going on now, or rather its absorption — and we, on our cold, small star, warm ourselves, and are glad, in the light of an empty world on fire!"

I listened with awe and interest. "And the Moon?" I asked eagerly.

"The Moon does not exist. What we see is the reflection or the electrograph of what she once was. Atmospherical electricity has imprinted this picture of a long-ago living world upon the heavens, just as Raphael drew his cartoons for the men of to-day to see."

"But," I exclaimed in surprise, "how about the Moon's influence on the tides? and what of eclipses?"

"Not the Moon, but the electric photograph of a once living but now absorbed world, has certainly an influence on the tides. The sea is impregnated with electricity. Just as the Sun will absorb colors, so the electricity in the sea is repelled or attracted by the electric picture of the Moon in Heaven. Because, as a painting is full of color, so is that faithful sketch of a vanished sphere, drawn with a pencil of pure light, full of immense electricity; and to carry the simile further, just as a painting may be said to be formed of various dark and light tints, so the electric portrait of the Moon contains various degrees of electric force, which, coming in contact with the electricity of the Earth's atmosphere, produces different effects on us and on the natural scenes amid which we dwell. As for eclipses — if you slowly pass a round screen between yourself and a blazing fire, you will only see the edges of the fire. In the same way the electrograph of the Moon passes at stated intervals between the Earth and the burning world of the Sun."

"Yet surely," I said, "the telescope has enabled us to see the Moon as a solid globe — we have discerned mountains and valleys on its surface; and then it revolves round us regularly — how do you account for these facts?"

human eye; and, as I told you before, nothing is so easily deceived as our sense of vision, even when assisted by mechanical appliances. The telescope, like the stereoscope, simply enables us to see the portrait of the Moon more clearly; but all the same, the Moon, as a world, does not exist. Her likeness, taken by electricity, may last some thousands of years, and as long as it lasts it must revolve around us, because everything in the universe moves, and moves in a circle. Besides which, this portrait of the Moon being composed of pure electricity, is attracted and forced to follow the Earth by the compelling influence of the Earth's own electric power. Therefore, till the picture fades, it must attend the Earth like the haunting specter of a dead joy. You cannot understand now why we never see what we imagine to be the other side of the Moon. It simply has no other side, except space. Space is the canvas — the Moon is a sketch. How interested we are when a discovery is made of some rare old painting, of which the subject is a perfectly beautiful woman! It bears no name — perhaps no date — but the face that smiles at us is exquisite — the lips yet pout for kisses — the eyes brim over with love! And we admire it tenderly and reverently — we mark it 'Portrait of a Lady,' and give it an honored place among our art collections. With how much more reverence and tenderness ought we to look up at the 'Portrait of a Fair Lost Sphere,' circling yonder in that dense, ever-moving gallery of wonders, where the hurrying throng of spectators are living and dying worlds!"

I had followed the speaker's words with fascinated attention, but now I said: "Dying, Heliobas? There is no death."

"True!" he answered, with hesitating slowness. "But there is what we call death — transition — and it is always a parting."

"But not for long!" I exclaimed, with all the gladness and eagerness of my lately instructed soul. "As worlds are absorbed into the Electric Circle and again thrown out in new and more glorious forms, so are we absorbed and changed into shapes of perfect beauty, having eyes that are strong and pure enough to look God in the face. The body perishes; but what have we to do with the body — our prison and place of experience — except to rejoice when we shake off its weight forever?"

With these words, "Rejoice when we shake off its weight forever," we conclude our notice of a book which, to our certain knowledge, has done more to instruct and console, ennoble and purify current romantic literature than any other volume with which we are acquainted. "Robert Elsmere" fades into gloom beside it, as Mrs. Humphrey Ward has unhappily cast off the miraculous for no certain kind of spiritual assurance whatever, while Marie Corelli has given pure gold whenever she has removed dross from prevailing religious conceptions. We do not wonder at the numerous letters of grateful thanks she has received from readers in various parts of the world, a few of which form a valuable appendix to the story. Before closing this inordinately long chapter, at the request of many of our correspondents we cite a short incident from one of our own stories, "Onesimus Toole," published as a serial in the Golden Gate of San Francisco, during the spring and early summer of 1889, and now issued as a separate volume. The main facts related in that tale came under the writer's personal notice a few years ago, and were vouched for by thoroughly responsible persons, who, however, shunned notoriety, and therefore would not give permission for their real names and residences to be made known.

Paris, strange as it may seem, is a nest of Theosophy, hidden deeply under the veil of outward glamour and frivolity. The bright French capital holds fully as much if not more genuine spirituality than the more sober, but not of necessity more virtuous, British metropolis, which also, to the writer's knowledge, contains very much more of genuine spiritual light than the casual observer is ever led to suppose. Highly developed persons rarely court publicity, and seldom do they offer to give light to those who are not earnestly in search of it. Once in a while some ray of spiritual truth may seemingly go out of its accustomed path to convince some soul who is not looking for light; but such instances are extremly rare, and may be termed exceptions to the general rule, which is expressed exactly in the words so often heard and read, but, alas, so seldom truly applied: "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find." Those who ask in a spirit of vainglorious self-seeking, or who desire only to better their own personal condition for their private enjoyment, need not expect an answer from a very exalted spiritual source when they knock at the portals of the unseen realm; but those who are guided by unselfish desire to bless rather than to be blessed themselves have a right to expect that according to their faith it shall be unto them. This law is inexorable and eternal, and is as truly natural as the law disputed by none when applied to earthly things, however much it may be discredited when given a higher application. "Men cannot gather figs of thorns, or grapes of thistles." Would that every seeker after any spiritual gift, or knowledge, could remember and be guided by the assurance that words are comparatively worthless, while motive is everything in our search into the invisible. Then would the teachings and experiences recorded in this chapter be of no rare occurrence among mankind. What follows from "Onesimus Toole" will, we think, be of some service to those who are in search of light on spiritual electric therapeutics.

Professor Montmarte, the pseudonym of a distinguished savant, known to the writer, gave the following explanation of spiritual healing to a pupil and patient, who had been long a sufferer from complicated ailments, and was completely restored under his teaching and treatment.

"Electricity is the unitary manifestation of spirit; only in an electric guise is spirit ever revealed, and while electricity is both the 'savor of life unto life, and of death unto death' in electrical therapeutics, the savant invariably works with the constructive current, if he be true to the irreversible commandment of divine law: 'Resist not evil, but overcome evil with good'; the constructive force, however, is transformed into an agent of destruction when it expels foreign material from the frame, the animalcules, concerning which there is at present so much glib prating, are driven out never to return, their vacant places never to be re-occupied by similar disturbers of the peace, when the element of life enters in as the superlatively strong man to evict one relatively strong, but of necessity comparatively weak when contrasted with the stronger. If you ask me how I explain the modus operandi of regeneration, I can only answer in a brief conversation such as we are now engaged in, that new cells and tissues, all vigorously healthy, being formed, the old decayed cells and tissues are removed.

"I believe, indeed I will add, I know, that mental treatment can be so given as to be all inclusive, but in such cases electricity is the agent employed by spirit in rebuilding the frame, though in many instances, probably in most, quite without the knowledge of the mental therapeutist."

"Excuse my interrupting," broke in Mr. Toole, who had been an eager listener to the Professor's speech, "but are we to conclude once for all, that Jesus and the apostles healed by electrical means, and that what you term human electricity issued from the hem of Christ's garment, reaching and healing the woman who had suffered twelve years from a painful malady which baffled all medical skill, and that the same force entered into the handkerchiefs and aprons, which according to the testimony of the Acts were laid on sick persons, and did this same force extend even to Peter's shadow and permeate the anointing oil recommended by James, when applied by the elders of the primitive church?"

"I answer unreservedly, yes; but I may possibly take a somewhat different view of some of these narratives to the one you doubtless entertain, judging by the style of your interrogations. Now, in the case of the woman first referred to; what did the Great Healer say to her? were not his words on several such occasions, 'Be of good cheer, your faith has made you whole,' or a statement to that effect? Now faith has three distinct elements: first, a sincere disposition toward right; second, confidence in the right perceived; third, open spiritual vision, or unusually keen discernment of right. To say your faith has made you whole is therefore equivalent to the declaration, you owe your restoration to health to your faithfulness of disposition, your confidence in divine truth, and your spiritual perception of what is needful for your welfare. Had I the time and opportunity this evening to explain the 'way of salvation' as I understand it, I am sure I could settle your mind with regard to many mooted theological questions which still embarrass you; I will endeavor, in a very few words, to explain what I understand by salvation.

"The great and holy teacher, Jesus, was in his terrestrial embodiment, a perfect human being, radiating constantly an untainted electric fluid; this absolutely healthy life-essence reached out to all receptive minds, and drew them to him, in whom they found all the assistance they needed to lead them to live a healthy life; but be cautious here, and beware lest you attribute to an emanation from a physical form what originates in the unseen realm of spirit, and only ultimates itself in the perfect human physique. The power exercised by Jesus was a power which delivered from the love of sin; his influence excited an ardent love of righteousness, and led the suppliant for earthly benefit, to seek first the heavenly kingdom of righteousness, following upon the discovery of which earthly blessings could be fully realized. I am not intending to discuss dogmatic theology, which is often a belligerent as well as fruitless theme. I am inviting you to glean from the New Testament practical help for daily use, and thus I emphasize those passages which teach the latent possibilities of every human soul. What think you mean the words so often quoted, 'the works which I do, ye shall do also'? Whoever uttered such a sentence was a true scientist, a genuine teacher of men, one who explained the road along which we must travel if we too would reach the heights he had already scaled. Some persons were not at all benefited by personal association with the Christ; the ever-execrated Judas Iscariot had been as near the person of his Master as the beloved and ever-faithful evangelist John; the people who caused Jesus to marvel at their obstinate incredulity were as near his body, and could have touched his garments as readily as those whom it appears were instantly relieved of their infirmities.

"What constitutes the difference between a receptive and a non-receptive state? You may as well ask wherein a closed window differs from an open one. People open their windows when they wish for light and air; they close and barricade them when they are afraid of sunshine. We need not go far to find analogies in the field of daily experience. I am invited often to the homes of poor, misguided worldlings who offer themselves and children in sacrifice to the moloch of fashion and display. See those unhealthy, wretched women, clad in indecent garments which torture the 'human form divine,' into a hideous caricature of nature; witness the poor, deluded worshipers of the upholsterer's creations, whose sitting-rooms have the odor of tombs, and whose children are penned up in gilded cages, deprived of all the rightful freedom of youth for fear that carpets may be faded or soiled and complexions grow healthy through exposure to the light and air. Were Jesus on earth to-day, many a 'Christian' woman would be insulted and turn indignantly away when she found that tight-lacing, foot-pinching, and complexion-spoiling were not permissible in 'the church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven.'

"We cannot disobey the law of God made manifest throughout the illimitable field of nature, to gratify the serpent of our lowest instincts without paying the penalty. I would offer the sternest rebuke to those pseudo-Christian scientists who teach the outrageous falsehood that we become superior to the effect of all external things by pampering illicit appetites, and then presumptuously denying that anything material can affect us; such travesties of gospel-teaching need to be scorched with the fire of truthful teaching until they wither into ashes. I grant fully that when people live as the Gospel teaches them to live, they cannot be harmed by poisons, serpents, or aught else noxious under other conditions, but the impudent lie which affirms immunity from consequence while error is indulged, is the vilest falsification of the Gospel ever fabricated by 'mortal mind' in its most ignorant degree of degradation. I do not read in gospel or epistle that any one was ever permanently saved from suffering who was not redeemed from the love of error, and what error is so gross, or affection so degrading as that which enslaves the reason in the chains of carnal appetite and frivolous desire for the world's applause, while in the same breath we are told to ignore all things material and all personal concerns, and trust entirely in Infinite Spirit?

"The absence of the jewel consistency, from any crown, will rob that diadem of all abiding luster; I do not wish for a moment to speak disparagingly of 'Christian Science,' but I do see rotten timbers in the vessel now launched upon the waves, bearing that inscription. But with regard to the handkerchiefs, aprons, shadows, and oil to which you have called my attention, I should unhesitatingly pronounce many ancient beliefs decidedly superstitious, and I can readily see how many people in an Oriental country would approach spiritual life through the veil of their preconceived ideas and practices. I do not accredit garments, oils, or shadows with power to heal the sick, but I do know that there is no shadow without some substance to cast it, while wearing apparel is not, in the cases referred to, valued for its own sake, but solely by reason of its connection with an owner or wearer who inspires confidence and esteem; and the very fact of the oil being ceremoniously administered by persons in high standing among the gnostic brethren of the first century, is, to my mind, sufficient proof that these outward things were nothing in themselves, but only serviceable as they enabled very crude and undeveloped intellects to lay hold of a truth whose naked beauty they could not at once discern."

"Still," continued Mr. Toole, "granting all you say, and I most cordially thank you for your exceeding plainness of speech and clearness of doctrine, is there not, after all, something solid in the claim of the animal magnetist, or certainly in that of the psychologist, mesmerist, or electrobiologist to whose instrumentality we undoubtedly owe some cases of complete, and many of partial restoration to health?"

"I do not see," resumed the Professor, "that I need to alter my base, or in the slightest degree vary my position to admit that a healthy state of mind overflows in a torrent of healthy magnetism. I claim always that animal magnetism is not what we should seek for; too often it is most grievously polluted, and is not at all an agreeable or a safe thing to handle when in a tainted condition. I put it to you as a reasonable man, does it seem feasible that an unhealthy body should communicate pure vital force to another frame? Of what character and in what condition are the bulk of magnetic healers and those who employ massage? I do not suggest that they are below the average man or woman, but are they above mediocrity in any direction? Any one can give magnetic treatment, but can any one heal the sick by laying on of hands? Experience answers no! Now, if we allow that many people whose outward methods are defective, accomplish good because of their goodness of heart and sincerity of purpose, I will agree with you that they enjoy a limited amount of success, and in this connection I beg you to note that ninety per cent of those who heal by such methods are Spiritualists and claim to be mediums. Their own theory, then, demolishes belief in what is animal, and lifts the healing gift into a purely psychic realm, where it is made to depend on the intelligent action of incorporeal beings.

"Mrs. Richmond of Chicago, whose inspired addresses I often read with much pleasure, though not by any means friendly to certain phases of the Christian or Mental Science Movement, takes this latter ground and defends it forcibly. Now, as I cannot deal with pluralities such as laws and forces continually without confounding those who come to me for instruction, I bring everything to a point of unity and speak of law and force in the singular. I am often provoked to laughter by the absurd statements of many conceited sciolists who, ignorant of the very first principle, to say nothing of the latest discoveries in chemistry, inform us that because while the ancients spoke of only four elements, earth, air, fire, and water, and modern chemists tell of somewhere between sixty and seventy primates, therefore nature does not proclaim unity; to such unlightened dabblers in science I would say, there is not a chemist of any repute on either side of the Atlantic or Pacific who does not maintain that all primates must be ultimately reducible to one absolute primary. This essential primary, I maintain, is electricity, which in its turn is but the outward garb of pure spirit, itself ever invisible, the unseen cause of all things, known only through its manifestations."

As the conversation had proceeded, Mrs. Kittenscomb had fallen into a profound slumber, from which she awoke suddenly, after about an hour's enjoyment of most perfect and refreshing rest, exclaiming:

"Oh, I see it all now; I have been grieving for the loss of my husband's body, and now I am to blend my efforts with his in enlarging the sphere of his present ministry. To do this, to co-operate in his endeavors, I must forget self, and disembarrass my mind of all concern for material welfare."

Only as we learn to know and prize each other in spirit, can we be healthy, happy, or pure. As we find spiritual life we know there can be no death.

THE CHRIST.

"Pro peccatis suæ gentis
Vidit Jesum in tormentis Et flagellis subditum."

I.

WHAT care we who his parents were, or where
The light of day first beamed on his dear face?
Plainly he stands the foremost of the race;

His truth and purity all men declare.
Philosopher pronouncing words aflame;
Truer than all others from a human tongue,
Deeper in meaning than when priests the same
In tabernacles preached or cloisters sung;
We hail him Christ, who showed the wondrous God,
Yet sought not to describe or limit him.
Free from material thought, conceit or whim:
Content not in the common paths to plod;
Whose wondrous mission stands in contrast bold
With church or creed or teaching new or old.

II.

When we the lessons comprehend, he taught;
So deeply filled with love, so pure, so free
From doubtful meaning, problems we have sought
In vain to solve would have no mystery.
Were they not practical they'd have no worth.
He taught not how to pray so much as learn Man's duty to his brother man on earth;
Man's duty to himself, how to discern:
Made plain the unity of all, with Him
Through whom he raised the dead and made the blind
To see; revivified the weak and palsied limb,
Or stilled to sleep the threatening wave and wind;
E'en as from out the tomb's dark damp confine
The deathless man strode forth, with power divine.

III.

Let it be granted that from lower forms
Of life sprang higher forms, through long, long years,
And others higher still, through wreck and storms,
Hard struggling came, timid and filled with fears,

Until to conscious view came naked men,
Living in caves like beasts, without a thought
But that of comfort for the body, then;
A monkey's ease or wolfish strife their lot.
Surely some future dawn, with whiter light,
Shall beam effulgent forth upon a race
Of men who seek to know all things aright, Controlled not by the senses, time or place;
And in the brilliant splendor of that day
Heaven shall be revealed, o'er earth hold sway.

IV.

Then shall the blinding mists, which hide from view
Real things, be driven by the white sun hence;
God shall be manifest, so real, so true;
Freed from the shocking creed of recompense
For good deeds done in a cheap, trivial way,
Or vengeance for the wrong he knoweth not.
And he shall come so near that those who seek
A blessing from his hand, by night or day,
May need no mediator — all untaught
In litany — not knowing how to speak
In prayer: they may approach him without fear,
Take from his bounteous hand their rightful share,
Which he will not, cannot, from them withhold,
Who seek him meekly, but with wisdom bold.

LECTURE XVI.

THEISM, SPIRITUALISM, AND THEOSOPHY: THEIR ESSENTIAL AGREEMENT AND NECESSARY UNION.

WHAT is the basis of true reform?
Should Spiritualists offer prayer to a Supreme Being?
"The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God."

When we are asked whether Spiritualists should offer prayer to a Supreme Being, we may be allowed to enquire what constitutes a Spiritualist and what is Spiritualism.

We understand that there are only two philosophies which can be said to account in any intelligent or rational way for the universe. The one is Spiritualistic; the other is Materialistic. Either the Spiritual is the cause and the Material is the effect, or the Material is the cause and the Spiritual is the effect.

We all know the position of Materialism: Materialism states that everything is matter; therefore if there is any spirit at all, — and certainly Materialists admit the phenomena of consciousness, — they declare that this consciousness is inseparable from the material form from which it is evolved. By tracing everything back to a germ cell, they endeavor to account for every external phenomenon and for all the consciousness or intelligence displayed through organisms by a process of evolution; and while the theories of evolution put forth by Larmarck in France, by Prof. Alfred Russel Wallace in England, by many notable men in the United States, and many eminent scientists all over the world, may prove this position substantially correct, — at all events reasonable, — yet all such theories of evolution are founded upon nothing unless you grant that there is a power behind all expression which is the cause of such expression.

We have no objection whatever to evolution; we have no conflict whatever with any evolutionist; we do not even deny that one form can be transformed or transmuted into another, but we have never witnessed any process of typal transformation or transmutation, so we do not dogmatically affirm it. You will kindly remember that while a great many very positive statements are put into the mouth of Darwin by people who are not very familiar with his writings, Darwin himself did not make any positive statements whatever as to the transformation of species, but simply inferred it may be that one type is sometimes developed into another. He states a great many things which he puts forth hypothetically; and if Darwin is to be credited with one special virtue more than another, that virtue is extreme cautiousness, unusual carefulness in making a statement.

Alfred Russel Wallace, who should share honor with Darwin as co-discoverer of evolution in England, has declared in many works, and particularly in a very recent one, that the spiritual theory of life is not in any way shaken by the theory of evolution, but that evolution rather helps to sustain it; while Professor Le Conte of the University at Berkeley, and many other eminent men in California, and indeed all over America and the world, take exactly the same position.

Now if people think for a single instant that faith in a Supreme Being is endangered by evolution, they know no more of the subject than a blind man knows of color or a deaf man of sound. Though blind men may be perfectly honest, we refuse to put out our eyes, or even close them, because some people are lamentably short-sighted; and though deaf people may be perfectly sincere, we shall not wear cotton in our ears because they cannot hear. Therefore with all respect for those who take the Materialistic or Atheistic position, we are determined to affirm what we know to be truth, and what we know to be truth is that every research of modern science, worthy of the name, absolutely confirms the position of the true Theist who acknowledges that an infinite intelligence is back of all phenomena.

These words are not idle sentences thrown out on the spur of the moment. We would strongly advise all to read the most recent writings of Alfred Russel Wallace, the wise and eminent Spiritualist, who was honored with a very large audience in Metropolitan Temple, San Francisco, some time ago, when he delivered that remarkable lecture, "If a man die, shall he live again?" printed in the Golden Gate, the Banner of Light, and other papers, and then issued in a pamphlet published by Colby & Rich, 9 Bosworth St., Boston, and Albert Morton, 210 Stockton St., San Francisco.

We would advise all to study the latest writings of Professor Le Conte, and to compare the testimony of various men worthy the name of scientists, and you will find that evolution does not in any sense contradict the essential statement of any Bible. People may argue as much as they please concerning the different interpretations put upon the Pentateuch, and while some think it the result of a divided authorship, and many doubt its genuineness altogether; while some interpret it literally, and others allegorically, and the Swedenborgians contend with Swedenborg that it contains an interior significance which can only be interpreted by those who have the key of correspondence, we shall certainly not ask any one to accept the statements in the opening chapters of Genesis as of a character to convince scientists or explorers in any scientific domain. But you will please remember that the eminent geologist, Dr. Steele, a distinguished author of text-books on all the natural sciences, and many other equally able men, most distinctly affirm that there is nothing whatever in geology which causes any reasonable mind to dispute the general underlying truth of Hebrew Cosmogony. To say that the Bible is absolutely true, in its outward form, at least, or to claim that the accounts of creation in Genesis are exact facts as they stand, would be to claim a great deal more than any intelligent person or genuine scholar would think of claiming in these times. But we must remember that not only one Bible, but all the Bibles of the world (and there are many) point to the same central idea of life, and in that central idea all the greatest, the mightiest, and the wisest minds in every age and country have concurred; all have united in affirming that "the heavens declare the glory of God." That "God geometrizes," as stated by Plato, has been echoed in the mind of every genuine scientist ever since his time.

Science is knowledge, and nothing less. It is not speculation; it is not assertion; it is whatever can be proved, whatever can be demonstrated; and that which can be demonstrated through evolution is that, so far as evolution itself can be demonstrated, it demonstrates the action of an infinite intelligence, which from the earliest start of the most primitive organism involved the thought of perfection ultimately outwrought in the wonderfully complex yet beautifully simple form of perfected humanity.

If we cannot see into the future, we can into the past far enough to realize that not a single creature has walked the earth with aimless tread; that nothing whatever has appeared which has not served some purpose; therefore instead of our being at all fearful that the idea of God will go as people become scientific, we know that a sublime idea of God will come as soon as unscientific people receive some scientific enlightenment. When the idea is presented to the world that God is an all-ruling intelligence, an infinite spirit, you certainly will not be deluded by any foolish statements about a personal God, especially when persons know well that the word person is used in a hundred different ways by a hundred different people; and that the best authors of the day refuse to contest the personal side of the question. Some people say that God is personal; some say that God is impersonal; some say God is super-personal; but modest people are apt to say they really do not know: what you may mean by the word person and what I may mean by that word is somewhat doubtful.

A Supreme Intelligence, an Infinite Being, does not at all imply limited personality; so if any one says to us, "Do you believe in a God with personal limitations?" we answer we do not. "Do you believe God has a localized throne?" We do not, for we cannot possibly conceive of the Eternal Infinite occupying one place and not all space; or manifesting through one form and not through all forms. It may be quite true that science tends in the direction of what may be termed, for want of a better designation, Spiritual Pantheism; but Spiritual Pantheism is the very reverse of Materialism. Spiritual Pantheism is the glorious conception that one infinite intelligence pervades all the universe and that Eternal Law is the expression of Infinite Will. Certainly law is eternal; certainly law is immutable; certainly everything is governed by law; but cannot a child understand if it be stated as a primal postulate that the Divine Being is one and unalterable, and that the Divine Law is the operation of the Divine Mind, that the movement of the Divine Mind must be orderly, consistent, and unvarying, if the mind itself is consistent, orderly, and unvarying?

No idea of law gathered from human legislation can be applied to Divine Law, because man is continually changing; and as man changes, his laws change. There is no law apart from intelligence; there is not a fraction of proof that there is any law in the universe which is not a manifestation of intelligent Will producing order. Every expression of human life tends directly to the conclusion that all law is the expression of will. If we rise from the "known" to the "unknown," calling the ways of men on earth "the known" and whatever lies beyond the sphere of human activity "the unknown," we must conclude concerning eternal law, the law of the universe, that it is on the basic line we have laid down, having discovered WILL to be the sole foundation for an expression of law in the management of human affairs. What is law in America? There is no law without a legislator; there cannot be. In a republic the law changes every time the will of the people changes. In Turkey the law changes when the will of the Sultan changes; in Russia it changes when the will of the Czar changes; but if intelligent people distinctly affirm that God never changes, how can they suppose that the law which is the expression of God's WILL will ever change?

Therefore, admitting, as all intelligent Theists admit, that back of law is an intelligence which is unchanging, universal law being the manifestation of this intelligence, how can the manifestation change if the intelligence does not change? Immutable law is the manifestation of immutable mind. The apostle James was undoubtedly right when he said "God is without variableness, or shadow of alteration"; therefore as the Divine Being is without alteration, a law which is the manifestation of the Divine Being is likewise without alteration. Read the sermons of the Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston, concerning Spiritualism and kindred topics, and you will find when he deals with any theistic problem, he harmonizes perfectly with the most scientific and enlightened thought in all countries; he unhesitatingly affirms that what we call the law of nature, is nothing other than the unvarying habit of the Divine Mind; that what we talk about as law is simply the orderly succession of events. The law of KARMA (a Sanskritic word meaning consequence) signifies nothing more than the regular succession of cause and effect; that whatsoever we sow we shall reap; and it is eternally true, that if we ask for stones we will not get bread; if we ask for serpents we will not get fish. The law is undoubtedly eternally and immutably fixed, but it is only the eternal order in which all events move. If there were no God, everything would be subject to change, to fate, to caprice, to we know not what; and to live forever in a universe governed by a blind, cold, unintelligent law would be a catastrophe instead of a blessing.

For ourselves, we want no Godless Spiritualism; we desire to live in no Godless universe. To live in a universe forever ruled by a blind power which knows neither wisdom nor love, is a prospect so much worse than that held out by Materialists, that we much prefer Materialism, which teaches that we drop wholly out of conscious existence when the physical body dies. Spiritualism only becomes worthy of acceptance, as it is only spiritual and intelligent, when it bases everything upon the rock of Spirit; true Spiritualism through all ages, wherever expressed, is not "Atheism with a ghost." All Spiritualists worthy the name acknowledge a spiritual foundation for all things. Dr. J. R. Buchanan, who is certainly an eminent Spiritualist, declares that life is a spiritual power and cannot be derived except from prior life, and this in a work entitled "Sarcognomy" (science of the flesh), where, from the title, we should scarcely expect to find such a statement, did we not know that a reasoning anthropologist cannot be an atheist. Look where you will in a scientific direction, science affirms God: on this position we are willing to stake all issues; here we have always planted our feet and always shall, for we KNOW that Atheism is radically false.

We maintain that to abolish prayer and to state that invocations are out of place in a Spiritualists' meeting is most absurd, and further, that it implies a spirit of tyranny. We maintain also that it is a positive duty for people who know that prayer is answered, to proclaim their knowledge to the world. We have over and over again been called upon to sustain spiritual positions in opposition to physical speculations, and in all such cases we hold to the metaphysical statement because we have proved it correct. Having proven it, it was utterly impossible for us to be shaken out of it or moved from it in the least; and as we positively know that prayer is efficacious, we affirm that it is what Montgomery terms it, "the soul's sincere desire, uttered or unexpressed." If any one will pray sincerely and in a faithful spirit, he will be able to give the lie to all such statements as "prayer is useless." But though prayer is answered, it is not answered except in harmony with Divine Law, for it is answered through the eternal operation of immutable Law. The Law is stated in the words, If you ask, you receive; if you seek, you find. There is the statement of the Law; the prayer of faith literally does accomplish wonders: but this prayer is not out of harmony with the law of nature; it is indeed as much in accord with it as the growth of any flower, the development of any tree, or the progress of any natural event.

The object of public prayer is to acknowledge publicly that all things are guided by one infinite universal principle of goodness. Persons who set up men of straw and then knock them down are not virtually assailing any position taken by intelligent people, for no intelligent people acknowledge the existence of their men of straw, so easily made and so easily knocked over, as being other than a creation of the fancy of the persons who make them and then demolish them; the gods attacked by infidels are at most individual minds or personal spirits endowed with all human limitations. That there are individual spirits, and that these individual spirits really do answer certain kinds of prayer, there is no doubt in the minds of earnest students of the subject. That the deities of mythology have been more or less historical personages may very well be credited. Persons who are interested in the evolution of this theory concerning the gods and goddesses of Greece and Rome may receive some interesting information, if they will study Donnelly's "Atlantis," and other works which enter into the history of the subject. (James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions," and Alger's "History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," will be found very suggestive.)

Persons speak of their "guides" and "controls" to-day; whether they call them familiar spirits or not, they express the idea that unseen influences walk about with them and are peculiarly interested in their private welfare, sustaining such relations to them as brother or sister, son or daughter, uncle or aunt. While this is not the highest Spiritualism, it leads many a mind to something far beyond it, when properly understood and judiciously employed. Such Spiritualism is of great value as a factor in human progress.

Now, if you remove from your thoughts all limited personal ideas of a deity, who is a great Frenchman, German, or Englishman, you are no longer addressing some individual intelligence greatly interested in the welfare of some particular country, and who has not yet outgrown earthly ideas of patriotism. Spiritualism has never taught that a man is at once emancipated from all errors and limitations by quitting the mortal form, but, rather, the deduction from all Spiritualistic teachings is that we begin in the state beyond the grave just where we left off on this side of it. Many people pray, no doubt, to intelligences who have a particular regard for their own individual welfare, and they ask to be helped forward by such in their business and all private enterprises; such prayer is not addressed to a Supreme Being at all. Now is this kind of prayer desirable? It is not, if it is inconsistent with the idea of universal human brotherhood. A great many people at the time of the Franco-Prussian War prayed, "God bless France," and they meant, God curse Germany; and a great many other people prayed, "God bless Germany," and they meant, God curse France. Is such prayer desirable? Decidedly it is not. It is quite possible to draw to your aid individual intelligences who love one country and hate another; it is quite possible to draw around you a class of influences that will endeavor to build you up on the ruins of somebody else; but you cannot conduct any reform on these grounds, and you will be successful in any reform measure only as you rise to the higher Spiritualism, which is one with pure Theism, as it acknowledges one infinite intelligence which loves all mankind alike.

We have no doubt but your brother may care more for you than he does for any other person's brother; your mother is, very probably, more interested in your welfare than in the welfare of some other woman's child; no doubt you can commune with your particular friends and receive tokens of their identity, and be aided constantly by them; but while all this may be perfectly true, it only constitutes the smaller circle; it is a perpetuation of earthly relationship or of tribal and clannish affection: this may be perfectly well when included in the Divine Circle of universal fraternity, but it is altogether mischievous and misleading when excluded from that Divine Circle.

We have no objection to people communing with their spirit friends and receiving assistance from them, nor have we the least doubt that numbers are guided to-day by individual spirit friends; but when we pray in presence of a public audience, where all states and conditions of men, women, and children may be represented, where there may be delegates from all nations, we should not pray to our aunts, we should not address our invocations to individual spirits who are limited in power and affection; for while they can be communicated with, and can be helpful to us in our individual capacities, they are very likely to have private prejudices and personal feelings much as they had on earth.

Now, if there is to be any true reform, that reform must be conducted on the basis of Theosophy. True Theosophy is Spiritualism, and true Spiritualism is Theosophy. The foundation of Theosophy is the recognition of universal brotherhood; no more, no less. Acknowledge universal brotherhood, and you are a Theosophist in principle, for that is the whole foundation of Theosophy. You may build thereon a structure of gold, silver, and other valuable things, beautiful and useful, or you may build thereon a structure of hay and stubble which will be overturned as soon as the fires of adverse criticism approach it; but the foundation of Theosophy is always universal brotherhood, and universal brotherhood necessitates a recognition of one life principle, one unitary spirit.

Thus, while Spiritualism includes communion with individual minds and all the psychical associations we can possibly conceive of; while it affirms "there is no death," that none are dead, but when our friends drop the mortal form, they only vanish from our personal sight, and are just as truly related to us and as near to us, and perhaps nearer and more intimately connected in spirit, than ever before, — while Spiritualism acknowledges all this, the acknowledgment of one Supreme Being is the inclusive acknowledgment of the unity of all life, and is the only foundation for the doctrine of universal brotherhood, which is the basis of all reform, as it is the basis of all reasonable science, religion, and philosophy.

Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, acknowledged in England and elsewhere as one of the most eminent and instructive inspirational speakers who have appeared before the world in advocacy of Modern Spiritualism, states that through her mediumship there have been formulated five great propositions constituting a spiritual creed: the first is the fatherhood of God; the second, the brotherhood of man. Then she goes on to deal very forcibly with individual human responsibility, with a progressive life after death, and with spiritual communication; but the foundation is the parenthood of Deity. Parenthood is an ampler word than fatherhood; as it includes the fatherhood and motherhood of Deity, there is the same difficulty with the word brotherhood, because we acknowledge sisterhood as well as brotherhood, and as we need a term for God which signifies the infinite father and mother, we need an idea of brotherhood which includes sisterhood: in these matters language is at present defective and needs enriching.

But all wording aside, the idea is ever that of parent and child. The due acknowledgment of one Infinite Spirit is the great need of the age, as it is the foundation of all genuine reform. A lower form of spiritual thought is at the base of all theological errors and misrepresentations. Calvin taught that God loved some people and hated others; Calvin's God had some favorites, and some whom he had determined to damn forever.

Calvin's idea, no more than Mohammed's, which takes the same view, can ever be the basis of a universal religion. Many people declare that religion has been the cause of persecution; we say that persecution comes from the acknowledgment that God loves some people and hates others. The acknowledgment that there is one Infinite Spirit who loves every one equally, and that we are all equally participants in the Divine care and recipients of the Divine influx, could never have lighted the fires of Smithfield or brought about the persecution of Catholics in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, or burned witches at Salem in Massachusetts.

If people to-day would acknowledge the one Infinite Spirit, and also use common sense, they would soon find that common sense is quite enough to convince them that persecution is indefensible, and that the acknowledgment of one Infinite Spirit never led to persecution. The worship of a Jewish God, who loved only Jews, led to persecution. Worship of a God who loved one church and not another, led to persecution; but the acknowledgment of one Infinite Spirit, in whose sight all are equal, in whom all live and move and have their being, not only can never lead to persecution, but is the only effectual means of its removal.

If we believe in no Supreme Spirit, but have in place of one Infinite Being any number of finite intelligences who may all exercise their preferences, we retain all the objectionable features of religion and refuse its advantages. All that is unworthy and that leads to persecution and cruelty could be preserved and presented under the name of Spiritualism, but so soon as we acknowledge the absolute oneness of the Infinite, and in consequence thereof the absolute oneness of all human life in the Infinite Being, then we can account for universal law; then we can see why the order of the universe is unchanging; then we can see how it is natural for us all to be good, powerful, wise, and noble; why we should all love one another — love every one and hate no one; why we should mete out to every one the same justice we desire meted out to ourselves.

No matter how widely people may wander from the literal word, if they pray in a spirit of universal love, they will receive an answer of blessing. If one prays that some one may leave him a sum of money, it is very uncertain whether he will get it or not. But if we acknowledge that the Infinite Spirit is equally interested in the welfare of all humanity, we cannot pray to the Supreme Being to dispose the minds of so-and-so to leave us their money, and vainly imagine that we may get it, because God may be fonder of us than of some others. The only intelligent prayer we can offer is, that we may be led so to conduct ourselves as to do the greatest good in our day and generation. We should pray for the universal welfare of mankind, and for our own individual welfare only as it is contributive to the general welfare. Some will ask, "What is the use of offering prayer? It cannot alter God nor change nature." Our answer is, Prayer improves and develops us; prayer is for our benefit; it is not intended to effect any alteration in the Infinite Spirit, or to change the order of nature.

what all can prove for themselves. If you never pray, you do not and cannot know whether prayer is answered or not, for you cannot prove anything rightly except as you yourself deal with it dispassionately; and if you do not pray in the universal spirit, though you may say, "O God," you may be praying, not to the Eternal, but to some limited influence that represents God to your mind.

Spiritualists and all others need to realize that the one Infinite Spirit of life, who is the essential life of all the universe, is the only proper object of adoration. We hear some very foolish and conceited people say that there is no power in the universe greater than themselves. We should advise those people to attack that immutable "law" which they acknowledge, and see whether it will break them or they will break it. All human intelligence evolves power, and power is ever measured by knowledge. The more we know, the more powerful we are; the more our intelligence unfolds, the more control we have over the earth. Behind all phenomena, intelligence is the cause of all organization. Organization does not develop without intelligence which fashions organization, and organisms, which are expressions of intelligence, are ever modified and improved as the intelligence expressing through them gains more and more ascendency over the external form.

Now, we should never ask any one to do anything he does not feel he can do conscientiously; and while the word fool is a harsh word though employed in some versions of the Old Testament, we consider it perfectly legitimate to use the text when it appears in its revised form, "The foolish one has said in his heart, There is no God," because it is essentially foolish to say there is no God. Some people make a few scientific statements and directly afterward make a great many unscientific ones, and all are accepted as though they were scientific by people who do not reason or compare; if people would only bear in mind the proper definition of science, which is knowledge, there would be no farther difficulty on this point. "The foolish one has said in his heart, There is no God." The heart is not the intellect; it always stands for the affections: "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are all the issues of life." The heart is the seat of affection, and from affection the will proceeds: the wish, we say, is very often father to the thought. David, or whoever wrote the 14th Psalm, found that those who said in their heart, there is no God, were those who did not wish any God. We do not say that all atheists are insincere, for we have known many atheists (at least persons usually classed under that name) who were as sincere as any people we ever met, but such professed atheists were usually in a state of transitional revolt against hypocrisy, in matters pertaining to religion, of which they had unfortunately seen a great deal.

While it is the foolish one who is ever saying in his heart there is no good, the wise one is always saying in his heart there is infinite good (saying there is good means speaking the word of good). You will find all through the Bible and in all occult writings, that the spoken word is alluded to as bringing everything to pass. The Word which is spoken of in the first chapter of the fourth Gospel is not a personality, but the Divine proceeding influence; the light which enlightens all; the universal light; the universal illumination; the Word made manifest. The Word is the Divine intelligence in man made manifest through man; and when we allude to speaking spiritually, we mean expressing, sending out thought, conveying idea. When we speak, we let our voices flow out with the intention of conveying an idea, and whatsoever we say, whether we repeat words audibly, or simply allow our thoughts to go from our minds with no audible utterance, they always carry with them, wherever they travel, the nature of the thought whence they proceed.

If you are in a loving frame of mind, you may say some things that sound a little unkind, but they will not harm any one; but if you are feeling unpleasantly, and indulge in silent utterances, people who are sensitive feel they have been stabbed as with a dagger, and would very much rather you would show your weapon than conceal it. If you say anything in your heart, whatsoever it may be, and your words of mouth do not harmonize with your thoughts, the words are distinctly not the bearers of tidings which you have outwardly expressed, but are bearers in effect of tidings directly opposite; what appear to be kindly words may be the cruelest of blows; and all mediumistic people feel this keenly. A letter not apparently expressed in kindly language may do great good, being fraught with the invigorating breath of a noble mind, while the most sweetly worded epistle may sting like an adder.

The persons whom the Psalmist alluded to were not in the love of good, and so were endeavoring to persuade themselves there was no good anywhere. On the basis of spiritual science, we must always affirm that all is good. There is the basis of reform. It is ridiculous to tell persons to be good if it is natural for them to be evil. It is natural for a fish to swim in water and for a bird to fly in air: thus it would be insane folly to blame a fish because it cannot fly, or a bird because it cannot swim; but it would be just as unreasonable if persons are naturally bad to expect them to be good. If we base our idea of human nature upon the postulate that people are evil, if we are always telling them that they inherit evil and are by nature totally depraved, it is all in vain that we argue with ourselves, or others, to live lives of righteousness.

What is the good of thundering from the Decalogue — "Thou shalt not steal" — at poor human nature, if it is natural to be dishonest. What is the use of a command, if one feels all the time that persons cannot execute it. Who would be so unreasonable as to expect a person with no voice to sing finely? We must acknowledge that man has the power to obey the Divine Law, or the intention of the Divine Will is rendered inconceivable. Therefore, take as the only basis, that man is good, pure, noble, and just. Spiritual science holds the essence of all reform, and it is indeed time that persons lay aside their old false methods, and endeavor to put the precepts of the Gospel into practice instead of allowing them to appear as impractically theoretical, or else denying them because they do not understand them, owing to a lack of even attempted application.

Take the ground that every one is essentially good; bring up children to feel that they are good by nature; never tell them it is natural to do wrong; believe children good, and put them upon their honor; hold them in thought as good; expect them to be good; before you leave them point out to them the work to fulfill during your absence; do not tell them what not to do, but what to do; give them credit for being capable of fulfilling useful works, and for possessing the disposition to fulfill them.

The basis of all reform is spiritual culture; man is in the image of eternal good (not evil). To recognize good in man is the only way to reform, the only way to thoroughly protect society, as it is the only way to prevent disease — which is a great deal better than curing it; the only way to prevent vice — which is a great deal better than punishing it. Every individual (even "the vilest sinner upon the face of the earth") should be held as not only capable of good, but as desirous of doing good. For this reason, we can most conscientiously endorse the efforts of the Nationalists who are establishing clubs all over the country, using Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward" as a text-book, because Mr. Bellamy, in that thoroughly practical story, points out that the only way of abolishing the competitive system and of developing an intelligent system of co-operation, is not by incendiarism, anarchy, or any form of aggression or onslaught, but through an appeal to the divinity in human nature. If we want to make people good in action, we must acknowledge that they are good at the core, though they may need to be assisted in doing good; but instead of that, society insists that they are evil. San Francisco has an "Industrial School" which the Evening Report of that city denounced, because the influences and associations in that school are neither reformatory nor industrial; for, instead of teaching weak youth to live nobly, they surround undeveloped children, prone to error, with the very vicious influences they should be shielded from, and then people wonder why they are worse when they are turned out of the institution than they were when they went in. If you cultivate weeds, and do all in your power to bring them to perfection, you need not be astonished if they grow very luxuriantly, and you need not say the soil is bad because it bears nothing but weeds. If you have been cultivating weeds by mistake, thinking that a weed in its germ is a flower when you cannot tell the difference in its earlier growth, even though you do this in ignorance, you will get a crop of weeds. Now, we do not say that hospitals, houses of correction, penitentiaries, and industrial schools have not had for their object the protection of society, — the popular feeling is in the direction of trying to protect society, — but we do say that the present course is an entirely mistaken one. Sinners need to be associated with saints, and it is only a saint who can very safely associate with sinners. Instead of sinners being put with sinners and saints with saints, let the saints go among the sinners and reform them, and let the sinners go among the saints and get reformed. If sinners are led to know that they are capable of a better life, and that there is a better way open for them, they will only be too glad, with better associations than those of old, to take the upward instead of the downward grade.

A great many people divide society into two parts or sections, as though some people were all divine and others all diabolical; but those who mingle with mankind at large find the worst and the best specimens of human nature equally among millionaires and among people who have not a dollar to their name. Some people wretchedly poor are the noblest and purest one can meet; others are as degraded as they can well be. We do not denounce capitalists, but we do denounce selfishness; we do not denounce any class of people and say that all the black sheep are in one fold, for in every fold there are black sheep and white sheep; but all black sheep can be made to shed their wool, and, if properly fed, new wool will grow out white.

When we work to develop good, we develop as a result a new shell or skin, and having no use for the old, we let it go; it will cast itself aside. All good writers on phrenology declare that there can be no reform except through the stimulation of the faculties we wish to see developed. Man is good at the core. Human nature is naturally good; goodness is natural to all mankind. Deep below all débris of error, below all incrustations of folly and vice, there is divinity in every human soul; acknowledge it, speak to it, and it will respond.

LECTURE XVII.

THE ATTITUDE OF THEOSOPHY TOWARD SPIRITUALISM AND ALL THE GREAT RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD.

Do Theosophists admit communion with the spirit world? is a question which troubles many and occasions much controversy.

There is in many quarters a decided misapprehension as to what Theosophy really teaches on this point. Theosophy does not approve of "business mediumship," but neither do many earnest and ardent Spiritualists, of whom may be mentioned Professor Kiddle of New York. Communion with the spirit world for mundane advantage is attended with grave risks and dangers. Theosophists hold that passive mediumship should be superseded by spiritual illumination, which is certainly very different from automatic mediumship. Mediumistic power is not necessarily associated with intellectual vigor or moral excellence; it is often nothing more than mesmeric sensitiveness, the medium serving as a thermometer to register the condition of the passing hour. We must advance higher and cultivate genuine spiritual gifts. If we cultivate our spiritual nature, we cannot help seeing into the spiritual world and enjoying spiritual revelation. When any one drags mediumship down to the level of a money-making business, or abuses it to gratify idle curiosity, such communion with the invisible world is invariably detrimental to all concerned. Theosophy urges such Spiritualists as do thus to look higher, and all the best writers on Spiritualism teach the same. We must make an effort to cultivate and spiritualize ourselves instead of seeking to bring the spirit world down to earth and materializing it. While our own mental development is confined to a sensuous, phenomenal plane, we are subject to dangers and mistakes of every description. We do not intend to advocate Materialism with another name. The more fully a spirit is delivered from earthly affections and interest in earthly affairs, the more that spirit is satisfied to live in a purely spiritual state of being, holding communion through spiritual affinity with man's higher spiritual principle rather than through physical phenomena. We know of widows who have no desire for sensuous communication with departed husbands, for they tell us when they enjoy an unbroken night's sleep they feel themselves with their loved ones in a boundless spiritual world. They cannot fully remember the superior state when in mortal consciousness, but they feel on waking that they have only just returned from a visit to husband and children; they sometimes hear themselves saying "good-bye" to their spiritual associates on waking. This is true spiritual communion and permits of no deception and no intermission; nothing can break this union, — no, not any number of terrestrial embodiments. Theosophy is a high phase of Spiritualism, and there is no contradiction or discrepancy between the two. When we see only a little of Theosophy, it may appear to us hostile to Spiritualism, but when we study it more thoroughly we see no conflict whatever. Spiritualism should mean communion with the spirit world through the unfoldment of our spiritual nature. An ordinary mistaken idea of mediumship is that for all information and guidance in mundane affairs we are abjectly dependent on extraneous intelligences. Theosophy claims that we can all develop independent clairvoyance and psychometric power to some degree, — not in all instances equally, however. We shall not want another spirit to show us the spiritual world when we have the use of our spiritual eyes, which comes with the development of our sixth sense. We endorse mediumistic power as supplementary, but not as substitutionary. Rightly understood it means voluntary spiritual co-operation, not arbitrary coercive control over one mind by another. Mediums should live what they are inspired to teach. True Theosophy acknowledges that we can receive much from the spirit world that we can obtain in no other way, but we must cultivate ourselves to do so. We are living to-day as spiritual beings in a spiritual world; and while with our physical eyes we behold matter, with our inward eyes we can look upon an interior universe. Concerning the "astral" world, the astral interpenetrates the physical. If we see a dog's footprint on the floor, it is not necessary that we see a dog enter or leave a room to know that a dog has been there. On seeing a human footprint we can judge about how large the person is who made it. Similarly on the astral atmosphere, every thought makes its impression; our thoughts and desires all leave prints on the astral "sands of time." A seer can see these thought-impressions as with our physical eyes we can track foot-prints across the snow. A clairvoyant is merely one who can look on the astral atmosphere and see what is reflected there. All material forms are results of astral vibrations, which in their turn are due to spiritual vibrations; spirit is force and life per se. In a descending chromatic scale nature slides down in man from atma to spiritual soul, from spiritual soul to intellectual soul, thence to astral body, and from astral body to material body; the astral realm is intermediary between the spiritual and the physical. Both Spiritualists and Theosophists have grasped the fact that the "disembodied" can commune with man and produce all kinds of psychic phenomena. The trained occultist can command a table to move, and it will move in obedience to his will. People often attribute wonderful powers and much wisdom to "spirits" which they in large measure possess in themselves. We need to discover the psychical powers embodied in us, and we must not imagine that death will give us anything, neither will it deprive us of anything really ours. The odic (all-pervading) force in the universe we can all discover and understand; it is not unknowable. We have not yet discovered anything like all the power we possess to produce psychic phenomena; but there is a great difference between the conscious illumination of the adept and the unconscious passivity of the medium; the latter is certainly the lower condition. If through passivity we receive spiritual tidings, and a message cannot be verified, we have to take another's word for its verity, and though the words may be beautiful and helpful in some instances, they may not be all true; but when we have developed our own psychic powers there can be no room for doubt, because though still in the body, we can look into and travel in the spirit world. If we could only remember the astral excursions we often make in our nocturnal rambles, we should learn that every time we are sound asleep we visit our "spirit home"; we travel in our astral body here, there, and everywhere. One who has developed his higher principle can consciously pass the external barrier and roam at will in the astral world. When we are in a condition of spiritual receptivity, we hear from our spirit friends as we now hear from one another on earth, and we can see them as plainly as we see each other's bodies; tidings of them are then no longer hypothetical. Let us add to our belief faith, and to our faith spiritual knowledge; then we shall in our relations with "departed" friends know nothing of even a thin veil between us.

Our opinion of spiritualistic phenomena is that phenomena when genuine are often unsatisfactory and ambiguous. Human conditions are such that the astral light in which clairvoyants see is usually so perturbed that they cannot see clearly, and so get only a confused vision of one's surroundings. Societies for spiritual culture and the unfoldment of psychic powers should be formed in private homes; promiscuous developing circles are not desirable. A large percentage of the entire human family can develop psychic power to a wonderful degree. Let every one allow his spiritual nature full scope, put away all prejudice, and invite the soul to declare itself. We do not repudiate mediumistic phenomena, but desire to develop mediumship to the plane of a high order of intelligence. The astral world is as full of cemeteries as the earth is; for as the spirit passes to a higher life, the astral body is left behind in the astral sphere, as the physical body is left behind in this sphere, where it gradually disintegrates as the higher principle recedes entirely from it. All physical vital force emanates from the astral body; the astral body can suffer the amputation of its members, but the spiritual body is always intact. Our higher spiritual principle is in the spirit world always. Phenomena are only valuable when demonstrative of truth. Theosophy is intended to bring people into higher relation with those spiritual forces of the universe that exist within ourselves as well as all around us. "The proper study of mankind is man." Theosophy aims at the elevation of man to a spiritual plane of consciousness and love while here on earth. Unlimited progress hereafter is assured for every spirit.

All the elements are peopled with spirits; there is nothing without its spirit; to use kabbalistic terms, no fire without its presiding Salamanders, no water without its Undines, no earth without Gnomes, or air without Sylphs. Man contains these four elements within himself. The salamanders correspond to his affections, the undines to his reason, the sylphs to his imagination, and the gnomes to his animal passions. If men gratify their lower instincts they attract these lower forces, and herein lies the true philosophy of ghosts and apparitions. The miser has united himself with the spirits of earth; for by the worship of gold in thought, and perpetual striving for wealth, we come under the dominion of the elementary forces of the plane invoked. If we live in thought on the animal plane, we cannot absorb or respond to spiritual truth. What do we know of life immortal when we keep the spiritual in the background and the physical in the ascendant? Were such a one to pass out of the physical form, he would be entirely out of his sphere, and would find himself in a state he could not enjoy were he miraculously translated to heaven. Theosophy points out two paths, as Jesus showed them, — the broad way with many travelers, and the narrow way with but few going along it. Jesus was undoubtedly a prince among Theosophists. Occult records inform us, that between the ages of twelve and thirty, he traveled extensively, visiting in Egypt, Persia, India, etc., the most powerful lodges on earth, as one of their greatest and most glorious teachers. Christians accept Jesus, and blindly reject Gautama; but no comparison need be instituted between the two, as their teachings were exactly the same. If any Christian thinks he would benefit by becoming a Buddhist, he makes a great mistake, for the two religions, Buddhism and Christianity, when esoterically studied, are found identical. The great importance of the Oriental aspect of Theosophy is that it is breaking down the wall of prejudice which has so long existed between the East and the West. Popular Christianity has contended that the poor East could have no gospel unless the West carried it there; the East is reciprocating, and showing the West its meed of truth. The East is, in some respects, more privileged than the West, for during several thousands of years Asia represented the highest development of civilization. In coming epochs the West will be the great center of spiritual activity. Theosophy is not an exotic that belongs to any special clime, but is everywhere an indigenous plant, true religion being the same in every clime and age; but Western minds are somewhat dependent on the East to teach them certain things, as children are dependent on those already educated, in matters concerning which they are as yet ignorant; but every one becomes a teacher in his turn. If Mahatmas, Chelas, and other mystics are your instructors in occult wisdom, they enjoy no prerogative that others do not share, they only help their younger brethren to become educated like themselves; they prepare pupils to interpret universal mysteries, and to use occult power aright. Only a few are willing to go in at the narrow gate, while the many enter the broad gate of fashion. There is no reason why any of us should not some day interpret all mysteries for ourselves, the only hindrance to our doing so is that theosophical study requires of us a kind of life many do not wish to live. How many would take as much time and trouble, or make as many sacrifices to attain spiritual good, as did Kepler, Copernicus, or Galileo, to demonstrate a problem in external nature? and yet all could live a truly happy life, engaged in the acquisition of divine wisdom. All the ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness and paths of peace. Whatever one has to give up is something really not worth having; the pleasures of earth are counterfeit; its gold, though glittering, is mere tinsel; its acquisition never brings solid happiness as it is the outcome of selfishness, which is a vice. Self-culture can be consecrated to the highest ends, selfishness never. Subordinate all love of self to love of neighbor and of God. Work for Truth and for humanity with all your might, — these are the only imperative and universal rules for neophytes.

"Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God," say all the masters. The sight of God means spiritual perception, the discovery of the Divine Being. Man is as invisible as God, in whose image and likeness he is made; the only true man is the invisible man. What is God? There must necessarily be mystery concerning the Divine Indwelling Presence. All we know about God we learn in our higher realm of life; only the higher consciousness of man can realize an Infinite Good Being who rules over all. If every one who doubts the being of God could enter into a state of mind in which he felt absolutely certain that everything was for the best, without a ripple of doubt passing through his mind, would he not actually see God with the eye of the soul, as an all-satisfying, all-consolatory reality, as he felt sure that everything was in the hand of infinite love and wisdom, all vessels safely conducted into port, piloted by a perfectly skillful and loving commander? If trust in supreme goodness were perfect, how our minds would rest, free from misery of every sort. The soul finds perfect peace in realizing God. Intuition in a higher state of existence is developed as it never is on earth. As our mental horizon widens, our reason confirms and comprehends what our intuition apprehends first. When we find God in ourselves we shall be satisfied. When we have positively found our own soul, we have found God; but knowledge of the soul comes only through spiritual influx. In spite of all materialistic negations, there is more proof of the soul's immortality than there is of any demonstrated scientific fact, as the realization of immortality is far more universal than acquaintance with any physical science.

Theosophy alone can answer the great need of the world, which is that all nations should recognize their brotherhood, which unfortunately they do not, for the most civilized still follow in the track of barbarians, and look upon those from whom they are separated by physical barriers as foreigners; the peace of the world is thus delayed. Nations contend with one another not only for territory and other possessions, but also for intellectual differences and divers theologies; these struggles are not confined to earth's inhabitants alone, but, as St. Paul said, we do not only war with flesh and blood, but with invisible principalities and powers, with unseen hosts. Christianity has long outgrown its primitive recognition of a variety of unseen influences continually attendant upon individuals and nations, but according to all ancient theologies every one has personal attending influences, as well as household "lares et penates"; every form in nature has also its representative in the unseen world, and every nation its presiding divinity. Jehovah, in the narrow sense, was not the God of the world, but exclusively the God of Israel, as Zeus was the God of the Greeks, and under the name

Jupiter, of the Romans also; all primitive nations had their spiritual hierarchs devoted to their special cause; and to them the people offered oblations in their sanctuaries, that these unseen powers might fight their battles; their ideas were always of gods and lords many. All early religions were forms of Spiritualism, as they all recognized spirits around them, some higher, some lower, who could serve and bless them. The Semitic races had, however, a glorious conception of an Infinite in-dwelling as well as over-ruling Spirit, who found his dwelling-place in the hearts and minds of humanity, while the Aryan races made much of spiritual communion. The peculiar trait of all Semitic people was their turning to the still small Voice of God within. The Chaldean religion blended both the Aryan and Semitic characteristics, as it recognized individual spiritual communion between finite intelligences and also the voice of God in the soul; this dual conception is everywhere prevalent to-day. If any one seeks for divine wisdom, he must recognize God as dwelling in humanity. There can be no universal prosperity till all nations unite in harmony. Theosophy is a moral, ethical, humanitarian movement; as soon as we feel that we are one in spirit, we shall know that all men are brothers; we cannot then behave any longer as if we were not all children of one God. Ethical culture and moral reform will build the structure of universal freedom; and the present theosophical movement in the minds of men is the sure and certain harbinger of this glorious consummation.

We can hardly think of a very sensuous person as highly intellectual; or if so, he is not intellectual in consequence of animality, but in spite of it. The animal impulse does not naturally seek expression in literature or art. The intellectual and moral principles, however, completely harmonize. A person can easily possess at the same time, moral and intellectual nobility, and be simultaneously engaged in benevolence, literature, and art; there can always be a dual expression of the soul, as spirit manifests itself in love and wisdom. The majority have only developed their intellectual principle, and therefore have no conception of the divine, and only a glimmering consciousness of the spiritual. Such have but feeble understanding of Truth; they may cling to creeds, beliefs, and theories, but all opinions when compared with knowledge are as twilight to sunshine; for even when pure and ennobling, they are not demonstrable. When the spiritual principle is developed, through which the divine can shine, we shall no longer need any one to teach us, for we shall then receive unction from the Holy One within. The personified Christ, or Buddha, is one perfectly developed both in his intellectual and moral nature; the highest intellect and purest morality in such a one are jointly unfolded. There is no perfect expression of the soul except in masculine and feminine form; the intellect and moral nature, when perfectly united, constitute true spiritual marriage. Gautama occupied in India the same relation to mankind that Jesus occupied 550 years later in Palestine. Once in about every 600 years, there is a revival of spirituality somewhere on earth; then a greater revival every 2170 years, or thereabouts, as there are twelve dispensations in each grand cycle of nearly 26,000 years. About 600 years after Jesus, Mahomet inaugurated the faith of Islam, one of the greatest religious systems of the world to-day; 600 years later, the Waldenses and others proclaimed a spiritual form of Christianity, and at the present time there are many unmistakable indications of a new spiritual dispensation on earth.

We will here append two short essays on Theosophy from our psychological romance, "Onesimus Toole," serving to show the very slight difference which really exists between Theosophists of the Christian and Buddhistic schools.

This essay was written to enforce the beauty of a Theosophy, which does not require allegiance to the religion of India in any particular manner.

Theosophy is the master-key to eternal life; to the understanding of God and man. True Theosophy concerns itself exclusively with man's spiritual development, with the finding of the Christ within, the Divine Logos or Word of the Eternal. When we find God within, where Jesus and Buddha alike say God resides, we truly realize our divine nature. Genuine Theosophy is to this generation the Christ of truth rising out of the tomb of error; it teaches complete self-control, the crucifixion of the senses, the liberation of the spirit from all carnal passion, the resurrection of all that is divine within us. Theosophy is complete spiritual science. Knowledge of the eternal is the only true science. To know the Christ is to hear the living Word which speaks in us from Infinite Divine Being. When spirit is revealed, henceforth we have no thought of death. The true Theosophist drinks in inspiration from the ever-present spiritual life, the universe thus becomes to him an open book. We must outgrow false ideas of sacerdotalism, and become each one a true priest; our daily sacrifice must be the daily surrender of our lower appetites to our higher promptings.

The principles of Theosophy are love, wisdom, and truth, which reveal to us in measure as we can understand it the absolute purity and perfection of the divine nature. Theosophy is universal truth and universal religion; it is demonstrated spiritual science, and holds the key to all sciences and religions. In Theosophy we behold the essential unity of all religions; Theosophists should study all religions, but dogmatically enforce none. What does religion really mean? Religio signifies to bind together, but does not imply a condition of bondage other than that bondage in which the lower nature is held subject to the higher. This is truly atonement or reconciliation, the perfect harmony of all the elements in human nature. Religion does not consist in belief in immortality, or in God. Belief saves no one for it is merely intellectual assent given to certain dogmas. One can believe in religion and be devilish. The devils, it is said, believe and tremble. We can be so intellectually unfolded as to believe in God without being in the least developed in our truly spiritual nature.

What does resurrection mean in our individual lives? It means a rising from the death of the lower nature to a condition of spiritual triumph. Nothing dies in reality, only in seeming. The seed is not quickened unless it undergoes the appearance of death, and there is no quickening of the spirit unless there is in appearance a death of the lower nature; then from the sepulcher the rock is rolled away, a symbol of our new birth to a knowledge of Truth. Theosophy, like all true religion, is the science of right living, and is in no sense a sacerdotal system. Divine wisdom is the whole world's only religion for the future; a religion which meets every want and fully satisfies every lawful craving of human emotion as well as intellect.

The Divine Being is necessarily beyond the comprehension of the mind of man. Man is not equal to God; there is therefore a mystery attaching to God in the human mind. That which is on our level we may explain, whatever is beyond that level remains unsolved; God alone understands God, as man alone can comprehend man. As Deity is infinitely above us, so Deity is beyond all definition. The soundest metaphysicians never undertake to define Deity. Agnosticism is a confession of honest men whose intellects are unable to solve the problem of being. Theosophists need not conflict with Huxley or Spencer. All divine things are unknowable to the senses, but Theosophy teaches there is a spiritual intuition by which we can arrive at some knowledge of spirit, though to our researches there can be no end. Intellectually we find not God, but energy, power, force. The word God means the All-Good, the Good One, nothing more, nothing less.

Plato's immortal assertion, "God geometrizes," does not imply Plato's acknowledgment of anything more than infinite Mind; no kind, loving God appears in that sentence. Infinite power might be cruel. Many people know nothing of God though they profess to believe in God; but not until they advance beyond belief do they find the Eternal. Belief implies that some school is the custodian of special intelligence from Deity, whose testimony is accepted by the disciples as final authority. The word Testament means something one leaves behind him when he is gone away; while the testator liveth, such documents are of no effect. People who know nothing of God but what they read in the Bible, concerning which venerable book we would indeed utter nothing disrespectful, believe in a God who has left a Testament. Practically it is so to them. Many Christians believe in a God very far from this world and in no direct way concerned with human affairs. There was, they believe, a time when God spoke to the world, but He speaks no longer; God, for them, has finished writing His book, and has delivered the published volume completed into their hands. How utterly incongruous is this mental attitude with the teachings of Jesus: "He hath been with you and shall be in you." It is expedient that I go away, for when I have vanished from your sight the Paraclete will be nearer to you than ever before, and will gradually lead you into all truth. The disciples were directed not to receive truth through any written revelation, but entirely by means of the ever-living presence of the Holy Spirit within them. Theosophy places every individual soul on the solid rock of experienced truth on which Theosophy itself is based. We must build our social temple on the rock of impartial justice, which we can never find until we discover it in ourselves. Enlightenment is a matter of individual spiritual unfoldment; God is Love and Wisdom; absolute Justice is the infinite principle of Life. As we act divinely do we perceive a revelation of divine wisdom in our own lives, and all knowledge of wisdom proceeds from the love of good in us, which is the only divine love. Only when we act from a motive of love directed toward good are our acts truly wise.

Man's best conception of Deity is that God is love. Love is the highest element in the human soul, and is inseparable from charity, which is love in expression.

Henry James (an earnest student of Swedenborg; not the novelist) declares in his admirable work, "Society the Redeemed Form of Man," that in studying the problem of life one comes to see ever more and more distinctly that the only possible cause of creation is that God being pure love he cannot love himself. Love must have an object, and this object is humanity. Creation, then, is the result of the divine love seeking object and expression. By humanity, of course, we do not mean exclusively the inhabitants of this one little planet. We need not tell you that the earth is not the universe. We mean all intelligent inhabitants of all worlds together, which unitedly constitute the form of the divine man or the progeny of God, which is without beginning and without end.

The true hidden wisdom is to be found in our own inmost selves, not in books or scrolls. God's living word is man, who is the highest expression of nature. The hidden wisdom from our own souls must come to us through development of our own inner nature, and can come in no other way. Theosophy does not depend on legend, or our belief in historical personalities, or the truth contained in any sacred books. It rests on its own intrinsic value, and appeals to our moral nature. If Buddha and Jesus never lived, their teachings are no less valuable to man. Precious stones have intrinsic value, and truth is aptly compared to a priceless pearl.

All divine teaching is demonstrated in its hallowing influence exerted on human life. Judge the tree by its fruits. Bring all theories to the touch-stone of expediency. Were we to find that the teachings of the Vedas when lived up to caused war and hatred to vanish from the earth, we should thereby know the source whence these streams sprang to be a fountain of living water, able to slake the spiritual thirst of mankind.

There is nothing in the Vedas that we do not find in the New Testament. The teachings attributed to Buddha and Jesus are identical. We can well dispense with controversy when we drink from inspiration. Whether we look to Gautama or any other historic avatar of India, or to Jesus, the historic light of Palestine, or to Orisses, the legendary messiah of Egypt, we must never forget that neither Orisses, Christ, or Buddha, or what they typify, is dead and buried. In spirit Jesus is working now as actively as when he was on earth. The truth Buddha and Orisses revealed is still operating in the world.

"Why seek ye the living among the dead?" Why watch by a sepulcher, when you can converse with the living spirit on the highways of life? When we liberate our intuition the sun within us sheds around our path its bright beams of appreciable light and heat.

Those who bathe in the sunlight hourly appropriate its rays. Not those who have analyzed the water or tested the depth of the well, but those who drink the water of life reap its benefits. Not our historic knowledge of a revelation of truth, but our assimilation of it profits us. We must eat, drink, and appropriate the living spirit of truth, which is ever active throughout the universe. The past has risen in the present. We must live to-day, not worshipfully regretting days of old. Our present at-one-ment with the living Christ of the spirit can alone bring us into consciousness of Truth. The truths of spirit are not apprehended by the intellect first, but by intuition; later on, reason grapples with inward revelation and defines it. Be guided entirely by your individual intuition; be ever honest and intensely earnest in your search for truth, and you will each one of you discover all it is needful for you to know.

Races of Mahatmas may have spent ages in ferreting out the truths of the universe, but their existence is not positively known to Buddhists. Truth is revealed only to those who are in a condition to appreciate it. There is probably no reluctance on the part of any genuine Mahatmas to reveal themselves, but no one can create eyes in us to see Truth even if it visits us.

When Edwin Arnold revisited India, he held conferences with the Buddhists of Ceylon, and received from them a very complimentary address, eulogizing him as a true interpreter of the Sanskrit philosophy. His work, "The Light of Asia," they endorsed with much affection. Conversing with them of the Mahatmas, he was told that the priests knew nothing of the existence of such people. They could not be found, though they were so famous in Europe and America. At the same time these Buddhists affirmed that there were many teachings in the Sanskrit which, if followed out, would develop men into the state of Mahatmas.

The Buddhists themselves think Arnold's faithful and magnificent portrayal of the career of Buddha has done more than anything else to recall the attention of the Hindu people to a perception of the beauties enshrined in the Buddhistic religion, and it affords a powerful incentive to them to live up to these teachings.

We hear a great deal of Indian degradation, and particularly much of woman's degraded condition there. Now it cannot be disputed that many women in India are in a state of gross degradation, but this condition exists in spite of the teachings of the Sanskrit philosophy (which leads logically to the purest elevation of mankind), not in consequence of their religion. All the vices of Christendom are rebuked in Scripture, and yet tolerated in Christian communities. No charge can be brought against the Buddhist religion for the vices of Asia that cannot be brought against every other religion on earth.

As the religion of India is set forth in its sacred books, it is a religion of the greatest purity and noblest wisdom. No one who compares the ten great religions of the world, the one with the others, will fail to find Buddhism the most humanitarian, and Brahmanism the most metaphysical of all the systems. Buddha taught that nothing and no one can come between us and God.

We are, according to his philosophy, our own high priests, mediators, and intercessors, absolutely free to discover truth for ourselves by following in the path marked out by our own intuition which gives "Thus saith the indwelling Spirit" as final authority. Too many people unfortunately are not contented without some external lord or master to obey; they require some one to do their thinking for them instead of appealing directly to the Lord within their own hearts, so as to receive Truth from the source of all Truth. It is only to awaken spiritual thought and intellectual enquiry that we study Theosophy, not to induce allegiance to some hierarchy of India, for to the Christian world "follow Jesus" is as necessary as "follow Buddha" can be to Orientals.

While an immense amount of floating opinion is at the present time circulating on the subject of Theosophy, there are comparatively but very few persons who have set themselves the task of so simplifying the tenets of Theosophy as to make the main doctrines clearly intelligent to the Western mind. The word Theosophy, which signifies neither more nor less than divine wisdom, is by no means exclusively confined to ancient Hinduism; it is a term properly applicable to all that can legitimately be termed knowledge of the spiritual universe. Theosophy in its modern form is constantly associated with the name of H. P. Blavatsky, because that most industrious Russian lady has done more than any other one individual to ransack the treasure-houses of Eastern scripture, and to bring forth the truth therein contained for the edification of Europeans and Americans.

Most students of Asiatic lore have been either Christian apologists or confirmed skeptics. Their previous training and fixed habit of thought have therefore largely disqualified them for an unprejudiced performance of their task. Madame Blavatsky, on the other hand, has searched the records, not with a view to prove certain foregone propositions, or to discover fraud and folly in the documents under review, but to honestly express the information therein contained. Her latest work, "The Secret Doctrine," amply proves the honesty of her endeavor and the ability she brings to the work. But some of our Christian friends will inquire, Why go to the Vedas for the truths we can find so perfectly revealed in the New Testament? Why speak of Gautama when we have before us the example of Jesus? The answer to such inquiry is twofold. 1st, The New Testament deals almost exclusively with ethics. Its moral code is indeed unsurpassed, but on questions of science it is silent. Now the Hindu records are not simply moral text books, they are scientific treatises, as any one who intelligently peruses them will soon discover. 2d, There is a widespread feeling in Christendom that beyond the pale of Christianity all is heathen darkness. Such a belief renders well nigh impossible any effectual carrying out of the fundamental basis of Theosophy — the universal brotherhood of man.

Theosophy does not require of any one who embraces it a surrender of the Christian religion, so far as its basis in the New Testament is concerned; at the same time it cannot allow that any one book, or any one people, or any one system, can embody all the divine wisdom known upon earth. The Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, teaches the cardinal doctrines of Theosophy without amplifying them very clearly or extendedly. These doctrines certainly include what are commonly called "Karma" and "Reincarnation," teachings which simply need clear and cogent reasoning to make them appear thoroughly rational and scientific, and, above all, consistent with man's highest conception of divine, impartial justice.

The Oriental wisdom religion does not acknowledge any fall of man in the orthodox Christian sense. It teaches the involution of spirit and consequent evolution of matter, and in the exposition of this theory it accounts for all the anomalies visible in the external world by attributing them to the experimental efforts of intelligent spiritual units to make themselves manifest. In consonance with the teachings of the Kabbala and other occult works of olden time, Theosophy teaches that the external universe is an expression of finite intelligences, necessarily limited in power and wisdom, but continually subject to the law of progress. These intelligences begin at the foot of the ladder of expression and work their way diligently but gradually to the top; thus the theory of transmigration is inverted in a manner very favorably regarded by Rev. J. F.

Clarke in his "Ten Great Religions," and many other liberal and learned authors.

Reincarnation is usually ridiculously misunderstood. People who utterly fail to comprehend it talk an unlimited amount of nonsense concerning another spirit usurping the body of a newborn child, and much similar folly, while Theosophy explains how a soul awaiting embodiment introduces itself into earthly expression at the moment of conception by itself breathing the breath of life into the primal germ. In other words, conception is the result of spirit seeking expression through an appropriate material medium.

Karma only means sequence, or the unvarying operation of the law of cause and effect. Our present Karma is the effect of all our past career, remembered or seemingly forgotten. Whatever trials or difficulties we now confront come to us to try us because of our moral, mental, and physical condition being what it is; and it necessarily is what it is at any given moment as a result of our past thinking, speaking, and acting.

The doctrine of Karma is not fatalism, for it does not teach us that all our lives are mapped out for us by the sovereign decree of inexorable fate; it simply declares the universal law which ordains that certain effects must ever proceed from certain causes; thus, while we cannot evade the operation of Karma, we can as we increase in knowledge of the law so frame our conduct, so govern our thoughts and affections, as well as our speech and behavior, as to sow nothing but good seed, and consequently reap nothing but an agreeable harvest.

Nirvana, or the state of supreme blessedness, is a condition in which we know no care and suffer no pain. When we have reached that celestial altitude, we are proof against all that could possibly afflict or disturb us; we are then above the recognition of sin, sickness, and death, and in a state so exalted that for us Karma no longer operates.

Theosophy does not allow that the penalty due to transgression can ever be evaded. To forgive sin is to deliver the mind from the bondage of evil desire. This can be accomplished by purely educational processes.

Spiritual Healing is acknowledged by Theosophy only so far as it can be scientifically demonstrated as a means of awakening the higher consciousness, or appealing to the nobler principle in man, while phenomenal Spiritualism is regarded as a legitimate subject for honest painstaking investigation, with a view to ascertain the true source whence the phenomena proceed. The true Theosophist lays the utmost stress on the culture of the higher self, not on the suppression of the lower instincts so much as on the cultivation of the higher; and on the basis of this conviction it is reasonably claimed the elevation of humanity can be successfully conducted.

Theosophy is religion, but it is not any limited system or view of religion; it is science, but it does not confine itself to any particular department of research. It is, in a word, compendious anthropology; it teaches man to look within, to study his own permanent selfhood, to outgrow dependence on external sources of information and authority, and find within himself the true, perpetual light. Armed with the testimony of the ages, with malice toward none and good will toward all, Theosophy claims as its mission the unification of all human interests, and the establishment of a perfectly natural and yet highly spiritual church of humanity unconfined by party, race, color, or belief.

N.B. — Indebtedness is acknowledged for portions of this chapter to "Short Lessons in Theosophy," compiled by Miss S. C. Clark, a valuable little work handsomely bound in leatherette, price 25 cents, procurable at The Banner of Light bookstore, and wherever theosophical literature is sold. The lessons are in the form of questions and answers, all of which are exceedingly useful for reference, and very acceptable to busy people.

LECTURE XVIII.

THEOSOPHY, SPIRITUALISM, AND CHRISTIANITY.

THE question as to what Spiritualism really is, is one that never seems settled, and it is very doubtful whether it will ever be settled in the minds of the present generation. The word Spiritualism is so much older than the Rochester Knockings, so far antedates 1848, that we find it in the very oldest dictionaries, and whenever we come across words in ancient lexicons we know they must have had distinctive meanings long before what is termed Modern Spiritualism had its birth. Bishop Berkeley was called a Spiritualist as well as a metaphysician, and we know there have been Spiritualists and Materialists from time immemorial; the world of thought on religious questions is necessarily divided into the spiritualistic and materialistic schools. We must either be Spiritualists or Materialists, if we are anything definite; though many occupy a kind of middle position between Spiritualism and Materialism, between Theism and Atheism, and call themselves Freethinkers or Agnostics. Some prefer to call themselves Secularists. By that term they mean that they devote all their time, thought, and energy to this one world while dwelling upon it, and that if there be a future state they will leave it to take care of itself. They declare one world at a time is sufficient, and if there is a future state, say they, we shall all know it sooner or later; it is time enough for us to consider the future world when we are called upon to live in it.

Now such reasoning would be perfectly sound if our knowledge of the future state in no way affected our condition in the life that now is; if, when we laid aside the garments of mortality and passed through the change called death, we were thoroughly remodeled; if, by some subtle process, indescribable and unfathomable, we were transformed into another order of beings with entirely different feelings, desires, and occupations. If the life beyond were altogether remote from our present life and in no way affected by it, such arguments might be perfectly sound, such reasoning faultless. But if we understand — as all spiritual revelation, and indeed common sense and sober reflection must alike teach us — that what we sow at one time we reap at another, that what we do in our present stage of existence affects our condition in the beyond, we know that we live once and always, we are in the spiritual world now and forever; and as the life we shall live is the life we are living, as the life we are now living is the life we have lived, we learn that there is far more truth than imagination, far more prose and stern reality than imaginative poetry in the old word Karma, which only signifies sequence, or that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.

The word Karma is the Sanskrit equivalent of the English word consequence; it means that to-day we prepare for tomorrow, as yesterday we prepared for to-day, as in youth we prepare for middle life, and in middle life, for old age. As our condition on the morrow is the result of our action on the day previous, so on the day after death, on the morrow of our mortal existence, we must reap what we have sown and as we have sown. Thus the passage in Ecclesiastes is literally true (though often misconstrued): "As the tree falls so shall it lie." Its condition is not a fixed or unalterable one, but at that point where the tree falls and in the condition in which it fell must all those transformations commence which eventually will lead to the perfect glorification of the human spirit compared to a tree by an ancient writer.

Now if Spiritualism means anything, it means we are alive now in the spiritual universe; it means we are now spiritual entities, responsible and accountable beings, accountable according to our light, responsible according to our knowledge, gradually making our way by sure, though slow degrees, toward some future goal which is dimly outlined before us, but which none of us can plainly see except it may be in occasional moments of spiritual ecstasy and wonderful exaltation. Once in a while we find ourselves transported to Paul's third heaven, in some extremely lucid condition in which we are lifted above all sublunary things and brought face to face with the sublime realities of the immortal world; but ordinarily the future is dark and dim before us, illumined, indeed, with the bright rays of hope and expectation; but future glories are like mountain tops capped with perpetual clouds that hide the summits from our view. Once in a while the day breaks dispelling the mists and putting the shades to flight, showing us those glorious peaks crowned with perpetual snow and illumined with eternal glory. All the world looks forward to a higher, brighter, and nobler life. Brahmins and Buddhists, equally with Mohammedans, Jews and Christians, expect a brighter home hereafter. Not only the civilized, but the barbarian, not only the Caucasian, but the untutored Indian on the prairie, looks forward to a life beyond more beautiful than this; and though western minds fail to understand the profundity of eastern thought, and failing to interpret the hieroglyphics of ancient Hindustan declare that multitudes look forward to annihilation, having blindly confounded extinction with Nirvana; those who have penetrated into the inner teachings of the seers and sages of the Orient know full well that the Buddhistic term Nirvana is identical with the Christian term Kingdom of Heaven. Christian and Buddhist alike desire not extinction, but to overcome carnality, pride, selfishness, and all such sense of separateness from their brethren as causes one to feel averse to the interests of his fellows, and to erect barriers and partition walls between clans and tribes, parties, sects, and nations. The idea of the ultimate heaven of rest is so sublime, so exquisite in all religions, that a majority of people have contented themselves with skimming the surface of sacred literature, merely dwelling upon those parabolical explanations of spiritual truth which have pleased their childish fancy, as pictures and toys delight children.

There must always be in what is popularly termed Spiritualism a great deal that is decidedly attractive to lovers of sensation: therefore Spiritualism as a distinctive philosophy has always drawn to itself a good many people who spend all their time in hearing or telling some new thing; but while the "craze" is certainly abating, while the search for the wonderful is subsiding, while the sensational has no longer such a hold upon the people as it had some years ago, though Spiritualism is now universally regarded as one of the philosophies of the age, and Spiritualists are looked upon as one of the various branches into which the religious world is divided up, though such eminent men as Alfred Russel Wallace, and many other eminent scientists have espoused the cause of Spiritualism, and put it before the world in a dignified shape, Spiritualism has necessarily within its fold much of that element which people commonly call mystical — so much that all who desire to dream or see visions, who seek to draw aside the curtain, even though but slightly, and peer into the mysteries of the unseen, are more attracted by the words Spiritualism and spirit-communion than by the word religion, or any phrases ordinarily used to signify ethical culture. Spiritualism by its very name draws to itself a large number of people who desire that the romantic or imaginative element in their nature shall be especially ministered to, consequently we find a great many people among Spiritualists who do not care much for sound and sober philosophy, but care immensely for startling phenomena. Many calling themselves Spiritualists do not care to read a learned book or listen to a profound discourse, but if they can see a table move, or tambourine carried round a room by unseen hands, or, best of all, witness a materialization, they are delighted. We do not blame or censure such people; for they are a class who have either been emotionally starved or possess an over-supply of the imaginative element; they have either had their imagination unduly repressed, until it breaks its bonds and bursts forth like the eruption of a volcano long delayed, or they have never paid any attention to the sober side of culture, having fed upon the sweetmeats of sensationalism until their palates are dissatisfied with plainer and more wholesome food. These people who are always seeking for sensation do not investigate, as Professor Wallace did, for the sake of publishing great discoveries to the world; they do not enter the seance room feeling that there are truths to be understood, problems to be solved, and facts to be discovered, by means of which the world can be made better and happier; unfortunately there are many in the present condition of human development continually crying out for more and more of the wonderful, simply because it is wonderful.

Then we find extremists who endeavor to correct this evil by taking away the wonderful altogether, who say all marvels are out of place; that they do more harm than good. Such statements are necessarily one-sided and short-sighted; no philosopher, no true scientist, could ever fall into such an error, for we might as well say because some people talk too much it would be better not to use our vocal organs at all. Such an extreme position is as absurd as the equally extreme position of those who crave more than a normal and natural supply of one particular form of food. Spiritual manifestations in and of themselves are good and valuable; they are, indeed, absolutely necessary; far be it from us to say anything that could be properly construed as derogatory to phenomena, but we do maintain that if Spiritualism is to be a power for good, for genuine usefulness in the world, while phenomena may constitute a basis for philosophy, philosophy must necessarily be brought home to the hearts and minds of the people, and be put in practice, or all the conclusions derived from sensuous observation of facts will be of little more value than the tinkling brass and sounding cymbals of those who have gifts and knowledge but lack charity, the faith which is proved by works of love. Some Spiritualists are prone to worship, others to deride phenomena; those who take an extreme view on one side or the other probably feel themselves entirely dependent upon phenomena or else altogether independent of it. It is positively amusing to read some spiritualistic literature, and listen to the utterance of certain Spiritualists. We hear one party say, "There is no foundation for our philosophy except physical phenomena"; then we hear other persons exclaim, "We want the philosophy and do not care about phenomena at all; indeed, we believe they do more harm than good." Now how can these diametrically opposite statements be reconciled? Are they reconcilable? We maintain they are. Certain people can only drink in knowledge as it is presented to their senses; every grain of truth has to be filtered through the sensuous perceptions before it can reach their intellect; before they can realize anything of spiritual truth, they must taste, touch, smell, see, or hear. It appears that some of the apostles of Jesus

(Thomas especially) were of this class. Thomas was a natural skeptic, by no means a sensual man, but, nevertheless, one who demanded sensuous proof of immortality. He said, therefore, "Unless I touch and see I will not believe." We often hear it said that belief rests upon evidence. How many people exclaim: "I would believe if I could; how I wish I could; the philosophy of Spiritualism is so beautiful; if it is not true, it should be true; it is so consoling; oh, if I only could believe it, but I cannot." We hear such words uttered again and again by thoroughly honest seekers after truth; but some are so constituted they cannot receive light from preaching or reading, but let them witness almost any phenomena of a physical character, the genuineness of which they cannot question, and they will go home rejoicing, declaring they have found a key which has unlocked the very door of heaven; they have discovered the rule by means of which they can solve the most important problem that has ever presented itself for solution to human understanding. Now what is more likely than that such people should eulogize phenomena through the length and breadth of the land, rush into print, and wherever they can, enter into conversation, to proclaim phenomena everything; without phenomenal proof they would have remained in darkness; through it the tears are wiped from their eyes, their doubts are removed, their fears dispelled, they are joyously happy; they straightway conclude all their brethren are like themselves; they think everybody requires exactly the kind of evidence they required and while they honestly believe phenomena to be the universal panacea for every doubt and ailment, certain others as honest as themselves fly to similar phenomena and receive no satisfaction.

Another class of people are so constituted that they must receive everything intellectually. No matter how much phenomena they witness, they cannot accept spiritual truth on the testimony of their senses alone; they must have everything made plain to the intellect. These will incessantly read, question, listen, and think, and it is only through mental deliberations, and delving deeply into the mines of literature that they can possibly receive satisfaction; then when they are satisfied through study, through intellectual research, they proclaim that if you will only circulate literature, deliver lectures, enter into debates, converse fluently with your friends, place before them cogent reasons and sound arguments, you will have the world at the feet of spiritual philosophy.

There are others again who receive truth intuitively; they are not reasoners to any great extent, neither are they great readers; they are neither very studious nor the best of listeners, but keenly alive to everything that touches the moral sense. They are always striving to enter into silent communion with the world of souls; they seek in solitary places a spiritual influx which reaches them independently of all outward ministrations, such as the sound of the human voice, the printed page, or any external sign or symbol; they realize the nearness of the spiritual world only as it secretly touches their inmost nature. These tell you that if you would receive the highest spiritual revelation you must retire from the haunts of men, throw yourself into seclusion, and live a solitary, almost monastic life. The monastery and convent have charms for them, and if Roman Catholicism does not attract them, Buddhism will. They readily imagine in some sacred retreat in the mountains of India, saintly Mahatmas who have solved the most difficult problems of the universe through living lives of abstemiousness and seclusion, and consider that all spiritual gifts are to be cultivated only by means of prayer and fasting, by reining in the lower nature, and thus allowing the higher self to have full sway; only thus, say they, can we really arrive at knowledge of truth.

These latter are often the most interior and spiritual of all, but unfortunately in all pronounced types of mind there is a development of one side only of human nature rather than symmetrical unfoldment of the entire being. Wherever certain exclusive forms of good are over-highly prized, and the harmonious culture of the entire individual not regarded as essential, persons are sure to be more or less erratic, consequently the gospel they preach is good news for some people, but not for all. We are told that when Jesus was born, the angels shouted, "Peace on earth; good will to men"; and declared that glad tidings were to be heralded abroad which should be for all people; then when the Holy Spirit came, on that wondrous feast of Pentecost following the final departure of Jesus from the external form, we are told that illiterate fishermen and other disciples gathered there, who knew only one language, were inspired to speak of the wonderful works of God in so many different tongues, that the vast concourse of nationalities gathered in Jerusalem's fair temple, could all hear the truth in the language to which they were born. Paul, drinking in the spirit of the earliest followers of Jesus, speaks of a diversity of gifts, but one spirit; many forms of administration, yet one Lord over all, one God, one Spirit in all and through all.

If our platform is to be truly universal, spiritual, and humanitarian, we must never restrict ourselves to the advocacy of that which will meet the requirements of just one class of people; we must never desire that only in one tongue the truth shall be spoken; we must never seek to narrow divine revelation to one particular form of presentation; but, having in view the general good to all, whether we individually require phenomena or not, we should remember there are many who do, consequently we should do all in our power to promote it in its genuineness in all its phases, and honor all who are the instruments of presenting it to the world. No matter whether we require argument or not, there are some who can only be convinced by an appeal to the intellect, therefore we should do all in our power to sustain the platform and the press. If we can receive truth without retiring into solitude, we must bear in mind that there are many who cannot hear the voices of heaven when the harsh noises of earth are ringing in their ears, so we should gladly prepare for such a quiet retreat. Some of us may resemble tall forest trees, or conspicuous flowers, appearing in the world in its most noted places, while others may be like lilies of the valley or modest violets hiding in the shade, making sweet the copse and sheltered dell, doing their work in silence and in secrecy, just as effectually as others of us may do ours in the public marts of the world.

True Spiritualism, like Theosophy, is *in*clusive, never *ex*clusive. The Spiritualism that is for Spiritualists only is a Spiritualism we want nothing to do with. We shall never take any part in its advocacy, as we cannot conscientiously sustain it. A Spiritualism that is for all humanity is the only Spiritualism we recognize as genuine. That Spiritualism which is not for the world, not alike for Jew, Gentile, Greek, Roman, and barbarian; which does not speak to the Eastern and Western Hemispheres alike; which cannot recognize the virtues of Plato, Socrates, of the Buddhas, Zoroaster, and Jesus, as well as those of modern workers, is a narrow, exclusive, limited thing, fostering contention and strife, and can never be anything more than a sickly exotic, a poor little pampered plant, reared in a hothouse, its leaves destined soon to wither and fall, while its fruit will never come to perfection. Efforts, tending to wrap Spiritualism up within the folds of sectarian organization, may be the means of adding one more to the countless sects into which the world is now divided, but will never add anything to the great living, progressive, liberal thought of the age. Spiritualism is a universal movement, or it is nothing; it does not belong to any clan, party or sect; there is for the true Spiritualist no Jerusalem, no Mecca upon earth, and no special teacher or leader at its head. True Spiritualism is like leaven hid in all measures of meal of which men partake — it must penetrate the entire mass until the whole is leavened.

Now, let us inquire, What is the relation of Spiritualism, pure and simple, to Christianity? We take particular notice of Christianity because it is the prevailing religion of America and Europe. If we were working in Hindustan, we should particularly consider the relation of Spiritualism to the Buddhistic and Brahmanical faiths; if we were speaking in the Ottoman Empire, we should particularly consider its relation to the Mohammedan religion; but as we are working in countries in which the majority of the people profess the Christian name, and where the so-called Christian religion is the religion of the masses, it specially behooves us to consider the relation of Spiritualism to Christianity.

Should Spiritualists antagonize Christianity? That depends entirely upon what is meant by Christianity. If you mean a hierarchical system, a theological imperialism, an ecclesiasticism which has in the past given birth to the Inquisition, and would re-establish it to-day if it had the power, hostility to such unchristian Christianity is but natural and right; but Unitarians and Universalists bear the Christian name, and nearly all liberal minds in the churches delight in it. Christian Scientists say that Christ is only another name for truth; and surely Paul when writing to the Corinthians entertained the broadest possible idea of the Christ when he said that all honest spiritual workers were members of one body, and that the great body of humanity enlightened by the spirit of truth, constituted the Christ. It is a mere technical quibble with many people who are continually antagonizing Christianity; they are evidently determined to fight something and some one, and therefore often set up a man of straw which they call Christianity, and then proceed to knock it down.

Many people are very fond of heaping ridicule upon everything which bears the Christian name. With all such onslaught and attack we have no sympathy whatever. When people resort to sarcasm and abuse it is usually because they are devoid of understanding, and for lack of argument throw dirt when unable to logically defend their position. Many sciolists, when they cannot argue a question out, throw dust in the eyes of their hearers, and in raising dust think they can cover their ignominious retreat; but no really intelligent person has ever taken any such course. We are living in an age when every one must be allowed the free expression of his sincere and honest convictions without being subjected to abuse for so doing, and any person who calls another a fool because he does not agree with him must be strangely destitute of intelligence himself, or else desirous to be a god before whom the world is to bow down and worship. We are, happily, outgrowing the era of personal and localized divinities; we no longer recognize the authority of self-styled apostles. The time now is when the priestly office is being abandoned, and we are approaching a happier era when every honest man will be both priest and king. As in the future there will be no special laboring class because there will be no idlers, so the time is coming when all will be kings and queens, priests and priestesses, prophets and prophetesses, seers and seeresses, for the happy day approaches when the prediction of olden prophets will be fulfilled and the spirit of truth be poured out upon all mankind, to the end that young and old, male and female, shall alike prophesy, and be enlightened.

We are approaching the glorious time when all the limits of sectarianism must necessarily be removed, and when, as a result, the old stereotyped forms of Christianity must go the way of all transitory things. They were well enough in the days of old when the multitude could neither read nor write, when scribes and readers were idolized, because the scribes and priests were the only educated men in the community; well enough in those old times when most men were little better than slaves and barbarians, whose leaders were obliged to hold them in check with the tightest possible rein to prevent lawlessness and insurrection; but their day is past.

All the good there is in Christendom, all the noble examples of heroism shown by Christian martyrs, would live forever, though the words, Christ, Christian, and Christianity should eventually be dropped out of the world's lexicons. Many have no longer any need for distinctive appellations, but if any have outgrown the Christian name, it is not because Christianity was a system of imposition, but only that something better, higher, and newer is always in store for humanity.

We are frequently informed that many who were formerly outspoken Spiritualists have gone back into Christian churches, and that many have gone into them for the first time because they find there a more lucrative field of labor. You will find in almost every instance that those who have acted thus had respectability and organization on the brain; and, as the churches are perfectly organized and very respectable, they found that organization and respectability could be secured in churches better than in any independent movement. We do not blame them; if they belong in churches let them go there; finding their true level they can best do their work. There is a great deal to be done in and by churches; a great deal of good can be done in them; and instead of harshly criticising those who enter them, we say if they feel better satisfied therein the church is the place for them; then, if they find it uncomfortable, they can get out again. This is a question that must be left to the conscientious decision of the individual; no one has any right to place restrictions upon his brother's or sister's convictions and opinions, or to impute improper motives to another.

If there are any, and common report says there are many, who go into the churches because they think they can do better in a financial sense, then we are sorry for the churches they have entered; for persons whose motives are only selfish are a detriment to the society they enter, while no one can come into the atmosphere of sincere, disinterested workers for humanity without being uplifted in some degree; your nobler feelings will be touched, your loftiest emotions stirred through communion with their thought.

All we say is, be true to your inward light, go where conscience leads you, and all the hosts of heaven will bless you in your undertaking. Bad results and uselessness must always proceed from hypocrisy and false swearing. Let us then attach more and more importance to the cardinal virtues; lēt us look more to the foundations, the essentials of morality; let us strive for spirituality rather than for professed Spiritualism which many use as a convenient term to cover anything.

No honest seeker after truth shall ever hear from us a slighting or insulting word because of his or her church associations. What right have we, what right has any one, to point to any institution and declare it superior to all others, unless it can prove its superiority by the practical good it does in the world? Everything must be tried by the fruit it bears. If any desire to build up Spiritualism they must not find fault the one with the other, or indulge in petty disputes and antagonisms. Spiritualists unfortunately have been their own worst enemies; they have mercilessly attacked each other instead of attacking evil. If they would attack vice and error, if they would preach a glorious, intelligible and affirmative philosophy, and surround mediums with the best conditions for eliciting satisfactory phenomena, Spiritualism would go forward conquering and to conquer, which it can never do if misrepresented by assumed exponents who perpetually indulge in sarcasm, abuse, and ruthless iconoclasm.

Spiritualism is a system of philosophy with accompanying signs and wonders, and as Jesus said concerning his followers, "These signs shall follow those who believe," so that when they went out into the world men might know they were really his disciples, as they healed the sick and cast out devils, which meant that they helped people to overcome their vices; so to-day, if Spiritualists are to be lights of the world and salt of the earth, they can only become so by reviving in our midst those wonderful gifts of the spirit (teaching and healing) which in the olden days brought such honor to the Christian name, and shed so glorious a luster over all the earth wherever the pioneers of Christianity traveled.

Spiritualism, if true to itself, must be brighter and more liberal than all systems beside. The very word Spiritualism embodies the idea of universality. Our theosophical brethren in India are doing better work than any other missionaries because instead of attacking Oriental religions they are seeking to interpret the spirit of the Sanskrit Scriptures to the Hindu youth, revealing to them the buried treasures in the mines of their own literature. A Hindu teacher, Mohini M. Chatterji, whose English translation of the Bhagavad Gîtâ with notes and references to the New Testament should be studied by all students of Theosophy, when in Boston preached in some of the leading Unitarian churches; among others he occupied the pulpit usually occupied by the far-famed Edward Everett Hale, where he declared he saw no difference between esoteric Buddhism and esoteric Christianity; for after he studied the New Testament he found it identical in its spirit with the Hindu Vedas. He said he did not desire either to Christianize Buddhists or to make Buddhists of Christians. Such is the prevailing sentiment of spiritually minded scholars everywhere.

The need of to-day is universal Spiritualism or universal Theosophy; we need to cull flowers from every garden, to take the wise maxims and noble thoughts of ancient and modern poets, seers, and sages, and so bind them together as to forward the highest purposes of life.

It is altogether too late for one party to denounce all others; it is altogether out of date to throw aside the world's Bibles, and say there are no kernels in their shells because people have been long fed on husks and have not yet discovered the kernels.

We have the greatest respect for every honorable man and woman; we admire honesty wherever we find it. All persons who are really noble and sincere live to do good; and, whether on the platform, in the pulpit, or through the press, or by means of work in silent and secret places, their influence goes forth as the sweet perfumes of the choicest flowers; wherever the blossoms are they exhale their fragrance. So every good man and woman, no matter where or who he or she may be, is certain to lift the morals of society to a higher standard. Our work is not to throw the Bibles of the world overboard, nor to denounce the religion of those about us, but to help all, so far as we are able, to see the treasures in their own Scriptures, and understand the great esoteric verities which are shrouded in their systems of theology. Let us, therefore, endeavor to trace all religious faiths and customs to their primal source, gladly accepting all that is good and true, while throwing away the refuse; with unsparing hands break idols wherever they stand in the way of true progress, but ever with the intent of clearing ground for the erection of larger and nobler ideals for humanity.

The parenthood of Deity, the universal brotherhood and sisterhood of humanity, are the two essential planks of the broad platform on which all can safely stand. With love to all and malice toward none, let us build our temples with sky-lights in the roof, so that the light of heaven may shine in fresh every day; let us go out every morning to pick up the manna which has freshly fallen; let us drink from the water of the everflowing spring; let us not desire the ancient or the modern because it is either old or new, nor seek after that which goes under one name or another because of its distinctive appellation, but for truth alone in the spirit of love. Those who ask will find; those who seek will surely win the treasure, and to all who knock upon the door of the temple of divine wisdom an answer will come, an adapted ministration suited to the needs of every suppliant.

LECTURE XIX.

WHY ARE THERE CONTRADICTORY TEACHINGS THROUGH MEDIUMS? — WHAT IS THE TRUE STANDARD OF AUTHORITY?

(Delivered in Metropolitan Temple, San Francisco, March 31, 1889. Published by particular request.)

We have often been particularly requested to say something on the practical value of communications which are said to be received from the spirit-world.

Now it seems to us imperatively necessary that we should take a fair and common-sense position with regard to ancient and modern inspiration and spiritual revelation, so that we may not be led either to blindly indorse whatsoever purports to be of spiritual origin, or to denounce anything without positive knowledge that it is false; we certainly are not justified in proclaiming as evil that which does not at first commend itself to the outer degrees of our understanding, nor are we justified in accepting as truth whatever tickles our fancy or supports our preconceptions.

We have always maintained that a spiritual revelation does not undertake to reveal to mankind anything he can learn as readily from mundane sources; communion with the spirit-world is not properly a substitute for normal education; we must not infer that our true attitude to the spirit-world is an attitude of abject dependence or of servile adoration.

On the other hand, an intelligent view of the endless continuity of individual life, an intelligent view of the position which is now being taken by the most enlightened minds everywhere, viz.: that there is no death, and that when the material form drops away we go on living as we lived before in mind and morals, though ever progressing nearer and nearer to a divine goal of surpassing excellence which beggars all description and is beyond the furthest flight of our imagination — leads us to readily admit that in harmony with divine justice there can be no perfect heaven for one portion of humanity awaiting them the moment they cast aside their material bodies, and no dark and dreadful hell awaiting others immediately they shuffle off this mortal coil; our own reason, our own right feeling, our own intelligent sense of justice tell us that the spiritual world can neither be divided into one, two, nor four departments, and that there is an infinite meaning in the oft-quoted passage of the New Testament: "In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you; if it were not so I would have told you;" and also in the words of another writer in the New Testament, who, when speaking concerning Judas Iscariot, who betrayed his Master, pronounced no condemnation upon him, but merely said: "He went to his own place." "He went to his own place" meant that he went to that particular place whither he was attracted; and without undertaking to say how good or how bad he was, how wise or how foolish, how insincere or how mistaken, the writer allows the imagination and the conscience to fill in all the blanks, and contents himself with saying: "He went to his own place." Those words are true universally of all who depart from the body.

When we remember that in this world if each one were to go to his own place this moment — if all the barriers of distance, land and water, were removed, and we could all go just where we pleased, associating with whomsoever we would, and engaging in any pastime or occupation which pleased us most — even in an audience of a few hundreds, like the assembly gathered here this morning, there might be a few hundred different places selected; and when the millions upon millions of the earth's population are taken into consideration, and we see before our mental vision each going to his own place from all quarters of the globe, how readily we must perceive that the natural result of this must be that the North American Indian will still pursue the chase, even though it be but in imagination and subjectively in his own mind, until he has outgrown the desire to hunt buffalo on the prairie. How naturally we can conclude that the Mussulman, aiming at an extension of the term of physical enjoyment, goes to a state and condition where so-called angels of paradise take the place (ever in a subjective sense) of earthly women; and how readily we can imagine the contemplative Brahmin and the self-denying Buddhist passing gladly away from all material haunts, pains, and pleasures, resting in those calm worlds which lead up at length to the absolute glories of Nirvana, a condition of absolute spiritual blessedness and entire immunity from all physical thought and desire. How readily we can fancy the Greek, with his wonderful love of beauty and symmetry, going into a world where painters, sculptors, and poets have gone, and inspiring those of future generations upon earth to become yet diviner in the execution of their artistic faculties than were the most renowned among artists of old; and how readily we can fancy the politician, the clergyman, the lawyer, the doctor, all going out into a realm of spirit and finding there in the kingdom of mind certain difficulties to adjust, mental ills to cure, mistakes to correct, and moral lessons to learn — and then inspiring mankind as best they can with the wiser laws, deeper truths, and more spiritual facts which they have discovered. How readily we can fancy the soldier, with his war-like impulse, beginning perhaps with those who were engaged in warfare about him, still entertaining the thought that physical strife on earth is yet needful, but at length outgrowing all thought of an outward encounter, and bending all his war-like impulses to fighting with abstract evils and demolishing the very foundations of the citadel of error. How readily we can feel that the men and women of the world — the mere frivolous butterflies of fashion, who seek hither and thither amusement to while away the idle hour, who are by no means vicious, and yet live a life which is better befitting an insect than a rational creature — find for the time being no other enjoyment, no other pursuit or desire in their mind than to roam through the fields of space and play with this and the other joy or beauty which they encounter in their surroundings. We cannot feel that death, which is simply laying the material form aside, can all in a moment transform the character or alter the bent of mental pursuit.

While there may be, and doubtless is, a world of light and loveliness where all are engaged in the worship of God and the service of humanity, in the very highest meaning which we can attach to those phrases; while after ages of progression every human spirit reaches a point where all earthliness is refined away, all mistakes are corrected, and the affections exclusively set upon the highest good — until that glorious consummation arrives, all are growing, constantly advancing, and those who are yet in mortal form and those who have cast it aside are members of one family and one household; they are soldiers in one army, citizens of the same great republic.

Feeling, therefore, that death is not what so many people suppose it to be: the sudden termination of all so-called earthly activity, — regarding death in no sense in the light of an abrupt ending either to mental pursuit or to the desires of the heart, we do not expect in the realm of spirit to come in contact only with infallible oracles, who can inspire the world to the loftiest deeds of heroism or to the accomplishment of the greatest and noblest designs; on the contrary, we expect to have this lesson taught us by constant spiritual communion that "As the tree falls so shall it lie"; that "where the tree falls there shall it lie"; whether it fall to the north or to the south, to the east or to the west; whether it fall in the young beauty of the sapling or in the full-blown splendor of the perfected tree;

whether it fall in a condition of perfect health and vigor, or in any way maimed and imperfect; as it falls so does it lie, for there and in that condition does it begin those transformations, which, going on perhaps forever and forever, can only start from that point where the mind was found at the moment when what is termed death released the spirit and terminated its career on earth.

Many orthodox Christians have so long been accustomed to misinterpret the similes of Scripture, that instead of conforming their interpretation to Nature and allowing the images to speak for themselves, they argue an impossible deduction from a very simple illustration. No one has ever seen a tree remain unchanged year after year and century after century; no one has ever seen a fallen tree lying by the banks of a river, or out in a forest, subject to no change or decay; but, on the other hand, after a while the tree is completely changed in its form; all there was of it has been absorbed into the earth or has evaporated into the air; and while the tree began to change in that place, and its transformations started from that condition wherein it fell, there never was a tree that remained in the condition and in the place where it fell even for a century, to say nothing of forever. The very similes which have been continually employed as arguing against progression in the life beyond, and an infinite diversity in the states and conditions of spirit-life, in reality were intended to signify the very opposite of what commentators and interpreters have argued from them.

In every age of the world the great simple and natural truth has been revealed to man, that the human spirit in the body and the human spirit out of the body are not only near neighbors, but are identical in their amenability to the immutable laws of growth and expansion. We find that every desire or endeavor to make a distinction where none naturally exists, to create a difference where there is none in reality, between the friend on earth and the spirit friend, leads to specious forms of idolatry, sends people forward on ridiculous errands, and lifts them up with the false belief that they are specially great and wonderful instruments of heaven, as other people are not, and often makes them believe that the highest spirits named in some illustrious literature are forever by their side; whereas, spiritual communion in and of itself, divested of all unnatural accretions, means no more than this: that we continue to remain in the family in which we now are; and though we are certain there are many people who are thoroughly sincere, perfectly conscientious in their beliefs, — and we would not say one unkind or harsh word concerning them, or endeavor to take from them any consolation which they receive from their peculiar belief in a certain kind of spiritual communion, — yet we would urge all investigators not to be so much carried away, as they usually are, by grandiloquent utterances, or by great promises and high-sounding names.

It is true that all have a great and holy work to do, all have a mission in life. It is true that no one came into the world by accident; every one has a vocation, and should endeavor to make his calling and election sure; but while it is a great truth that not one of you goes through the world alone, unattended by angel legions, a great cloud of witnesses surround you all, and you all have a niche to fill in the great temple of the universe; while it is perfectly true in the larger sense that you all have some great and holy mission to fulfill, it is not true in the smaller sense that Miss Smith has an important mission in life while Miss Brown has not, one's mission being in no sense so very much greater and more important than another's, even though Mr. Jones may be called by the angel world to do a work for humanity that Mr. White can never accomplish. It is simply universally true that every individual has his own work to do and his own inspiration to follow; but that tendency of the human mind to rejoice in being flattered, that tendency in human fancy to set one's self upon a pedestal, feeling one is called to do something greater and more beautiful than any other person, is a very unhappy and a very unfortunate state in which many persons are found.

What we urge upon all inquirers into Spiritualism, upon all persons who sit for spirit communication or who have mediumistic power, is that they value a communication for its intrinsic worth, and not be forever asking who it is that is communicating and what is the name of the spirit. If you are dealing with personal matters, if you desire to receive a communication from your mother or your child, then the giving of a name is often a necessary test of identity. If you go to a circle and are told that some dear friend of yours has a message for you, and the medium is a perfect stranger — no matter whether the word is spoken or written, whether it comes between closed slates or on a ballot, or is uttered through the lips — a name is sometimes a great test of spiritual presence, one which is very satisfactory and helpful to you, as it constitutes a link which binds you in a peculiarly near and affectionate manner to the spiritual world. We do not say you should not rejoice in getting the names of your friends given to you through strangers when you are studying psychological laws and endeavoring to obtain intelligent spirit communication; but what we do say is this: You did not enjoy personal acquaintance on earth with Jesus Christ and the Apostles; you were not personally acquainted with Solomon, Moses, Elijah, Confucius, nor with any of those wonderful people who are mentioned so much in spiritual communications, consequently the fact of such names as those being given is no test of spirit identity; it does not proclaim in any special way that the friendships of earth are continued in the life beyond, and there is no added proof of genuineness attached to a communication because it bears any such signature. Consequently we are always pleased when ideas are put forward first; let the question of whom they come from be inquired into later on, if at all.

We will make no concession whatever to theological or any other kind of bigotry, to those who would be ashamed to own a truth because they thought it was unpopular, nor would we wish to give countenance to any unworthy spirit of suspicion; but there are a large number of people who are so constituted that if you can give them the spiritual kernel without so much chaff, if you can give them the genuine spiritual communication without wrapping it in so many envelopes, if you can divest it of all unnecessary outward accretions — which disguise rather than reveal truth — though you may think you have given less and the communication is less wonderful, it is far more convincing. We can tell you our own experience, and nothing else, has led us to decidedly assume the attitude that it is most undesirable to try and receive evidences of the presence of great personages, and to seek for very, very wonderful works; judging by the nature of the communications themselves, we have found again and again that those which are practically anonymous are by far the most inspiring in a majority of instances.

We knew a very beautiful lady in New York who was a private medium; the most exquisite poetry was written through her hand — splendid poems, day after day, were written upon a great variety of subjects. Her friends said to her: "Who is your control? It must be some very great poet." The lady answered in a most artless and simple manner: "A few years ago I had a young lady boarding with me to whom I was very much attached; she was very fond of poetry; she passed away very suddenly, and she has regularly inspired me ever since; that young lady, who was once an inmate of my family, writes these poems through me." Those poems were so beautiful, so exquisite in their composition and so refined in their sentiment, that if the name of Byron had been given people would have said: "Byron has improved greatly since he passed into the spirit-world."

In a very, very large number of instances, if a few lines of verse are given it is said to come from some one who had such a reputation on earth as a poet that the claim deters the public from believing there was any inspiration in it, because those lines are not nearly up to the earthly standard.

Now, of course there is a way out of all these difficulties: it may be said that when these great minds were on earth they had their own organisms to work through, and their own organisms were far better adapted to the work in hand than the organisms which they are now endeavoring to manipulate; that it took them a long time to use their own brains perfectly, and now that they are endeavoring to work through others they find themselves at a great disadvantage. Of course, this is reasonable enough, and may often be the case; but another great point that ought to be raised in all such instances is, that these very individuals who have been singled out as so great and wonderful upon the earth were not, in reality, so much greater than others as they are supposed to have been; and what is more, they were not really the sole authors of the works which have borne their names. Homer's "Iliad" is one of the most magnificent poetical compositions on earth, but no scholar to-day believes that a single Greek poet by the name of Homer wrote the entire "Iliad." The "Iliad" was the production of a period, and instead of giving credit to one man as its sole author, we cannot doubt that it should be regarded as a result of the poetic inspirations of the period. Now, it does not detract from the beauty of the "Iliad" as a classical poem to take this view of it; it remains as great as it ever was, for it has an intrinsic value all its own. To-day there are serious questions as to whether the plays of Shakespeare were all written by him, it being conceded in many quarters that Lord

Bacon and others may have had a great deal to do with the Shakespearian productions; but the plays themselves are just as great — and always will be — as though a man named William Shakespeare wrote every word of them; you will not enjoy them any the less the next time you hear and see them acted upon the stage. It is not a question of where they came from or when they were written, but solely of what they are intrinsically worth, which determines their value.

So with the entire Bible and with all sacred literature. You cannot in the present state of controversy declare that Moses wrote all the Pentateuch; indeed, there are valid reasons for assuming that he did not write more than a small portion, if he wrote any of it. The books containing the Mosaic law are certainly not five books written by the hand of Moses; and while it is utterly impossible to decide what words in the Gospels were uttered by Jesus of Nazareth, while even a cloud of doubt rests over the personality of Christ altogether, and there are now many scholars who are not prepared to affirm positively whether Jesus ever lived or not, every word in the Mosaic law, every precept in the Gospels contains just as much truth, is just as valuable and edifying as if we knew exactly where it came from and who wrote it — as valuable as though we had been on the spot and were witnesses to every utterance and writing. What does it matter to us whether the ten commandments were given thirty-one hundred years ago from the top of Mount Sinai, or whether they were known to the ancient Atlantians and to the pre-historic races which inhabited Central America before some great cataclysm had changed the positions of land and water upon the globe? What does it matter whether the reputed sayings of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount were uttered two thousand years ago, or whether they were uttered in ancient temples of the antediluvian world whose ruins have long rested under the bed of the ocean? The commandments are no less binding, and the Gospels no less inspired. Moral truth is no less sublime because its history is lost sight of; it can be of no greater value because we know the day and the hour when it was first delivered to the world, the personality through whom utterance was given to it, and the circumstances which attended its proclamation! If we can rise from the lower to the higher level of thought, and, instead of bowing down to its antecedents, judge of the jewel by its own worth, we shall not be deceived any longer by imitations. But unfortunately, in the minds of a great many people the inquiry is not what is said, but who said it. And does not this apply to agnostics as well as to Christians? A Christian will accept anything on the alleged authority of Jesus or if it is in the Bible, but many and many an agnostic will accept any statement on the say-so of Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, or Spencer. If we set up these modern idols in the scientific world and bow down to them as authorities, we are just as guilty of superstition and idolatry as though we bowed to the dictum of the old prophets. If we make of a modern scientist a lord and ruler, and allow him to decide everything for us, and then foolishly speak about what Science says, when all we mean is what a certain individual says, we shall fall into just as many difficulties and be just as superstitious as ever were the ancients whose superstitions we affect to despise. Unfortunately there are very few original thinkers in the world; unfortunately, also, there are very few independent minds, very few people who will appeal directly to God or directly to Nature, who will interrogate the universe and stand up in the royalty of their own manhood and womanhood and acknowledge that God and truth are as near to them as to any so-called authority.

As long as we allow the adoration of persons and the adoration of books, the works of modern scientists and philosophers, we create fetiches as much as ever the Bibles of antiquity have become objects of fetich adoration; just as surely do we set up new idols and bow down to new graven images, when we quote authorities forever as much as though we were to confine ourselves to beliefs of the most unwarrantable character that have come to us from the past. Why not be free, why not enter so fully into the liberty of the spirit that we can hear everything and read everything, and then allow our own moral sense and highest judgment to discriminate between the chaff and the wheat, between the precious and the vile? Why not go fearlessly into the presence of the mightiest intellect and the meanest? Why not read books hoary with age and those yet moist from the printing-press with equal respect? Why not listen to the words of those universally admired and also of those who in solitary hiding-places, living apart from men, are called recluses or even "cranks," and pay equal deference to all; acknowledge your bootblack and your laundryman as being possibly as near to God as any ancient prophet or modern scribe? And when you allow every word that is spoken, every message that is given, every page that is written, be it ancient or modern, be it couched in elegant phraseology or draped in the humblest form of words, to appeal to your own conscience and reason, and assume a reasonable attitude with regard to all, you will then lay upon the shelf and remain non-committal toward that which does not convince your spirit as yet, and gladly accept what feeds you of the bread of truth, no matter where it may have been made, or by whom outwardly presented. When in this attitude we rise forever superior to a blind idolatry of persons, and not only do we protest against past superstition, but we protest with equal vigor against that foolish idolatry in the agnostic world which sets up a few modern authorities and calls upon the world to bow down and worship them as foolishly as ever the ancients worshiped the golden calf or a golden image set up by an impious king. If we continue to bow down to personal minds, if we allow representative individuals to become the sole leaders of thought and of opinion, if we dare not stand up for our own divine manhood and womanhood, we shall never receive the highest revelation. And if we think that something is any the better because uttered by an illustrious or popular person, or any the worse because it comes through the mediumship of a street urchin, we shall never be in a condition to deliver ourselves from the bonds of that mesmeric control which holds the majority of people in the leading-strings of fashion, and compels them to bow at any idol-shrine, because the popular voice calls them to that shrine to worship. People who follow the popular idol of the hour are as fickle as the winds; they change with the weather-cock, and are but barometers or thermometers at best, as at every change in the temperature or condition of the weather they can be pressed into the service of the greatest reform, provided a good and noble man is the fashion for the time; or they may be dragged to the level of the greatest folly and even sin and be taken in by the meanest swindler, provided that swindler or imposter is at the top of the social ladder for the time being. Persons who do not use their own reason, who try instead to use the reason of somebody else, who do not use their own conscience but try to be guided by the moral sense of some one else, who believe that God makes a revelation to some other people but not to them, will never come into that living knowledge of truth where they will be able to appreciate the full dignity and power of the words of Jesus: "If I say the truth why do ye not believe me?"

The highest grandeur and dignity of the character of Jesus, as portrayed in the Gospels, consisted in this: that he did not stand before the world and say: "I am God, and you will go to hell if you do not believe it"; he did not say: "I am the Divine Being, and unless you believe I am the second person of the Blessed Trinity your soul is in danger"; nothing of the kind. Jesus appealed to the divine sense in man; he spoke words of truth, and he knew when man was willing to listen to the Divine Word that he had the capacity within himself for understanding it; therefore he said: "If I say the truth, why do ye not believe me?" What was the meaning of this? If I say what you know and feel inwardly to be the truth, if I make an appeal to your conscience, if there is a living monitor within you that bears witness to my spirit, which is in harmony with the spirit of the truth uttered through me, why not believe me? why allow prejudice, pride, fashion, or any hope or fear of the world's praise or condemnation to prevent you from acknowledging truth? If any one had turned to Jesus and said: "I do not think what you say is true; it may be true, but I do not understand it as truth," do you think Jesus would have occupied the position of the charlatan and said: "You must believe it, because I say it." No, he would have argued with such a person — not reprimanded; and even might have gone so far as to perform what might be called a "miracle" to produce conviction. He would have worked with the understanding of the critic, and spared neither time nor energy in making the matter plain to him, but never would have asked any one to accept anything upon his verbal authority. When the disciples of John came to the disciples of Jesus to inquire as to the dignity of their Master, did Jesus point to any authority other than that of practically demonstrated good? He said, in effect, My system, my teaching, heals the sick and casts out devils — that is, puts down immoralities and makes the world more virtuous; blind eyes are opened, deaf ears hear, the lame walk; you can therefore see for yourselves the blessed and beneficial effect of my teachings. For that reason, and for that reason only, you are called upon to acknowledge what I teach as truth.

There was a direct appeal to human understanding, to human intelligence, as well as to conscience or the moral sense.

The entire question resolves itself into this: If there is anything marvelous or mysterious occurring, if there is any wonder connected with the source whence something proceeds, if sometimes great promises are made involving great predictions, and you feel that while they do not contradict your reason they very, very far transcend it; if statements are made to you which you can neither verify nor disprove because they are beyond and above your ken, how should you judge of the sources whence they emanate?

Judge of what is beyond your present means of investigation by the tone and tenor of what is within the limits of your investigation. We should say in every instance that the amount of truth that is being put forward anywhere under any circumstances, may be judged by the effects upon the lives of those who come under its influence in every individual case. If you ask how you shall decide whether a spiritual being who manifests to you comes from above or from below, if you desire to try the spirits and prove whether they are of God, whether you shall accept the advice which comes from a spiritual source or refuse to admit it, judge it by the influence which comes with it and its effect upon your life. All those old communications with the prefix: "Thus saith the Lord," which when followed resulted in error, havoc and misery, were communications which would never have come to the house of Israel if it had not been for idolatries, backsliding and mammon-worship.

Many times "Thus saith the Lord" sanctioned murder, when the commandment had been already given: "Thou shalt not kill." "Thus saith the Lord" put to death innocent women and children who were taken prisoners in war. It would, in many such cases, have been more appropriate if the prefix had been "Thus saith the devil."[1] When the people were demoralized they could not discriminate between the voice of truth and the voice of false gods, because they themselves were sunk in immorality and idolatry, because they had descended to a brutal plane of thought and action, and by their own depravity had beclouded the moral sense; they were ready to accept anything as coming from a higher world, provided there was something marvelous or mysterious about it. Was not the magical element, the merely miraculous theory, completely shown up in the account of the plagues of Egypt, when the magicians and soothsayers of the wicked Pharaoh endeavored to multiply frogs and lice? They accomplished it just as readily as did Moses; they could imitate the magic of Moses perfectly. But how did Moses show his superiority to the Egyptian soothsayers who sanctioned the wicked practices of the tyrant of that day? Moses could remove the plagues and they could but intensify them. Moses could clear the land of frogs; he could cause the boils to disappear from the bodies of the afflicted. Virtue and health were manifested when divine power worked through a truly inspired leader. But as long as Moses was playing magician and working miracles, and that seemed to be all the power he had, the magicians of the court of Pharaoh could duplicate the wonders he performed, and put in a just plea for equality with the representative of divine power.

In every age of the world the same thing has occurred, and if any Christian says Christianity is supported by miracles, and the miracles are incontestable, then there is no evidence that Christianity is not "the devil's" religion; but if, on the other hand, there is a spiritual power, a wealth of truth, a sound moral influence exerted in its teachings, and by those who harmonize with its teachings; if there is a power accompanying all wonders, to uplift, redeem, and save humanity, then the Christian religion rests forever sure upon the foundation of its moral excellence, while its miraculous side is only an accommodation to the as yet childish condition of a large number of people who have to be reached through the senses at first, because they have not as yet so fully developed their inner perception that they can do without sensuous demonstrations.

"Try the spirits, whether they be of God." Does that simply mean that you should ask them who they are? or see whether they can do something curious and inexplicable which physical scientists will attribute to some unknown force in Nature, which they will also probably pronounce unknowable? Does it mean that you must find out whether they really were some great and renowned people of old? No; but their communication must carry its own spiritual influence with it that appeals to your spiritual nature. You do not want any other evidence that a bird is a sweet singer than that you hear it sing sweetly; you do not need any other evidence of the fragrance of a flower than that you inhale its perfume; shut yourself in a dark room and hear the song of a canary, and you do not need to see the color of its plumage; its voice appeals to you in the dark quite effectually; you can judge of the bird by its song and the flower by its perfume.

And when there comes to you from an invisible realm a messenger whom you do not see, when words fall upon your inward ear and a vision lights upon your interior eye; when you feel a hand laid upon you in the darkness and you inquire: "Is this from above or from below?" and there floods your mind along with the phenomenon a spiritual evidence which touches the deepest springs of your being; if you are aroused to some height of nobility and benevolence by the influence thrown upon you; if a communication humbles your pride, increases your charity, gives you a deeper and diviner sense of justice; if it sends you out into the world determined to do more to help humanity than you have ever done before, and if there is a thrill of divine response within you, then you can judge truly of the divinity of the message and the messenger by the spiritual influence that you feel inwardly. In every instance, then, let us judge by the spiritual power and influence that convinces us. When we apply the inward test, we can say to every spirit who approaches: "I can know of you by the influence you exert upon me; can you touch my moral nature and elevate me to a diviner plane, or can you not?" We should judge of the sincerity, truthfulness, and genuineness of every communication received, without caring, perhaps, to know where it comes from, or by whom it is delivered, by the influence it leaves upon the individuals whom it reaches and impresses.

We have been in meetings where people were gathered together in the name of truth, humbly desiring an outpouring of the spirit, and we have been in places where there seemed to be little expectation or thought, but where the spirit of truth undoubtedly came; old quarrels were ended, the stingy became benevolent, the hard-hearted were melted to tears, wrongs were buried, friendships were formed, and the angel of truth showed its presence by these results.

If we insist upon applying a moral rather than an external or sensuous test we can never be deceived, for whatever opportunity there may be for counterfeiting or masquerading on the external plane, there can be no counterfeit on the spiritual. A flower if it is withered and dead and in stagnant water, cannot by any manner of means give forth a sweet odor. A bird that has not the power of song cannot warble sweet melodies. In the spiritual world flowers that are not fresh and pure, that do not come from heavenly bowers, cannot breathe forth the fragrance of beauty and love! Unclean spirit-birds — which are not birds of paradise — cannot imitate the note of the songsters of the higher spheres.

To place ourselves forever beyond the reach of deception is to so far cultivate our own moral sense that the atmosphere of deception being foreign to us, we detect it at once, and having outgrown the condition in which we can even wish to deceive or do a wrong, we shall be beyond the power of any to make us the victims of deception.

In response to numerous interrogations on the subject we state it as our unalterable conviction that all who investigate Spiritualism in any of its phases under proper moral conditions with a sincere desire to arrive at truth, with benevolent dispositions toward their neighbors, will ere long be blessed with authentic revelations from the life beyond far exceeding all past outpourings, as we have now seriously entered upon a new era in the world's progressive history, wherein truth will be embodied far more objectively than in any preceding age whose record is preserved in the archives of history accessible to the multitude.

LECTURE XX.

INGERSOLLISM AND THEOSOPHY. — COLONEL INGERSOLL'S CREED.

1. Happiness is the only good.

2. The way to be happy is to make others happy. Other things being equal, that man is the happiest who is the nearest just — who is truthful, merciful, and intelligent — in other words, the man who lives in accordance with the conditions of life.

3. The time to be happy is now, and the place to be happy is here.

4. Reason is the lamp of the mind — the only torch of progress; and, instead of blowing that out and depending upon darkness and dogma, it is far better to increase that light.

5. Every man should be the intellectual proprietor of himself — honest with himself and intellectually hospitable — and upon every brain reason should be enthroned as king.

6. Every man must bear the consequences, at least, of his own actions; if he put his hand in the fire, his hand must smart, and not the hands of another. In other words, each man must eat the fruit of the tree he plants.

THE above creed is indeed as good a one as was ever invented, though, of course, it does not go as far in the recognition of spiritual truth as many would desire to have it. The very word is objectionable in the ears of many people, though for what reason we are at a loss to surmise, unless it be that many foolish, ignorant, and dogmatic creeds have been forced upon the world, but such dogmatic compilations are, in many instances, properly speaking, not creeds at all. The word creed is derived from the Latin credo (I believe). Therefore, out of the three great creeds of Christendom, two only are, properly speaking, creeds; the third is not rightly a creed, but a dogmatic ecclesiastical manifesto. The Apostles' Creed begins with "I believe," so does the Nicene Creed, but the Athanasian Creed begins with, "Quicunque vult," etc. "Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic faith, which faith, except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly." That awful declaration is, however, inconsistently modified before we reach the end of the "creed," as a concluding clause reads: "They who have done good shall go into life everlasting." So Colonel Ingersoll is not excluded from eternal happiness, even on the showing of the pretended creed of Athanasius, who, by the way, if history does not lie, was not its author or compiler. The three creeds held alike by the Roman, Greek, and Anglican divisions of the Christian hierarchy show us how primitive simplicity and becoming modesty and charity were banished as soon as imperialism took root in Christian minds and countries. The first creed (the Apostles') is a simple exposition of evangelical Christianity in terse and lucid sentences; the Nicene Creed is a more elaborate and verbose exposition of the same doctrine, but both these creeds are so written as to challenge no opposition. The right of freedom of speech would be arraigned should we question any one's right to express publicly, if he wishes, his religious convictions. The Athanasian Creed is not properly reprehensible because of its mysterious doctrine of a trinity consisting of three persons in the Godhead, but solely on account of the presumptuous blasphemy which makes any man, or body of men, dare to condemn their fellow beings to everlasting damnation, unless they agree with them in accepting incomprehensible notions regarding the nature of the Supreme Being.

Colonel Ingersoll in reply to the savage and purblind criticisms and denunciations of Dr. Talmage, the eminent pulpit sensationalist of Brooklyn Tabernacle, has favored the public with a statement of what he does believe. He has told us for so long so much about what he does not believe that we are truly delighted with an affirmative statement from his ready pen and eloquent tongue. His creed is a worthy and a liberal one; he does not seek to bind it as a chain about the neck of his brethren; he is content to hold and proclaim it as his own honest belief and conviction, and in so doing challenges the thoughtful and respectful attention of the entire thinking community.

Let us take a moment's glance at the man before we analyze his creed. Men and their creeds always bear a family resemblance. A contracted creed could never have been drawn up by a broad, liberal man. A narrow mind could never have devised such a creed as Ingersoll's. Ingersoll, both mentally and physically, is an instructive as well as an interesting subject for study; his is a large, genial, breezy nature. He carries with him the breadth of the prairies, and is, in many respects, a good typical American. His intellect is great, but not fully developed, neither is it highly polished. His personal appearance is attractive, strong, manly, fatherly, social, and withal gentle; for, strange as it may seem, the author of "Mistakes of Moses," and other literary firebrands and bombshells, is in every sense a gentle and affectionate man in his friendly and domestic relations. As a father, a husband, and a citizen he is irreproachable, and as a lawyer he is a conscientious advocate of liberty. As a lecturer he is a ruthless iconoclast in nine instances out of every ten, but every once in a while his tones are tender, melting, pathetic; and when they are so, he moves his audience — not only to mingled applause and tears by his burning eloquence, but by the profundity and moral aptitude of his constructive reasoning. As a destroyer of the world's faith we have often had passages at arms with Ingersoll, but when he undertakes to build we can only watch with unqualified admiration the skill and deftness of his work.

Article 1 in his creed reads: "Happiness is the only good," — as sweeping an assertion as it is possible for any one to make, and one, moreover, to which exception might readily be taken, but we have no desire to cavil or disagree; we prefer to look deeply into this sentence and see if we cannot discover in it a perfect epitome of sound philosophy.

That happiness is the supreme object of human search is self-evident, for the most religious, even when they profess to disregard earthly happiness, seek happiness in heaven which they believe will be of eternal duration; while the most unselfish, who seem not to seek their own individual enjoyment, devise all their schemes of benevolence with a view to securing the happiness of others. Thus happiness is clearly the universal good desired; whether we seek our own or that of others is the criterion of our selfishness or our philanthropy. If it is natural to man to seek happiness as the supreme goal of all his effort, may we not safely conclude that we are constituted by an infinitely happy God whose good pleasure it is that all should seek and find happiness that will endure forever. This thought certainly discords with Calvinistic orthodoxy, but harmonizes with all liberal thought and spiritual philosophy.

Article 2 in Ingersoll's creed reads: "The way to be happy is to make others happy. Other things being equal, that man is the happiest who is the nearest just — who is truthful, merciful, and intelligent — in other words, the man who lives in accordance with the conditions of life." This article being expository and exegetical needs close analysis, and to many minds some amplification to render it wholly acceptable alike to the moral sense and intellectual understanding. Its morality is unexceptionable. Who among moral teachers has ever given a supremer place to truthfulness and mercy than Ingersoll? Truth and mercy he places even before intelligence, thereby according with what we perpetually insist upon, viz., that moral training is even more important than mental culture, though both are of priceless value.

Let us briefly consider the nature and especial merits of the three excellences to which Ingersoll gives the most conspicuous place in his code of ethics, in fact the only three he mentions in his creed as necessary to a "just" man, one who, to use his own words, "lives in accordance with the conditions of life" — life meaning, of course, something infinitely above mere vegetative existence, as simple bodily existence is maintained by many who violate every condition of life in its highest meaning. Now what is it to be truthful, merciful, and intelligent? We should reply, it is to be just, loving, and wise. Truth must ever stand foremost among the virtues. We must be true to ourselves and true to humanity if we would make our lives peaceful, useful, and harmonious. What is truth? is a question we all need to ask of that inward monitor we agree in calling conscience; we have all a moral sense, a perception of right, and this inward perception or intuitive conviction never leads us astray. It may apparently differ in measure, but never in kind with different individuals. All may know a certain amount of truth, though all may not know equally much of truth. To be true is to be loyal to one's highest convictions of right and duty, and though perfection be not possible in all instances, perfect truthfulness of intent is the characterizing mark of every noble man and woman.

The idea of unlimited progress does not conflict in any sense with the highest standard of relative truthfulness held up by an individual conscience as the guide of personal conduct. Truth demands that we should follow its lead instantly and unhesitatingly in all cases; i.e. we must never dally with convictions; never toy with conscientious scruples; never resort to the sophistry of self-excuse; but act immediately without reluctance in accordance with our highest conception of right.

Truth is infinite and we are finite; thus there is always an infinite ocean of truth unsounded, unexplored by us. In mathematical studies, problem after problem presents itself for solution, each one more difficult than its predecessor; we may be utterly unable as yet to solve the more abstruse of the problems we have encountered, but those which are less difficult we can solve readily if we will only faithfully apply the rule; the more difficult ones we shall be able to grapple with by and by, if we are only faithful and diligent in our studies. There is no road to our ever mastering obstacles now apparently insuperable other than the plain direct path of conscientious, unflagging devotion to duty. Much truth is as yet veiled from us in dim obscurity, but our eyes grow stronger as we rightly use them, and every effort to follow the guidance of truth prepares us for deeper research into its mysteries. What then is our practical duty in daily life? Should we always speak the truth? Yes, except when it is our duty to remain silent.

A criminal is not required by the civil law to criminate himself in court, but he is most assuredly bound by the most sacred moral obligation never to utter a falsehood in self-defense. There are indeed times when we should keep silence, as well as times when we should speak, but no time ever occurs when it is permissible to tell a lie, no, nor even to act one. But some may object, Is it not our duty to shield our fellow-beings?

Are there not often extenuating circumstances which should be duly considered? are not your too rigid moralists apt to err on the side of severity, and in overlooking clemency discard one of the sweetest of graces and most noble of virtues? We answer unhesitatingly, whenever such inquiries are raised, ends never justify means which are not in themselves good. What is commonly called the Jesuitical policy is a dastardly one, and one moreover which must ultimately prove fatal to the welfare of all who adopt it. In that pathetic drama, "The Two Orphans," which the public are never tired of witnessing, a fatally weak spot mars the moral beauty of the character of a Sister of Charity, who is in every respect the embodiment of mercy. She finds herself in a terribly trying situation; a child she loves dearly, one who leans on her as upon a tender mother, is in cruel danger and deep distress, and to save the poor blind maiden whose heart is breaking at the thought of an impending catastrophe, she resorts to a falsehood, a simple "white lie," to frustrate the evil designs of an unscrupulous adversary. Was such a falsehood wicked? It was assuredly weak, as no one can condescend to employ deception as a weapon of defense if he trusts implicitly in the almightiness of truth.

How few of us, alas! have that perfect faith in truth which would enable us to remove every mountain of error out of our path if we only possessed it. Lacking this supreme trust in truth, we weakly yield to deception with what we fondly call the best motive possible. Our intent may be good, but our policy is virtually suicidal. Tell the truth or preserve silence is a motto we should do well to hang up in a conspicuous place in all our schools, homes, and places of business.

A mistake can never be a lie, an unintentional misstatement has in it none of the characteristics, and possesses none of the attributes of mendacity. We may often ignorantly and quite innocently err in judgment, and thus unknowingly mislead ourselves and others. Such error is perfectly excusable on the ground that we are not omniscient. Falsehood, to partake of deliberate and intentional opposition to truth, must be freighted with the intention to deceive. Of course falsehood is encountered in various shades of criminality; its very mildest form is that in which we employ it as a cloak to save our neighbors from distress: in its worst degree it is the result of deliberate intention to wrong another. The three forms of lying most common may be described as the lie of timidity, the lie of selfishness, and the lie of malice. The first is of course more of a weakness than a sin, even though the element of sinfulness is not absent from it. The second is very popular, indeed awfully prevalent, and the source of untold misery. The third is the most despicable and fiendish thing imaginable on earth, and can never proceed from the lips of any but depraved persons.

To be always truthful one needs a large stock of courage, and for ourselves we can scarcely see how any one can have the requisite amount of confidence in truth to be always true unless he has confidence in a Supreme Universal Being who is infinitely true, and the author and inspirer of the law of the universe; One whose infinite veracity insures the triumph of truth and the defeat of falsehood in accordance with the very nature and constitution of universal moral government.

Ingersoll is not an avowed Theist, but so far as we understand him he has no prejudice against pure Theism. The evidences of the being of God are, in his opinion, not strong enough to justify his saying, "I believe in God." But surely, no man could place truthfulness in the place of highest honor, to which Ingersoll assigns it, were he not morally in harmony with the most exalted Theism. His intellect wavers between God and no God, but his innermost sentiments and noblest aspirations are all pre-eminently theistic, as they are also altruistic. Next to truth, Ingersoll places mercy, and we must remember he is defining a just man's character, so we take it for granted he means by mercy that beautiful and regal attribute of divinity which always was, and ever will be, the spouse of perfect equity.

Let us consider briefly the relation of justice to mercy in divine beneficence, and what lends added importance to this theme is that the doctrine of vicarious atonement is considered a very vital point in Christian orthodoxy. Our readers, doubtless, are all far too familiar with the orthodox theory of redemption to necessitate our rehearsing it. It is, in fine, a wonderfully constructed edifice built upon the treacherous sand of misconception with regard to the relation of divine attributes, one toward the other. God the Father represents justice; God the Son mercy; and these two persons in the trinity have positively to become at variance with each other (at least in appearance) that justice and mercy may both be satisfied ere man can be redeemed from endless misery.

The wretchedly blind sophistry to which this baseless assumption has given birth needs only to be examined to be instantly refuted as a libel on the very nature of Deity and the constitution of the universe. All who have attended strictly orthodox Christian churches and heard old-fashioned Calvinistic sermons and Sunday-school lessons must have felt their young minds rebel against the monstrous inhumanity of a schoolmaster who would punish an innocent boy and let a guilty one go free: yet this most immoral illustration of God's way of saving sinners was quite common not so many years ago, and we are not sure it has yet fallen into entire disuse. The great importance of discussing such a subject as this, is that it most nearly affects our conduct one towards another, and has a most direct and decided bearing on the treatment of offenders by the civil authority.

Now mercy and justice never had a quarrel; their interests were never separate. There never could be a time when justice clamored for revenge and mercy pleaded against it, for vengeance and justice are antipodal both in nature and in interest, as well as in effect.

"Retribution is mine, and I will repay, saith the Eternal," is an excellent and morally elevating Scripture text, but the substitution of the word "vengeance" for "retribution" in familiar translations, utterly beclouds and spoils the moral teaching of the original. A radical reform is needed wherever the word "vengeance" is used in connection with anything just and wise, and for any theologian to talk of divine justice and wisdom (to say nothing of love) and then speak of divine vengeance, is for him to be guilty of a contradiction in terms, as well as to become the exponent of a highly mischievous as well as utterly false philosophy.

Shakespeare shows how utterly impossible it is for a man to be just when he seeks revenge. Shylock asks the pound of flesh which is legally his due; but he cannot obtain it without the shedding of blood, and the law does not permit him to shed a single drop of blood; consequently he must forego his claim, based on the theory of retaliation. Not until mercy illuminates the page can the moral law be beheld or executed.

We have elsewhere expressed our detestation of capital punishment, and urged the recognition of two only justifiable reasons for inflicting penalties upon offenders, viz., their own reformation and the protection of society; now we will utter a word of protest not only against dungeon cells, transportation for life, and other cruel atrocities repugnant to the moral feeling of every humane individual, but also against that harsh government of children, and inmates of public institutions, which discords so entirely with all intelligent and merciful ideas of divine and human justice. We must be merciful in order to be just, so says Ingersoll and so say we.

Supposing a child tells you a lie, and you have every reason to believe the lie deliberate and premeditated, you feel it to be your duty to correct your offspring for the two great reasons aforesaid. If a child is allowed to lie with impunity, the habit grows upon him, and it is alike unjust and unkind to permit one entrusted to your charge to contract and develop destructive habits without doing all in your power to break him of such habits for his own good. Then it is a greater injustice to society to let an unrestrained falsifier loose upon the world than not to keep a child away from school when suffering from an infectious disorder. Clearly it is our duty to do our utmost to eradicate the love of falsehood from the minds of our sons and daughters and thereby prevent a repetition of an offense against society.

The question now arises, How shall the reproof be administered, and what shall be its nature? Severe punishment of an unreasonable kind; reproofs administered in anger though reasonable to some extent when calmly given, tend to intimidate the nervous, in whom they foster deception, but in no case do they appeal to the moral nature. They are utterly powerless to arouse any noble ambition. A child whose ears are often boxed, whose head is struck, who is shut up in a dark room and kept on bread and water till he for policy's sake offers a sullen or tearful apology to the parent who has maltreated or incarcerated him, has usually been meditating on the pleasure of doing wrong, and the unpleasantness of being found out during his term of "correction." To such a child, a lie becomes more than ever fascinating, and henceforth his energies are devoted to devising means for more artful lying. Thus it is not wrong to tell a lie, in such a child's estimation, but it is a great misfortune to be discovered. By inference, therefore, it is something to be proud of, something to boast of among schoolfellows and playmates who are taken into a disgraceful confidence, when one has been artful enough to do a wrong and escape detection. From among children who have been treated to retaliation; from the ranks of those who have been severely punished by strict disciplinarians who were lacking in the higher moral perceptions, innumerable recruits are always found to swell the ranks of the army of criminals we see marching through our streets to dock and dungeon, often, alas! to the hideous gallows, or yet more frightful block.

The greatest blessing conferred upon humanity to-day by professed metaphysical teachers and healers, accrues from the stress they lay upon the inherent goodness of human nature. While no justice-loving person can gloss over iniquity and excuse malpractice, the enlightened lover of justice is equally a lover of mercy, and finds it possible to be just while merciful, and merciful while just.

Colonel Ingersoll, after having sung the praises of truthfulness and mercy, introduces intelligence for our acceptance, and in doing so, he places intellectual development in its proper place after moral culture. When we are disposed toward truth and mercy, the more we know, and the more power there is placed in our hands, the better for society. Secular training is a priceless boon. The common schools are among the grandest institutions of America, but it needs no prophet to foretell that without an appeal to the deepest moral sentiments of youth mere intellectual development is worse than vain. Knowledge is always power, but power placed in unscrupulous hands is a source of danger and terror to a community. Intelligence in its highest and fullest sense includes moral enlightenment, and standing in juxtaposition to truth and mercy in the creed of Ingersoll, it can mean no less to him.

If we are intelligent enough to know how to deal wisely with the evils threatening the nation, if we know enough to act effectively in a moment of danger so as to end a panic or prevent one, we have added to our faith knowledge, or in other words, our goodness of heart is supplemented and assisted by clearness of head. Simple good nature often leads to weak indulgence, and fosters many a vice the kind-hearted are eager to repress, but know not how to do it. Many tender-hearted people shrink from the thought of inflicting the slightest suffering on any sentient creature, and they are indeed noble and wise, as well as loving, when they refuse to inflict the slightest pain on any sentient thing for their own personal welfare; but when it comes to sparing the rod and spoiling the child, it is as though one were to advocate letting all prisoners, lunatics, and fever patients loose upon the streets. Prisons, reformatories, hospitals, asylums, etc., should be and will be, when properly conducted, no more dreadful than well-appointed schools and workshops. Those placed under surveillance will be those who have proved themselves incompetent to govern themselves. No fixed term of imprisonment will constitute their sentence: the criminal will go to prison to be cured of a moral malady, as a lunatic is sent to an asylum to be cured of insanity, and a physically diseased person to a hospital to be restored to soundness of physique. Why should moral maladies be treated differently from physical and mental aberrations? Mercy and justice are a unit in all instances, when both are rightly understood. Mercy says, Be kind to the offender; Justice asks, Would you not also be considerate for the general weal? Mercy replies, I cannot favor one at the expense of others any more than you can. Justice then passes a sentence favorable to mercy. Mercy speaks in tones of justice, and the two ever harmonious ones who dwell eternally together in the bosom of infinitude never need to be reconciled, for they never disagree; thus you may recommend a criminal from undue severity to mercy, or from justice to blind soft-heartedness, but a just decree is never an unmerciful one, as a merciful one can never be unjust.

To revert to the old Calvinistic idea of substitution, as instanced by the schoolboys already mentioned, we must inquire why should the teacher ever punish at all. All legal prattle concerning the dignity of law and the honor of the school is just so much antiquated misconception of the true nature of the case. Human laws are changing, and immediately they are found to conflict with human interests, need to be repealed. Law is only an expression of mind. If the intelligence of a republic improves, the laws necessarily improve. Divine Law is of course immutable, and therefore perfect, and so cannot be fairly compared with the code of any school or state on earth subject to change of discipline.

The proper reason for "punishing" a child or adult is to reform, teach, and elevate him. The nature of the penalty is evil if it does not accomplish these ends. It should never be enforced to sustain the dignity of an institution any more than an operation should be performed to sustain the dignity of a surgical institute.

When we see the matter in its true light, we shall regard punishment in the light of a necessary operation performed solely in the interests of an invalid, and also in the interests of all who risk being affected, if a contagious malady be not repressed in a neighbor. Now, how brutal and idiotic would the spectacle appear were a patient who did not need the service of the surgeon's knife to come forward and be operated upon in the stead of the invalid. If a friend thought the doctors were cruelly butchering a patient more delicate and sensitive than himself, he might reasonably request to be allowed to suffer in his stead, were he imbued with the belief that the operation was an utterly unnecessary manifestation of anger and retaliation; but when the authorities pointed out to him that the operation was for his friend's good, that it appeared to them the only way of saving his life, or at least of preventing the spread of some terrible disease, destructive alike to himself and others, his friend would be a maniac, after he understood the surgeon's motive, to offer himself as a substitute, while the doctors would be brutal and foolish in the extreme did they allow him to suffer unnecessarily.

Whenever we see criminals on their way to the reformatories of the future, we shall only feel for them as we feel for patients carried to the hospital. You often hear the remark, "Poor fellow, I am very sorry for him, but he will be better there than at home; he is assured of the best doctoring and nursing always procurable in any of our great hospitals."

No thought of anger — only one of compassion — follows the sufferer to his bed of pain. That illness or accident may, however, have been the direct consequence of evil doing. A drunken brawl, a sensual excess, an angry blow may have been the only reason for his prostrate condition; still he must be pitied and cared for as a brother in distress. If he has sinned, he also suffers. It is not for us to condemn, but to help him to health, virtue, usefulness, and happiness. No one refuses to employ a man recently discharged from a hospital; why then shun those who have been let out of prison? When our duty is truly done to our offending brethren, no one will be put in prison but for his reformation; no one will be let out until he has proved himself able to use wisely the privilege of liberty; no one will be kept within prison walls after he has shown himself morally strong enough to live outside them, and no one will be turned adrift upon an unsympathetic world without means of honest maintenance. Work should be found for every released convict, as no one can reasonably be expected to live virtuously when no opportunity of doing so is afforded him. We have punished iniquity long enough; and punishment has not availed. We must now set to work to stamp it out, to literally destroy evil, to lay the ax of reform at the root of every poisonous tree, and root up every weed infesting our gardens. The old idea of punishment has led people to believe that the wicked will be tormented forever, or else utterly destroyed. The former theory is too terrible to retain its hold much longer on any portion of a thinking community; the latter, however, which is much milder, but also fallacious, has gained currency, not only among church people, who have revolted against the doctrine of perpetual torment, but also among Theosophists who have failed to grasp the inner meanings of the ancient esoteric doctrine they study so devoutly.

Religious ideas are practically momentous, as they influence speech and conduct. Thus we cannot part with moral, spiritual, or strictly speaking, religious culture in the public schools. The difficulty has ever been to distinguish between simple morals and religious dogmas, and we are sure every advocate of sound, practical, ethical teaching will be thankful to Col. Ingersoll for letting the public see that a champion of agnosticism, a reputed infidel, has some definite ideas of morality, and prizes truth, justice, and mercy as highly as any Jew or Christian. We have always advocated the complete secularization of the state, but not of the individual. We have always set our faces against the non-taxation of church property, and even against the reading of the Bible in the public schools. We have even gone so far as to suggest the erasure of the word God and the substitution of such a word as justice, equity, or truth in the inscription on the American coinage, solely because of the respect we consider due to those whose ideas upon religious matters differ from our own, and differ still more widely from the beliefs of all who lay claim to the title "orthodox," whether in Christian or Jewish circles.

The point we are aiming at is to distinguish between morality, pure and simple, and adherence to certain religious ideas accompanied by attendance upon places of worship and the study of a literature commonly called sacred. Now it would be suicidal to the interests of the state and to the safety of the community to ignore morals, and therefore tacitly sanction immorality. We know that a vast amount of evil takes its rise in no moral training, as well as in advocacy, or at least tacit indorsement, of such views and practices as undermine the morals of the world. Ingersoll is happily a thorough moralist, and doubtless his children receive from their parents (the most proper of all people to convey it) the soundest ethical instruction. Whether Ingersoll's creed goes far enough, in its spirit and affirmations, to completely supply the necessity we all feel for a definite declaration, is an open and quite another question. Whatever may be its lack, so far as incentive to morality is concerned (and people seem to be in absolute need of definite spiritual revelation), all must admit, so far as it goes (and it really goes quite a long way) it sanctions only virtue, and by clear inference distinctly reprehends vice. No idea of God is clearly an improvement upon a degrading idea of the Supreme Being, and for that reason we welcome agnosticism in preference to a horrible theology.

Materialism is a relief from the idea of infinite vengeance and endless suffering, but it is clearly unsatisfactory even to those who advocate it. We have only to listen to their speeches and read their publications to be convinced that materialistic ideas are far too barren and comfortless to support those who advocate them in their hours of sorrow and bereavement. They may be brave with the courage of stoics, who boast of their perfect resignation to the inevitable, but stoicism sheds no light and kindles no hope in the human breast; true it offers no added misery to the mourner by conjuring up a hell of devouring flame into which all unbelievers must be cast, but while it does not terrify us with the orthodox hell, it robs us at the same time of every hope of heaven. Ingersoll is always breaking away from Materialism. His temperament is so sanguine he cannot but be hopeful. Where he cannot affirm he will not deny. So, when in the third article of his creed, he says, "The time to be happy is now, and the place to be happy is here," he does not necessarily deny immortality any more than did a Christian apostle who said with emphasis, "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." Even Jesus himself seems to have laid such peculiar stress on seizing the moment as it flies, that many people have objected to some of his teachings, because he said, "Be not anxious for the morrow."

The Jewish Scriptures say very little about life beyond the grave, the reason for this silence being the intense desire of Moses and his successors to keep the minds of the people so fixed on their present duties that, instead of living in an anticipated future, neglecting the now to dream of a coming time, neglecting the here to speculate on a hereafter (as many people unfortunately do to their own and others' detriment) they might be prepared for all coming time and all possible happiness beyond the grave, through a faithful and diligent preparation such as a noble life from day to day can alone afford. There is, however, another side to the picture, for to many people everything is in a motive, an ideal. How hard it is to tread a dreary, monotonous path uncheered by the assurance of a brighter prospect ahead! Ingersoll is a happy man, jovial, healthy, hearty; in the prime of a vigorous manhood, most agreeably situated from a worldly point of view. His home is his delight; his means are ample; he is, in a word, in truly affluent circumstances, and may well ask the fleeting hour to stay. Such a man, however broad his sympathies with suffering and poverty-stricken humanity, can never fully realize how much more necessary to the poor and unhappy are spiritual consolations than to those in health, wealth, and prosperity. When Ingersoll says, "The time to be happy is now, and the place here," he must know that multitudes have so hard a struggle to eke out a subsistence, and have so many trials and difficulties to encounter, that happiness, for them, is not so easily procurable as for him whose lines have fallen in pleasant places, who has a very fine fig-tree and well spreading vine to sit under, to employ a familiar ancient metaphor. He may answer and so may others, "We should think little of ourselves and much of others; we should be happy in making others happy"; and his answer would be indeed true; his advice would indeed be sound; but from the days when Seneca put forth the same thought — from the time when Confucius proclaimed it in China, and Socrates in Greece — yea, and long before their time, when the earliest moralists of the world preached the old yet ever new gospel of doing all for others — though altruism has indeed been the noblest philosophy, it has gained much, and never lost one iota of its value by being coupled with a clear and elevating conception of human individual immortality. As to the ideas of endless punishment and annihilation for the wicked, both of which are still promulgated in different sections of the Christian church — we object to the influence of them both upon society; for, while the latter is far less hideous and merciless than the former, they both teach the incorrigibility of certain human beings. They declare that men can sin beyond redemption, or the possibility of redemption. This error, expressed in legislation, supports capital punishment, transportation and imprisonment for life, and other hateful barbarisms to the overthrowing of which all truly humane and enlightened persons are directing their most zealous efforts.

Whatever opinion some of our readers may have formed of metaphysics — however prejudiced some may be against what is commonly called Christian Science, all must admit that the system has one great redeeming feature, and that is its refusal to regard any one as incorrigibly wicked or hopelessly lost. We, most of us, actually need a spiritual impetus, or we falter on our journey, and fail in the accomplishment of reformatory work. We need to see with the eye of the spirit a happy time and blessed place when and where all we undertake to help will stand arrayed in the white robes of purity, cleansed from all defilement. We need to hear with our spiritual ears a song of triumph proceeding from the lips of those who now utter falsehood and curses. If we are to strive to be truly happy, now and here, we venture to say we cannot become thoroughly so, as a people (whatever exceptional individuals may accomplish), we cannot do our best, most thorough and successful work to raise our weaker brethren, unless we are cheered and strengthened in some degree by a hold on immortality. If any of us can be just, true, merciful, intelligent, philanthropic, useful, and happy, as Ingersoll would have us, without any knowledge of the beyond, we are highly privileged individuals, and must enjoy dispositions of exceptional amiability. For us in that case life after seeming death will be a beautiful and most welcome surprise — perhaps all the more beautiful and welcome because we did not look forward to it; but for the majority, true Spiritualism, divested of all extraneous matter, free from all belittling superstitions and follies, offers solid comfort and help, unrivaled by all other systems of philosophy. Pure and unadulterated Spiritualism teaches what Ingersoll teaches in the first three articles of the noble creed we have endeavored to review.

LECTURE XXI.

"ROBERT ELSMERE;" OR, THE OLD FETTERS AND THE NEW FAITH.

AMONG the many valuable and interesting works now before the world, no one has excited greater interest than Mrs. Humphrey Ward's religious novel "Robert Elsmere." That it should have created such extraordinary interest in America, may be like the astounding interest centered in Moody's preaching; one of the psychological marvels of the day, and this for two reasons: First, the work does not really advance any very strange or startling theory. Second, it is a story of English not American life, and records the struggles of a clergyman of the English church who makes his way by painful processes of thought and action from a "living" in a rural district, where he is the rector of a comparatively unimportant parish, to the broad open field of unfettered and almost creedless humanitarian effort. A little closer inspection of the details of the story will soon, however, convince even the superficial reader that the interest taken in the book does not center in any reference to place or period, or in any character however finely drawn, but in the fierce conflict between orthodox literalism and heterodox spiritualism therein so graphically presented.

Mrs. Ward is a vivid portrait painter, her characters are all decidedly drawn, they are all widely different the one from the other; each is a study in itself and even the least important have a fascination for any reader who delights in a vivid portrayal of human individuality, whether he can admire the type under consideration or not. The book shows us many characters, but not too many, as they never get mixed and each is essential to a perfect tale, such as the one so graphically told in 680 closely printed pages in the full size American paper edition. Some critics have of course said the story was too long, unnecessarily spun out; some have complained that others than the central figures have received too much notice; but such criticisms are exceedingly shallow and unfounded, as the real merit of the work is in its completeness, which consists in its elaborate analysis of the surroundings of the hero, and its careful explanation of the varied influences which shaped his thought and determined his conduct. Robert Elsmere is not an ordinary man, though educated in an ordinary way, so far as outward appearances go. His mother was by no means an ordinary woman, and without the careful description of her character and influence over her son in the opening chapters, one of the most essential factors in Robert's education would have been left out.

Robert, as a boy, predicts his own future, and to any careful and experienced student of mental tendencies, his early days led by a perfectly natural course to his subsequent career. Robert Elsmere is from the first a free spirit, impatient of all restraint, his bodily frame is weak, his mind ardent, his feeling intense; his mother is an excitable, singular woman, very industrious, self-centered, unselfish, nervous, and self-opinionated without being in the least self-conceited. She and her son are everything to each other, they have no secrets from each other; she is both playmate and teacher; an Irishwoman of a very noble type, she combines an indomitable love of personal liberty with an intense regard for the rights of everybody else. Anything like meretricious display is odious to her; ritualistic curates, whom she suspects of being only half sincere are her pet abomination, and though her son seems destined to become a clergyman, and she is a deeply religious woman, she cannot but make special fun over the eccentricities of the clerical profession; for to her the ministry of religion must be a life, not a trade; and where the minister of the gospel is only a tradesman, selling his wares, she despises the man while she loves the gospel he dishonors. Robert goes to Oxford at the usual age, accompanied by his mother, and there in the very midst of ecclesiastical supremacy and literary conservatism he makes friends with two learned men, both professors in the University, neither of whom are in the slightest degree orthodox in sentiment or proclivity. One of these, Henry Grey, is a practical heroic saint, in the guise of a religious rationalist; the other, Edward Langham, is a dilettant man of letters, whose temper is as melancholy as Grey's is energetic, and whose philosophy is as depressing as Grey's is bracing. In the execution of the portraits of these two men, the authoress displays consummate genius; she brings into the most striking relief two directly opposite types of so-called liberals with which we are all apt to become familiar. Both are rationalists in the usual acceptance of that word, but one acts and thinks as though everything in life were worthy of the loftiest endeavor, while the other concludes that nothing is really worth the effort required to accomplish it even decently.

Grey's mind is constantly expanding, Langham's perpetually dwindling; and between these diametrically opposite poles of radicalism at Oxford the young student for the ministry of the established church of England finds himself placed. He passes through his studies, however, without realizing that there is anything in the creeds and articles of the church to which he cannot conscientiously subscribe; he takes orders and accepts a living without any conscientious scruples, though the fact is never disguised that his physical weakness considerably influences his settlement at length, in a quiet country district. Had he been physically stronger, he would have sought active work in London or some great manufacturing city, where he could have strained every nerve to meet the requirements of a large and needy parish; he is therefore, at the very outset of his ministerial career, crippled by bodily weakness, and with a most vigorous mind and ardent spirit has seemingly to yield to the dictates of weak flesh or break down before his work has even fairly commenced.

Before entering upon the living in Surrey which is in the gift of a peer of the realm, a relative of Elsmere's, he travels in many countries, always accompanied by his mother, and then visits Westmoreland, where he is introduced, in the performance of his clerical duties as a curate there, to the Leyburn family from which he selects the eldest daughter, Catherine, to be his wife. At that period of his early manhood, at the outset of his career as a clergyman, just when he is most intensely impressionable in all directions, he finds in a woman whom he compares to St. Elizabeth, one whom he feels may be indeed his "twin soul," she of all others who can share his work with him and make him all he is capable of becoming, while apart from her he feels himself utterly at the mercy of influences and temptations, of the strength and subtlety of which he can form no adequate idea, but which he instinctively and deeply feels would be sufficient to overwhelm him, or at least disqualify him utterly for a noble performance of his duty, were he left to fight them singlehanded.

Catherine Leyburn and Robert Elsmere are extreme opposites; she is quiet in the extreme, he is as turbulent in nature as she is self-contained, but her passivity is in no sense the quiet unresisting temper of a character not decided; in her quietness is her strength; her marvelous fund of reserve power forcibly illustrates the truth of the old adage, "Still waters run deep," and while she can but very rarely be brought to betray an emotion, when her feelings are too strongly aroused, the pent-up tide of emotion in her nature bursts forth all the more impetuously, and sways her all the more violently by reason of the constant restraint to which she invariably subjects all her feelings. Catherine's mother is an utterly inconsequent woman, from whom she seems to have inherited nothing; her father passed from earth in her early youth (she is twenty-six years of age when we are first introduced to her); from him she seems to have inherited largely, and in her eyes he is a saint; around his memory her deepest affections cluster, and her loyalty to all that she conceives to have been his wishes is touching in the extreme. She rules her mother tenderly and lovingly, as though she were the mother and her mother a delicate child needing incessant care. Her two sisters she also regards as entrusted to her charge, and as they are both her juniors by several years, her guardianship of them seems perfectly natural; the elder of the two seems an easy, graceful girl of no very marked proclivities, but Rose, the youngest member of the family, is a very decided character, passionately devoted to the violin, which she plays superbly. Possessed with an indomitable will and an irrepressible desire for freedom, her spirit naturally rebels against the quiet domineering of her elder sister whom she really loves, however, and who decidedly loves her; but the woman and the girl do not understand each other, and they present to our mind one of those vivid contrasts we often meet in members of the same family, which seem to forcibly illustrate the truth of the now widely accepted theory that flesh and blood relationships are not necessarily those of spirit.

Robert Elsmere and Catherine Leyburn have one very great and important point of resemblance which forms a solid basis for their mutual attraction; they are both extremely conscientious; he is diffident about proposing to her at first, on account of his deep sense of his own unworthiness; she refuses him when he first offers himself to her (though she truly loves him), from an exaggerated sense of duty, and of her importance as the guardian and director of her mother's household. When the mother finds out the true state of affairs, she almosts insists upon Catherine accepting Robert, and after tears and prayers and much inward conflict, she consents to be the wife of a man whom she admires as well as loves, and who regards her more in the light of a divinity than of an ordinary woman.

His marriage marks a very important epoch in the young clergyman's life; he goes to Surrey, and immediately upon his establishment as rector of Murewell, a mere village with a population chiefly composed of rustics, he begins to effect many decided improvements in the condition of the place; he and his wife are all in all to each other, she seconds his every enterprise, enters heart and soul into every detail of his parish work, and proves herself in all things a woman of the noblest self-denying effort and charity; benevolence and self-forgetfulness come naturally to her; she has been always accustomed to do and think for others. Among the poor, the sick, the lonely, the erring, the outcast, she is a ministering angel and it is plain to see that Mrs. Ward, in faithfully depicting the heroic sanctity of a woman with whose religious views she is by no means fully in sympathy, is as unbiased as one well can be by any predilections of her own; but Catherine, a St. Elizabeth though she may be in many ways, is continually displaying her lack of breadth of mind; her's is a noble heart, but her intellect is narrow; with all her goodness she is decidedly illiberal in sentiment and constantly falls into the error common to all strictly orthodox persons; she can deal very tenderly with sinners, even with criminals she can be gentle, but for honest heretics she has no mercy. Heresy in her eyes is crime; unorthodox opinion is worse in her eyes than flagrant immorality, and with all her own honest purity of heart and life she can be far more lenient with unblushing vice than with honest skepticism; errors of opinion are worse offenses in her eyes than sins of the deepest dye. On one occasion when Mr. Langham has visited them and succeeded in awakening the affections of her sister Rose, who was on a visit to Murewell at the time, and the girl asks her elder sister if she could have married a man who did not believe in Christ, she answers impetuously: "To me it would not be marriage."

Such a woman could not be expected to sympathize with, or even tolerate the slightest departure from the very strictest line of evangelical orthodoxy, and the very serious defect in her habit of thought which causes her such bitter sorrow a little later on, is manifested most unpleasantly in her inability to admire the sterling excellence of a man like Henry Grey because, despite his deep and noble earnestness and integrity, he is not a believer in the orthodox interpretation of the Bible.

A very important, interesting, but in some respects decidedly forbidding, character is Mr. Wendover, the squire of Murewell, a man nearer seventy than sixty, without family and seemingly almost devoid of all human sympathy; a veritable literary fossil, a man of prodigious intellect, a voluminous author, an erudite scholar, but a cynic and misanthrope living almost the life of a recluse, with no near relative or friend to share his magnificent mansion, save a curious, flighty sister, a strange little lady, whom one feels often ready to pity and sometimes almost to despise. This squire is the possessor of a splendid library; his collection of books is unsurpassed anywhere in England.

Robert Elsmere loves books and longs to devour the contents of the squire's library, and so long as the squire has been absent traveling on the continent, the rector has enjoyed freedom of access to the Hall library. On the return of the squire his agent, Henslowe (a thoroughly detestable man), prejudices his employer against the rector on account of the disgraceful condition of a portion of the squire's estate which is allowed to remain in a disgusting, disease-engendering condition; the squire trusts his agent and believes the lies he pours into his ears against Elsmere, falsehoods he is the more ready to accept as truth by reason of his prejudice against clergymen and enthusiasts in general, and Elsmere is both a clergyman and an enthusiast.

For some time the rector works as best he can, doing a large amount of work in and out of the church, and carrying on important literary labor of a historical kind, under decided difficulties and at considerable expense, on account of his determination to be under no obligation to the squire, whose books he insisted on returning to their owner immediately a misunderstanding had arisen between the two gentlemen, brought about by the rector's statement concerning Mile End being disregarded by the squire in favor of Henslowe's garbled account, intended to provoke hostility between his employer and the philanthropic rector.

After a while a terrible disorder breaks out in the wretched tumble-down hovels of that forsaken district. The squire is abroad at the time, but arrives home just soon enough to be brought face to face with the frightful misery of the inhabitants of this shamefully neglected portion of his property, and to witness with his own eyes the heroic fortitude of Mr. and Mrs. Elsmere.

Squire Wendover is a man who cannot be moved to the outward expression of deep feeling; his nature is of that painfully repressed type common to a school of intensely rationalistic literary minds. Such a nature is not however without feeling, and while a man of that caliber will not say much, he will freely place his purse at the disposal of an intensely sincere and thoroughly practical, philanthropic enthusiast like Robert Elsmere, when he has become convinced that the energetic worker has solid grounds for his undertakings. From that day the squire and the rector became fast friends; in many a country walk they enjoyed each other's society immensely, as two men of diametrically opposite temperaments and yet with many tastes in common frequently do. As we see them constantly together, we readily trace the softening, mellowing influence, almost imperceptibly exerted upon the aged cynic by the youthful and impetuous enthusiast; and even more clearly do we observe how the aged scholar (who delights in nothing so much as in the destruction of all that appears to him as superstitious folly) gradually undermines Elsmere's religious superstructure of dogmatic creed and ecclesiastical usage, but never does he seem to shake the young clergyman's vivid apprehension of God in the universe and in the human soul. At this period (the most intensely trying one imaginable in the career of a young man of Elsmere's temper) an extremely ascetic priest of the most fervid Catholic evangelical type urges Elsmere to join in a "retreat" at a neighboring village, and there seek to overcome what the priest regards as the most pernicious effects of religious free-thinking, at the foot of the altar of personal self-surrender to the voice of the church, in the most uncompromising manner. Mr. Newcome, the Anglican priest, not at all an uncommon figure in "high church" circles both in England and America, is an unquestionably good man; a man, however, who sees nothing outside of orthodoxy but damnation. Such a narrow view cannot commend itself to the budding and ever-expanding genius of our hero; and thus Newcome must turn away saddened and depressed, half in anger, half in pity, from the man for whom he entertains a warm, disinterested friendship, but with whom he cannot possibly associate after he has discovered his persistence in heretical opinion. Once in a while this thin, pleading, but commanding figure in long, black clerical attire, appears on the scene of Elsmere's work; but at length very seldom, and then only when he feels impelled by what he regards as the voice of the Almighty, to call back his wandering servant to the fold. Here again we are constrained to pause an instant to most warmly commend the authoress's exquisite fairness in dealing with the representatives of all shades of opinion and schools of thought. She paints the ascetic priest as a noble fellow, while she shows up as plainly as can be done, the defects in persons whose opinions coincide far more nearly with her own, and it is for this reason that we regard Mrs. Ward as an epoch-making woman in the field of romantic religious literature; for if the future church of humanity, foreseen by prophetic minds through all the ages, is ever to be established, its members must be those who can allow no intellectual differences or agreements to becloud their judgment or pervert their will.

Mr. Newcome and Catherine Elsmere are neither of them liberal-minded, but they are both truly excellent in their peculiar ways; both are deeply in earnest in proclaiming and maintaining what they feel (and think they know) to be divine truth; both are evangelicals, he of the Catholic, she of the Protestant type; but they both insult reason to feed hysterical emotion; both are narrow and intellectually very shortsighted. Let either of them present their hearts to the judgment of the sincere of all persuasions, and they immediately invite and obtain the deepest affection and most loving appreciation from all whose affection is worth the having; but let them present their minds for inspection to the just and liberal, and the verdict pronounced must be that they are deficient, lamentably so in critical ability, and painfully predisposed to exalt dogma to the very throne of heaven.

A crisis is speedily reached in Elsmere's mental evolution; he soon finds himself no longer able to remain in the Church of England as a minister; were he a layman, he could continue, no doubt, to worship in his accustomed place, but his keen sense of honor sternly revolts against all endeavor to effect a compromise between conviction and appearance.

Some of Mrs. Ward's very best writing is where she shows up in its true light the evasive position held by many clergymen who retain their livings only through their personal popularity and influence, or their singular power to twist language and give words a meaning they do not possess to the ears of ordinary listeners. Robert Elsmere must leave the church, he will not wait to be turned out or even allow himself to be tried for heresy; he will go out, and his leaving the church thus suggests far more topic for thought and discussion than a series of lectures or even volumes could exhaust.

We know that some men who remain in a church while they are not in sympathy with its dogmas are thoroughly sincere, and as their course commends itself to their own consciences they are undoubtedly right in staying where they are; such men, or at least, the greatest of them, have something of the work to do attempted by Savonarola; but was Savonarola successful in reforming the church from within? History, alas! answers with a decided negative. But then it can easily be argued that Savonarola's work was to purge out immorality rather than to perfect a change in religious doctrine, consequently in a licentious age the will of the ruling party opposed him, while reformers in the Protestant communions of to-day have the sympathy of the masses on their side, who only need a more liberal education to bring them out of the wilderness of dogmatic theology into the fair promised land of complete freedom from intellectual and ceremonial restriction.

Archdeacon Farrar of Westminster is fully as unorthodox as the much revered and lamented Dean Stanley, also of Westminster, whose "History of the Jewish Church" is almost as radical as the utterances of the celebrated Colenso, late Bishop of Natal, South Africa. This man, popularly known as Canon Farrar, is, however, in no equivocal position; he is in a most conspicuous position, from which his light shines over the earth as well as over England, as the head of the Broad Church party; but he publicly announces his position, and it is a clearly defined, and to his mind a thoroughly tenable one; he does not tacitly ignore objectionable dogmas, he boldly attacks and refutes them, and while many gifted men and women both in and out of the church cannot agree with his standing where he does while saying what he does, no one with a grain of judgment or an ounce of perception can accuse Farrar of willful temporizing.

In New York City, Heber Newton preaches decided radicalism in an Episcopal church; almost everybody knows what his views are on the Bible, the atonement, and every other leading doctrine of the church. Many people, of course, condemn him for remaining where he is, and declare his position an anachronism of the worst kind, but is it? Is he not one of an ever-enlarging number of excellent and learned men who believe it to be their mission to revise creeds and restate theology within the precincts of the church itself?

Now, many a man has been ignominiously thrust out of the church for entertaining and preaching the very views one can now hear promulgated from avowedly evangelical pulpits almost every day, and certainly twice every Sunday. Why is this but because ecclesiastical authorities are apt to be extremely wary? It does not do to weaken the church, as it would be weakened, were men of great popularity and ability constantly thrust out of its body; and it is but fact, that personal influence, more than all besides, usually influences the final decision. Can we afford to lose the man? is the chief question asked by those in whom the power to excommunicate resides. For those who toy with their conscience, juggle with words, repress convictions, and make ministerial duties simply matters of business, we can have no sympathy, for while a man has a right to earn his living by preaching what he does believe, he has no right to earn a penny, even were he in destitution, by preaching what he does not believe, or through ingenious processes of prevarication, which are doubtless cleverer but no less sinful than downright lying.

All cant about unpaid ministers is folly. Business is not a disgrace, and those who object to clergymen receiving salaries are never logical in their arguments or apt in their illustrations. The whole question is, How far are you honest? To what extent does your conscience approve your method of obtaining a livelihood? The strictest conscientiousness should be demanded of a clergyman, but no less should be exacted of a business man. Elsmere could not take a penny of the church's money; he could not preach another Sunday after he knew that he did not indorse the words his lips would be compelled to repeat while reading the service, and it is, after all, the liturgy rather than the sermon that most sorely taxes the conscientious liberal.

There are plenty of hymns one can select which do not offend against liberal sentiment, and there is an almost unlimited choice of topics for discourse open to a religious radical, even when in a conservative pulpit; but portions of creeds and litany, as well as the endings of many prayers and collects, place the liberal-minded Episcopal minister in a sorry fix. If he is anything of a mystic, or a Theosophist, he can use every word with the mental reservation that he employs it in the understanding of its hidden meaning, but can an honest man do this in a place where he dare not explain this meaning to his congregation?

In a Swedenborgian place of worship the congregation knows that the Scriptures are understood spiritually, that psalms are not taken in their letter; but the minister in such a church can enter his pulpit with an unfettered tongue and expatiate freely on the hidden meanings of the sacred word. In Robert Elsmere's extremity he very wisely consults with his noble friend, Professor Grey. He makes a flying visit to Oxford, and in his old tutor's sanctum unburdens his mind freely. The gist of Grey's advice is, conceal nothing from your wife; return home instantly and tell her everything. Mr. Grey does not appear, with all his insight, to have sounded the depths of Catherine Elsmere's religious fanaticism, and thus he cannot tell how agonizingly she will suffer when she feels called upon to decide between Christ and her husband, for so the matter must appear to her. Then the question of the father's influence over the little daughter will add fresh pangs to her torture, for remember she regards intellectual orthodoxy as the only passport to heaven and means of redemption from hell. Here a homily on marriage might well be preached, and as Mrs. Mona Caird's question, Is marriage a failure? has not yet lost its interest for the popular mind, we cannot refrain from a hasty analysis of Elsmere's partial mistake in marrying Catherine Leyburn, for it cannot be denied that he and she were both made indescribably wretched in consequence of their terribly ill-matched intellects.

They loved each other truly and tenderly from first to last and were a decided blessing the one to the other; of this there can be no doubt. But is love ALL that is needful to secure a truly happy marriage? Love is blind when not united with wisdom. Affection without reason, heart without head, will always run astray; and where natures may be the purest and ideals the highest, intellectual incompatibility will frequently prove the source of untold misery. Husband and wife need not, and should not, be alike; they may differ widely, but they must not disagree. One may sing and not paint; the other may paint and not sing; but the singer must love pictures and the painter must love song. One temperament may be emotional, the other intellectual, but they must complement, not antagonize each other. Red contrasts with gold or blue, and while these colors are intensely dissimilar, their combination produces charming and harmonious effects.

To all young people contemplating matrimony our exhortation is: Do not sacrifice either heart to head or head to heart. Marriage is a partnership not requiring similarity of attainment in the members of the firm, but imperatively demanding unity without uniformity — harmony as beyond unison. Husband and wife may differ as a soprano voice differs from a basso profundo, or as the music of a violin differs from that of a cornet, but they must be able to sing or play together, so that harmony, not discord, is produced.

Conservative Hebrews and Roman Catholics are quite right in discouraging mixed marriages, for where one is an ardent believer in one system of faith and the other is equally earnest in defending a counter-system, harmony is impossible; and where there are children, what can be more terrible in its effects than a constant jar between parents? Mixed marriages of an objectionable kind are not necessarily marriages where the contracting parties are one Jew and the other Gentile, or one Catholic and the other Protestant, for in San Francisco, for instance, the Jewish Temple Emanu-El, has often presented a delightful picture of true harmony between liberal Jew and liberal Christian. Dr. Stebbins, the Unitarian pastor, has conducted public Thanksgiving services with Dr. Cohn and Dr. Voorsanger in the Temple, and who could decide where the vital differences were in the theology of these three estimable gentlemen? But let a Hebrew or a Unitarian marry a rigid Presbyterian of the old school; or let a devout Roman Catholic marry a bigoted Protestant or a skeptic, how can harmony prevail? People who have convictions must make their convictions the basis of their union. Physical charms may quickly disappear, accomplishments may cease to inspire admiration, but deep-seated convictions are permanent. Two unformed minds may marry in early youth, and if mutually loving and sympathetic, may form themselves into one. Two formed minds who know they agree on all vital points, can marry with the greatest safety; but an unformed mind, coupled with an ardent progressive temper, like that of Robert Elsmere in his early twenties, uniting itself with a thoroughly set mind like that of Catherine Leyburn, must inevitably bring bitter sorrow; for they are both so intense in their feelings that not to feel alike is to suffer beyond description. A youth's marriage with a woman, mentally mature, though still young in years and physically youthful, must be a mistake, unless the young man's mind is so open to his wife's influence that she can be his guide, or at least his companion in intellectual pursuits.

In this age the intellect cannot and will not be patiently submissive to the heart. Intellect and affection themselves insist upon being married in every reasonable and healthy individual, and though goodness of heart is the mainspring of all virtue, a good heart and a level head are both needed when two young people agree to enter upon a compact, the most sacred and binding on earth.

As Elsmere's mind expands ever wider and wider, opening like a beautiful flower to the sunshine and pure air of fresh progressive thought, Catherine retires deeper and deeper into herself and sees in her husband's earnest and successful efforts to bless his fellows, nothing better than a fight against Christ and his gospel. Very slowly and by very painful steps is she at length led to believe that after all he may be following the Master in a way she knows not of, but she never enters fully into his work; she cannot. She remains in the old way, drinking old wine from an old bottle, while he cannot partake of any other than the new wine of the new dispensation from a new bottle, ever expanding in his hands as the new wine ferments within it.

Robert Elsmere's theology is sublime; his work Christlike in the highest sense. He reaches the secularists on their own ground in their own halls; he shows them the worthlessness and the wrong of their incendiary and shallow methods of attack on all religious things. He reconceives the Christ; he strips the man of Nazareth of all fictitious adornment, and like Count Tolstoi of Russia, he leaves a magnificent human worker and exemplar, as loving as the model of Renan, but far more vigorous and manly. He is able, through a thorough identification with workingmen, to bring to them the practical gospel they so sorely need. In his hands social and political problems are taken out of the arena of fierce and acrimonious partisanship and placed where they belong in the arena of religious thought and feeling.

Religion is the science of right living. Religio, to bind, means to unite, not to enslave; and when all are bound together in the chains of true co-operative fellowship — when the demon, competition, is cast from out our minds — then, but not till then, will dawn the golden day when

> "Peace shall over all the earth
> Its undimmed splendors fling,
> And the whole earth send back the song
> The blessed angels sing."

LECTURE XXII.

CHRIST RE-CONCEIVED; OR, THE BASIS OF THE NEW RELIGION.

Now that we are engaged in a study of comparative theology, we find ourselves daily more and more in sympathy with the work of Lady Caithness, who, in her "Mystery of the Ages," (the very best book on Theosophy ever published for general readers,) explains to the satisfaction of every genuine scholar and true radical or rationalist (using those terms as their use is justified by etymology), how both the historical and astronomical characters presented to students of mythology are designed to conceal great spiritual truths pertaining to the origin, progress, and destiny of the human soul; truths common to all religious systems and therefore supertheological as theology is ordinarily understood. Now it is with the universal spiritual element in religion, (the science of right living) that we have properly to deal, not with curious speculative theories and historical uncertainties; for until religion is taken out of all particular time and place, and posited in the universal, it is less than religion proper. A religion in the narrow sense in which there may be many religions, it may be, but religion unqualified by article or adjective, it cannot be.

Now a study of the world's several great systems of religion leads every unbiased mind to the conclusion that the spirit of religion is ONE. Religious conceptions are innate in the human soul; and gradually revealed, manifested, expressed, or evolved as the human intellect permits the soul's conviction to filter through it. Such men as Piazza Smythe, the celebrated Scotch astronomer, endeavor to account for the great Egyptian pyramid only on the supposition of supernatural miracle; but in so doing they limit and dwarf man's idea of the Supreme Being, and while striving to honor God they are in reality belittling Him, for what can be smaller or more puerile than the notion that God has to change or supersede law in order to fulfill his own design, or accomplish good to humanity. The student of archaeology traces the gradual development of the human race for perhaps more than 50,000 years, and instead of rejecting the testimony of earth and ocean to the astonishing antiquity of man, gladly avails himself of every means of verifying whatever story of human antiquity tends to clear away the fog of the mysterious, and present to intelligence a comprehensible and rational picture of gradual but incessant human progress.

In this transitional period of thought, it is highly necessary to deal in positive affirmations; nothing short of gnosticism will satisfy the tired intellect and wounded restless heart, worried and disappointed with philosophic agnosticism, (scholarly ignorance). Souls no sooner break away from the traditional view of the Christ, than they feel called upon to re-conceive the Christ, and while this re-conception may be at first inadequate in many respects, it is generally healthful, hopeful, practical, and sublime. The Christ idea is in reality, however, a much larger idea than either the orthodox or heterodox imagine it to be. According to Theosophy, it is much broader than any ideal which can find its fulfillment in either a supernatural incarnation of deity, once in the history of the planet; or in the life of an excellent but, nevertheless, imperfect man; and it is to the latter view unfortunately that liberal religious thought almost invariably turns. Now the Christ idea must not be confounded with the personal appearance of any Messiah, nor with the biography of any hero, no matter how noble. In Egypt the Christ idea found its exemplification many thousands of years before Christ, in the embodiment, according to ancient tradition, of the angel of the sun (Osiris).

The life of this "incarnate god" is clearly written on many an antique scroll, and shown forth to perfection in the interior construction of the great pyramid; but to all who are in any degree familiar with the hidden truths of Egyptian Theosophy, the personal career of the embodied Osiris is known to be a delineation of the universal experiences of the human soul, of which the sun is the symbol according to the ritual of antiquity.

Gerald Massey and other authors of his school of thought have thrown much valuable light on the astronomical aspects of mythology, but it is reserved for the true Theosophist to penetrate deeper into the spirit and explain how astronomical facts as well as personal histories have all been pressed into the service of a sublime and universal philosophy (or rather science), in which the heavenly bodies as well as the lives of men have all been employed as material for illustrating the mystery of all ages — God manifest in flesh. In Asia, Buddha, Krishna and Zoroaster mean vastly more than solitary individuals; but a little close inspection of two seemingly divergent theories will demonstrate the inseparable unity of the universal with the individual idea. Osiris, Buddha, Krishna, Zoroaster, Christ, are all titles expressive of spiritual dignity won only through victory over sense; therefore these titles may have been given to many different personages in the history of the race, but they all mean one who has triumphed in spiritual conflict over every enemy of righteousness, one in whom the divine light of the soul (the central sun around which all the planets of intellect and satellites of sense must obediently revolve in perfectly harmonious accord) is revealed in its true splendor, — made manifest through the veil of flesh, which, from being the opaque veil of concealment hiding the soul, has become through a completion of all necessary processes of initiation, a transparent window, a perfectly diaphanous medium for divine revealment.

Now though Zoroaster in particular has puzzled chronologists, some of whom have made him live six thousand years before Christ, others in the time of Abraham, others again as a contemporary of Pythagoras, so that his literal history seems all in the air, the enlightened Parsee explains that Zoroaster is a title, not a family surname, and therefore may have been borne in different ages and places by different individuals, each of whom attained to the perfect life of complete control over the lower self;

thus the historical difficulty is removed and all the dates assigned may be correct.

An Oriental tradition concerning Buddha is to the effect that Vishnu, (the second person of the Brahmin trinity,) incarnates himself whenever the world is in special need of a deliverer; this belief stripped of all encumbering fallacies signifies simply that whenever there is a great demand or imperative need for spiritual enlightenment on earth, the need is met, the demand supplied; thus the Indian prince Gautama, the hero of Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia," was only one of many Buddhas, and while his period was about 550 B.C., the records of a Buddha's appearing many thousand years earlier need not be disputed.

The Jews of old were always looking for the advent of a Messiah, and some of the orthodox to-day expect a personal deliverer soon to appear to restore all Israel to Palestine. Progressive Jewish thought, however, favors the impersonal view and makes the Messiah the entire people when redeemed from error, so soon as their messianic mission among all nations is accomplished; but as the lesser may always be contained in the greater, the personal may always be included in the universal; thus the true idea of the achievement of a single individual prior to the glorification of an entire community and eventually of all mankind, is simply that there must always be some fruit on the Tree of Life ripened earlier than other specimens on the same tree. The personal Christ, as an exemplar, is a most reasonable and helpful expression of the Christ idea, for the pattern life of one who has already attained is the model for others who are striving to excel; not simply a model in the sense of a pattern for imitation, but what is far more to the point, the embodied fulfillment in history of a state to which the entire race is ever aspiring, which state is thereby proved attainable by reason of its being already an accomplished fact. The Christ in history is a perfect human model, an ideal man, and is common in some degree to all countries and to all periods.

Any conception of an imperfect Christ is a scholar's transitional conception caused by looking at the picture of the ideal man through the glasses of distorted history. Neither Strauss or Renan have caught anything like a full view of the Christ idea in history; they have carefully studied literature on its superficial side and have compiled interesting biographical narratives, but the work of both these authors is very incomplete. Many men have struck out from orthodoxy into religious liberalism through reading such books, which as contributions to literature are histories of evidence, elaborate treatises on the validity or invalidity of human testimony. For the inner meaning and spiritual import of narratives designed to set forth esoteric verities such authors have no affections, and of this deeper meaning in what they discuss they know nothing; their minds are legal, judicial, external; fair and honorable without doubt in intent, but prejudiced nevertheless; for while they show themselves thoroughly determined to allow Christian evidence no favor denied to evidence on any other side, their positive prejudices against the Christian system often warp their judgment as it warps that of most skeptics who are only too delighted to find flaws in a system they have grown to despise, doubtless by reason of the errors which have so long disfigured it. Such people desire to flog the character of Jesus over the shoulders of an ecclesiastical tyranny which has usurped the name whilst it has denied and forsaken the spirit of the Christ, and so long as this reactionary feeling continues, "free thought" will be in many instances a misapplied term, for no thought can possibly be free till the mind of the thinker is completely cured of the disease of prejudice from which so many otherwise candid and able men are at present suffering grievously. Concerning the proper estimate of Christian testimony when placed side by side with other testimony and the actual tendency of orthodox works on Christian evidence to make infidels of reasoners, their position is impregnable, for it is indeed pitiful to witness the shameful special pleading of men who ought to know and do better when they are endeavoring to bolster up a system to which they are attached, at the expense of every other system on earth.

Unless it be among Unitarians by whom all religions are treated with an unusual degree of fairness, the divinity class in a college is the place where Christianity is proved true by processes of the most unwarrantable assumption. Christianity is a client to be defended at all risk, and every possible artifice by which mental ingenuity can possibly be pressed into the service is strained to its utmost to defend the one system which is alone adjudged defensible, while the very vilest excrescences of other systems are taken as representative of the systems of which they are but disfiguring accretions.

On Friday, January 18th, 1889, in the First Congregational Church of San Francisco, Mr. Moody, during his Bible Reading, had a kind word to say for almost everybody and manifested royal liberality of soul when speaking of the Chinese; but when he alluded to Buddhism he was guilty of the most egregious though doubtless guiltless misrepresentation; he no doubt believed what he said, but he spoke untruly, for Buddhism no more teaches the inferiority of woman than Christianity does, and while no doubt one can find utterances of Buddhists and many more of Brahmins and Mohammedans speaking contemptuously of woman, is Mr. Moody so blind to the teaching of the present day as not to know that Paul's Epistles are the armory from which the opponents not only of female suffrage but of female pastors often draw their ammunition? Jesus and Paul did not always teach alike. Jesus did work to emancipate women from Oriental slavery as far as his benign influence extended, but Paul was never fully liberated himself, and on Paul more than on Jesus is the edifice of Christian sacerdotalism made to rest; and of this system Mr. Moody is in great measure a representative, advocate and exponent, even though his pronounced Protestantism leads him to object to the word sacerdos (a priest). Now Buddha never taught woman's inferiority to man, while the absurd dogma of her having to be re-embodied as a male ere she could enjoy immortality, is a most ignorant misconception of a prominent feature of a certain school of Oriental philosophy not unknown in Europe and America, which teaches that the human soul must be successively embodied in male and female forms to gain all possible earthly experience; those who favor this doctrine believe necessarily in the absolute equality of the sexes, and maintain that man and woman differ only in external organism, for if woman ever needs re-embodiment as man, man equally needs re-embodiment as woman. We have simply introduced this criticism of Mr. Moody's misrepresentation of Buddhism as an example of the frightfully pernicious course pursued by Christian apologists in general, and if criticism does no more than call attention to this manifest and shameful unfairness on the part of alleged disciples of an impartial Christ, it will certainly not be offered in vain. We must now very briefly point out where a misconception of the Christ often prevents an intelligent re-conception, and that it often does so is patent to all discerning readers of current literature. The life of Jesus is a representative, an ideal life, no matter whether historical or otherwise; the actions of the Christ are recorded as examples of universal godliness, therefore it is but right and reasonable to submit them to the most searching scrutiny.

On a few occasions Jesus is said by critics to have lost his temper and allowed uncontrolled passion to disfigure his conduct. Objectors to his life being a model life dwell particularly on his cursing a barren fig-tree and driving money changers out of the temple. Now when these acts are misinterpreted as ventings of personal spleen, or displays of vulgar indignation against objects and individuals which have disappointed, annoyed or injured him, they certainly are serious blemishes and prove him to have been decidedly imperfect;

but when these same exhibitions of manifestly righteous indignation are taken for what they really are, protests against hypocrisy and injustice, they enhance the grandeur of a character they would otherwise disfigure.

The Palestinian fig-tree has no right to be covered with leaves until it is bearing fruit, for its striking peculiarity is that when covered with leaves, travelers seeing it from a distance know they will find fruit thereon. A tree covered with leaves but destitute of fruit would lead tired, hungry, thirsty travelers out of their way. It is then an expressive symbol of hypocrites and of institutions which promise much and perform nothing. To blast it is to defeat the schemes of pretenders; its removal is a public benefaction. Now an important part of the work of a genuine reformer is to abate nuisances and put down all deceit and pretence to the utmost of his ability. In the temple courts at Jerusalem, oxen, sheep and birds were sold for sacrifice. Three times a year when crowds of country folk came to the temple, an immense trade was done by the traders in the outer courts of the temple. While they were honest they were in no sense a nuisance, but when through their unprincipled extortion they made the house of God "a den of thieves," it was the plain duty of a lover of justice and humanity to drive them out. But why did a company of men allow themselves to be driven out by one? Why did they not take a whip and drive him out who dared to interfere with them? Surely the answer is not far to seek. Jesus driving out usurers, extortioners, with a whip of small cords, is a forcible picture of human conscience, aroused by burning words of manly protest against iniquity — conscience being itself the whip which forces from the temple courts the self-convicted usurer.

Jesus spoke to the consciences of these men, he awoke within them a burning sense of shame at their own wrong doing, and maybe threw the tables down in his earnest protest against wrong, while the humiliated sinners could not resist the force of his sublime appeal. He was not injured, but as the friend of the people standing for the public good, he resolutely (regardless of any possible risk to himself) put himself between the people and their oppressors.

Jesus, it is frequently said, was the friend of the poor in the wrong way, because he pronounced poverty blessed. His teachings on this subject were, however, only to the effect that ill-gotten gain is accursed, while honest poverty is no disgrace. Unlike incendiary atheistic anarchists, he would effect reform, not by denouncing all capitalists as devils, but by moving the hearts and minds of rich and poor alike to reconstruct society on a basis of justice. Anarchists and nihilists have wrongs to right, grievances to redress, it is true, but incendiary speeches and writings can never bring about reform. Rich and poor alike are amenable to justice, and while the wage system is not the ultimate, it cannot be abolished by violent means, though it will be outgrown through preaching and practice pertaining to the new era.

Jesus, as a co-operator at war with competition in all its phases, is the central figure in the new theology. The received human Christ has a special message to discontented workingmen, and can find his way to the hearts and minds of the laboring classes at the east end of London. We read with surprise the words of Bishop Potter concerning rivalry and competition, as published in Scribner's Magazine, Feb. 1889, in an article on "The Competitive Element in Modern Life." That such utterances should proceed from a Christian bishop proves afresh that a re-conception of Christ is indeed a necessity to-day. Competition is infernal; rivalry is diabolical; and a man or woman must be short-sighted indeed who does not see that lawful ambition to excel is not desire to get ahead of some one else, but to contribute one's proper share to the success of a grand performance on the stage of life, in which every part needs to be well sustained by thoroughly competent actors. A theatrical simile may serve to illustrate the truth we seek to convey. A grand opera needs that every part be admirably taken. The star system is an offence against propriety and shocks all sensitive lovers of good music, for to have one part taken superbly by one person and all other parts taken badly, or at least indifferently, mutilates the composer's idea and effectually spoils the performance. In an ideal opera troupe all are stars, all excel, all shine, not as rivals, but in galaxies necessary to the completeness of the scene. If one is honored, all share the honor; if one is deficient, the effect of everybody's work is marred. So in human life: no one can rise by another's fall, and none need fall through another's rise. Co-operation is the key-note of social order, while the ambition to excel nobly is the antithesis of rivalry.

APPENDIX.

REVIEW OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT; OR, THE SCIENCE OF THE SOUL AND THE STARS."

The most singular work recently published by the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, Chicago, bearing the above title, is deserving of more than a cursory glance. Though it is by no means a thoroughly theosophical work, and has been severely criticised in the Path and other periodicals, yet it contains much interesting and useful information. Its authorship is curiously anonymous, as a glance at its title-page will show. We ask, "Who is 'X'?" and echo answers, "Who?" A quotation from Rev. chaps. i. and v. constitutes the prelude to the work: "Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter; THE MYSTERY OF THE SEVEN STARS which thou sawest in my right hand." Is the reader to infer that the mysterious author, whose name is represented by a sign, is gifted like unto John the Evangelist or Swedenborg? The work is dedicated "To the Budding Spirituality of the Occident and the Rising Genius of the Western Race." That our readers may be informed at the outset of this review of the ground plan of the work we place before them its preface, which is as follows: —

"The reasons which have induced the writer to undertake the responsibility of presenting a purely occult treatise to the world, are briefly these: —

"For nearly twenty years the writer has been deeply engaged investigating the hidden realms of occult force, and, as the results of these mystical labors were considered to be of great value and real worth by a few personal acquaintances who were also seeking light, he was finally induced to condense, as far as practicable, the general results of these researches into a series of lessons for private occult study. This idea was ultimately carried out and put into external form; the whole, when completed, presenting the dual aspects of occult lore as seen and realized in the soul and the stars, corresponding to the microcosm and the macrocosm of ancient Egypt and Chaldea, and thus giving a brief epitome of Hermetic philosophy.[1]

"Having served their original purpose, external circumstances have compelled their preparation for a much wider circle of minds. The chief reason urging to this step was the strenuous efforts now being systematically put forth to poison the budding spirituality of the western mind, and to fasten upon its mediumistic mentality the subtle, delusive dogmas of Karma and Re-incarnation, as taught by the sacerdotalisms of the decaying Orient.

"From the foregoing statement it will be seen that this work is issued with a definite purpose, namely, to explain the true spiritual connection between God and man, the soul and the stars, and to reveal the real truths of both Karma and Re-incarnation as they actually exist in nature, stripped of all priestly interpretation. The definite statements made in regard to these subjects are absolute facts, in so far as embodied man can understand them through the symbolism of human language, and the writer defies contradiction by any living authority who possesses the spiritual right to say, 'I know.'

"During these twenty years of personal intercourse with the exalted minds of those who constitute the brethren of light, the fact was revealed that long ages ago the Orient had lost the use of the true spiritual compass of the soul, as well as the real secrets of its own Theosophy. As a race, they have been, and still are, traveling the descending arc of this racial cycle, whereas the western race have been slowly working their way upward through matter upon the ascending arc. Already it has reached the equator of its mental and spiritual development. Therefore the writer does not fear the ultimate results of the occult knowledge put forth in the present work, during this, the great mental crisis of the race.

"Having explained the actual causes which impelled the writer to undertake this responsibility, it is also necessary to state most emphatically that he does not wish to convey the impression to the reader's mind that the Orient is destitute of spiritual truth. On the contrary, every genuine student of occult lore is justly proud of the snow-white locks of old Hindustan, and thoroughly appreciates the wondrous stores of mystical knowledge concealed within the astral vortices of the Hindu branch of the Aryan race. In India, probably more than in any other country, are the latent forces and mysteries of nature the subject of thought and study. But alas! it is not a progressive study. The descending arc of this spiritual force keeps them bound to the dogmas, traditions, and externalisms of the decaying past, whose real secrets they cannot now penetrate. The ever-living truths concealed beneath the symbols in the astral light are hidden from this view by the setting sun of their spiritual cycle. Therefore, the writer only desires to impress upon the reader's candid mind the fact that his earnest effort is to expose that particular section of Buddhistic Theosophy (esoteric, so called) that would fasten the cramping shackles of theological dogma upon the rising genius of the western race. It is the delusive Oriental systems against which his efforts are directed, and not the race nor the mediumistic individuals who uphold and support them; for 'omnia vincit veritas' is the life motto of

THE AUTHOR."

We are entirely unacquainted with the particular species of Buddhistic Theosophy referred to. The Theosophical Society bears no resemblance to the system characterized in the above preface. Why cannot writers put forward their honest convictions without insinuating evil of others? Evil speaking is characteristic of no true adept. "Truth conquers all things" indeed, and whoever adopts this motto for his own should remember the precept, "Overcome evil with good," or he may soon find himself a "mediumistic individual" controlled by "cramping shackles" of prejudice and misconception.

The introduction to Part I. inculcates many good ideas. The diagram which is its frontispiece is an ambitious and ingenious attempt to represent "the realm of spirit." The background is black; in the centre is a seven-pointed star, the points of which represent the seven prismatic hues, — red, violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, and orange. The central sphere or body of the star contains a central eye, enclosed within a triangle, the sides of which are marked with the words Light, Love, Live. Surrounding this central figure are seven spheres, designated as follows, according to the names of the seven representative angels: —

At the foot of the figure are the following quotations from the 1st chapter of the 4th Gospel: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Though the seven angels are distinctly Kabalistic and the quotation Græco-Christian, there is nothing necessarily incongruous in this grouping. As the Egyptians doubtless originally conveyed instruction in the mysteries first to the Hebrews and then to the Greeks, Christianity undeniably perpetuated many Egyptian secrets, which it veiled from the multitude in the symbols of the church and the ritual of secret orders.

Section 1, Chapter I., dealing with Involution, supplies us with some extraordinary theories. In our judgment the words "unconscious" and "motionless" cannot reasonably be applied to "Divinity"; but of course there is an unpenetrated, though not necessarily impenetrable life, which not even the wisest has fully analyzed. Would it not be advisable, in view of the "great mystery," to be cautious in the use of negative adjectives? Is it not extremely probable that what seems to us unconscious or motionless is more conscious and more active than aught we comprehend? and do not scientific revelations in these days support this supposition? "The whole universe is filled with the Deific presence of God" is, no doubt, an accurate statement, and doubtless it is also true that "the universe is boundless and unlimited, — a circle whose circumference is everywhere and whose centre is nowhere"; and also that "the universe is dual, and consists of the manifest and the non-manifest." But the language is in one instance tautological, and in neither case easy to be comprehended. We should say the centre is everywhere and the circumference nowhere were we speaking of infinity, but perhaps our definition is no clearer than the one we have quoted; however, it seems clearer to us, and may seem so to some at least of our readers, therefore we append it. The explanation of the diagram is simple, and we give it in the words of the book, as we deem it well worthy of consideration: "The central triad represents Love, Wisdom, and Crown" (the Hebrew word kepher signifies truth — in this connection, though, crown is the literal translation); "the seven-pointed star the seven rays issuing therefrom; the seven circles show the seven angelic worlds formed from the seven active principles; the names Cassiel, Michael, etc., are Kabalistical ones for the Sephiroth, while the words above and below show their attributes."

In Chapter II. matter is described as "the polar opposite of manifested spirit," the reaction of spiritual action. Evolution is correctly defined from the Latin e and voluo (to unroll). "Man, in his physical body, is a perfect epitome of the planet upon which he lives, while the celestial worlds find their perfect expression in his soul." "Every known 'thing' is dependent upon a something else, and all things, therefore, eventually dependent upon each other." Such passages teach very good Theosophy, and whoever may be their author, the reader cannot but be instructed by their perusal. "Evolution is dependent upon involution" is another great truth.

As in the Buddhistic idea of man there are seven "principles," so is it with the Kabalistic. The definitions are as follows: —

1. The Spiritual; creative. The Word.
2. The Astral; realm of design. The Idea.

3. The Aerial;	realm of force.	Power.
4. The Mineral;	phenomenal.	Justice.
5. The Vegetable;	life.	Beauty.
6. The Animal;	consciousness.	Love.
7. The Human;	mind.	Glory.

The author does not claim any originality for these views, but declares they have been known to Hermetic initiates for at least a thousand generations. Hermes Trismegistus, the great Prince of Egyptian hierophants, distinctly declared, "The Universe is from God, and man from the Universe." If the first two chapters of Genesis are studied in the light of the Kabala, the Bible student will find no conflict in the two accounts of creation, as the first refers to the spiritual from God, the second to the physical from the "sons of God."

Concerning sex in spirit the author contends that the male and female forms are always distinctly preserved. This doctrine is steadfastly maintained in Mrs. Richmond's "Soul and its Embodiments," though that work teaches quite differently on the question of repeated embodiments. "Twin souls are related to each other primarily as brother and sister, and finally as man and wife." Many very good ideas on marriage are set forth, and asceticism is frowned upon, except in cases where physical continence is the result of inward purity. All metaphysicians are bound to agree that when impure desires are permitted to run riot in the mind, physical abstinence from indulgence is no safeguard from the attacks of evil influences. On the question of celibacy the author says, "Upon one plane it becomes a delusion and a snare; but upon a higher plane it contains all the elements of a glorious truth." This statement we know to be true. The affections must be spiritualized before any outward expression of purity can be genuine; and as our secret thoughts are magnets, attracting unseen influences, it is impossible to lay too much stress on purity of thought. Of this we may rest assured: no hypocritical sanctimony or slavish prudery can protect any one against unseen dangers, however much it may throw a fictitious halo around an earthly reputation.

Section 2 opens with a dissertation on "Incarnation and Re-incarnation." While the author may be correct in some of his comments upon ancient sacerdotal systems, his style is exaggerated, and little that he has to say on this subject can be called luminous. Evidently he is prejudiced against "re-incarnation," and there is nothing like prejudice for concealing truth. Many of the assertions in this section misrepresent the doctrine; the "Inversive Brethren," against whom we are warned, have probably inspired much that is here written; and then with cunning subtlety warned readers against others. The arguments against "re-incarnation" are often ludicrously inconsistent. They have a value, however, in showing how very little can really be advanced in opposition to the doctrine. Do not let us be understood to say that none of the views put forward concerning the spiritual world and the transit of the soul from planet to planet are correct; we believe many of them to be true, but we do say most emphatically, that the arguments amount to nothing in disproof of the idea he is combating. On the contrary, his assertion proves, rather than disproves, what he seeks to condemn.

Notwithstanding a perfect diatribe against "re-incarnation" in general, in three particular classes of instances it is said to take place: 1st. Still-born children and those not allowed to come to maturity. 2d. "Natural born idiots." 3d. "Messianic incarnation by exalted souls, for the special purpose of enlightening the race." No doubt these three classes are represented in "re-incarnation," but are they the only ones?

"The Hermetic Constitution of Man" makes a very interesting chapter. The seven divisions, counting upward, are: A, The physical form; B, an electro-vital body; C, an astral form; D, the animal soul; E, the spiritual body; F, the divine soul; G, the pure spirit entity itself; the divine Ego, which is the divine atom of life, the central spiritual sun of the microcosm. The author proceeds to defend his system at the expense of a supposed "Buddhism" which is his pet aversion. If the theories stated were not connected with abuse of this curious caricature of Buddhism, they would be very readable; but this constant attacking something the author lamentably misconceives, is belittling to the work and irritating to the non-partisan searcher for truth. Could "The Light of Egypt" be re-written with the obnoxious elements expurgated, it would be a valuable theosophical work for reference; as it is, it engenders and fosters much needless hostility.

The chapter on "Karma" is often amusing by reason of the singular manner in which it confounds "Karma" with the astral light.

We find, despite this extreme paucity of reason displayed in connection with a prejudged theme, much interesting theorizing on the successive races of mankind, which, according to our author, were:

1st, gold; 2d, silver; 3d, copper. Amid a mass of rubbish and misstatement we pick up a beautiful gem of thought: "Do good, not for the sake of gaining good thereby, but for the sake of simple goodness and virtue alone." If "Karma cannot be interfered with," it can be outlived and outgrown; the law cannot be changed; but our life to-day can atone for our past follies. This all Theosophy teaches, though possibly some individual Theosophists are not very happy in some of their expressions on the subject.

What is said on "Mediumship, its Nature and Mysteries" (chap. IV., sec. 2), contains a good share of sound metaphysical teaching. This chapter could and may be profitably studied by all Spiritualists, and those seeking information concerning Spiritualism. Section 3 treats upon "The Soul, its Nature and Attributes," headed with this sentence from Plutarch: "The divine spirit is to the soul what the soul is to the body;" and ends with another great axiom, "Know the Divinity within you, that you may know the Divine One, of which your soul is a ray." "Every soul is immortal by virtue of its community with God." Albertus Magnus heads a chapter on "Mortality and Immortality," decidedly a fine production. Chapter III., "The Dark Satellite," will interest lovers of the uncanny. Chapter IV., "The Triumph of the Soul, Adeptship," contains salutary advice, though here again the advancing student must learn to select the wheat from the chaff, and not mistake acrimony for wisdom. Another septenary table is here given, defining the seven senses.

Physical senses.	Soul senses.
1. Touch.	1. The power to psychometrize.
2. Taste.	2. The power to absorb and enjoy the finer essence of the life wave.
3. Smell.	3. The power to distinguish the spiritual aromas of nature.
4. Sight.	4. The lucid state, called clairvoyance.
5. Hearing.	5. The ability to perceive ethereal vibrations, called clairaudience.
6. Intuition.	6. The capacity to receive true inspiration.
7. Thought transference.	7. The power to converse with spiritual beings at will.

Part II. of this singular book is on "The Science of the Stars," and will well repay perusal. It certainly is a very fair statement of astrology, and not calculated to lead to pessimistic conclusions, as the author allows a great deal of liberty to man to shape his own destiny. The frontispiece to this second part is the figure of a man standing in the center of the zodiacal serpent. "Astrology per se is a combination of two sciences, viz., astronomy and correspondences. These two are related to each other as hand and glove; the former deals with suns, moons, planets, and stars, and strictly confines its researches to a knowledge of their size, distance, and motion; while the latter deals with the spiritual and physical influences of the same bodies, — first upon each other, then upon the earth, and lastly upon the organism of man. Astronomy is the external lifeless glove; correspondences the living hand within." Exactly what we have said many times in our public lectures and private instructions, and for saying which have been accused of indorsing effete superstition; but truth will triumph, and the ignorant externalists who deny in toto the ancient wisdom of Chaldea and other favored climes in the long ago, must, in this age of re-awakening intelligence, come ere long to see things as they really are and not as they blindly supposed them to be. Astrology, rightly understood, is the spiritual side of astronomy; these sciences always went together with the learned of old; ignorance has divorced them, knowledge will re-unite them. The language in the introduction to this second part often rises to the sublime, and shows the touch of a finished scholar.

The writer heads the first chapter of his treatise with these words: "So God created man in his own image, in his own image created he him." Students of spiritual and mental healing will find much to think about if they ponder upon such statements as this: —

"When trouble or anxiety of mind crosses our path, the first place where we feel its influence is that part of the body called the pit of the stomach. This sensitive region is within the solar plexus. How many times do forebodings of coming trouble impress themselves upon this delicate center. . . . The solar plexus is our grand contracting point whereby we are placed en rapport with all things external to us; therefore we can see that the true psychical basis of physical health rests with this center; for it is taken for granted that man is by lawful superiority the natural ruler of those powers which live, move, and have their being within his own magnetic dominions. To possess true psychological power which shall be subject to the imperial WILL, and thus be able to assume perfect control of the odyllic sphere; to concentrate all our loyal forces, at a moment's notice, upon any particular section of this magnetic kingdom, and thus instantly subdue any revolt of the reactionary powers, — it is absolutely imperative that our physical bodies be kept free and uncramped by any article of dress which restrains us from developing our true natural forms."

Some very wise words are to be found on page 176 concerning colors, all of which are pronounced good in their significance, though when mediumistic persons see dull colors around persons the dullness of the tint denotes impurity, or at least a lamentable deficiency of spirituality. Colors without doubt have a very powerful influence on all sensitive persons. White is always congenial to the innocent and pure-minded, as it denotes both simplicity and entirety. Red, when bright and clear, denotes pure love and mental power, but when dull and dirty-looking signifies unhallowed animality and perverted strength. Blue means fidelity, truth, constancy. Yellow signifies wisdom, knowledge, understanding. Green is indicative of delight in externals; but each and every color, when seen in the aura surrounding a person or object, indicates the purity or impurity represented by the brightness or dullness of the color seen.

Concerning Christian Science, the following remarks are made on page 178: "It is utterly impossible for antagonistic natures to benefit each other mentally, no matter how good or pure they, as individuals, may be." This no doubt is true, so far as magnetic influences and mind-cure are concerned; but when true Spiritual (or Christian) Science is understood, an immense difference will be at once perceived, as the truly scientific healer is a teacher who appeals to the innate divinity of a patient, and by arousing his own spiritual nature enables him to rectify any derangement in his own organism. At the same time we frankly admit that really beneficial results are rarely obtained when no sympathy is felt between healer and patient. In our chapter on "Electric Christian Theosophy," containing our review of Marie Corelli's "Romance of Two Worlds," and elsewhere in this volume, we have expressed our views fully on this matter; let us now recommend as a subject of special reflection for all healers and teachers the following Scripture texts, laying peculiar stress on the pronouns: "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." "In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you. Where I am there ye may be also." "Wheresoever two or three are gathered together in my name there am I in the midst of them." Not Calvinism, with its hideous blasphemies against the universal action of Divine Love and Wisdom which it abominably travesties, but a spiritual law of sympathetic attraction is set forth in these luminous and beautiful lessons from the Gospel. As each finds his own sphere and does his own work, minding his own business, not intermeddling with his neighbor's affairs, society will develop into a delightful co-operative commonwealth, and the demons of unjust and spiteful rivalry and competition will have left the earth to appear on it no more forever.

Chapter II. is headed with "And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any one finding him should kill him." In the midst of a good deal that appears to us of rather doubtful authenticity, we pick up many pearls. Saturn is said to produce a reserved and cold nature, which corresponds to the blue ray of the spectrum. Jupiter is described as conducive to joviality, generosity, and benevolence, and corresponds to the purple or indigo ray. Mars generates a fierce, intrepid force and corresponds to the red ray. The Sun "radiates the principle which is at once life-giving and dignified. It is affable but majestic, proud but gracious, and blends firmness with kindness, ambition with paternal consideration, combativeness with self-respect, and liberality with discretion." It corresponds to the orange ray. The above is a good general outline of a solar which really means spiritually governed and well balanced character. Venus is described as loving, pliant, and receptive, but capable of strong attachment for a totally different type; hence the mythological friendship between Mars and Venus. Venus corresponds to the yellow ray. Mercury is the volatile and commercial planet, bright and witty, but full of cunning devices; it corresponds to the violet ray. The Moon is wisely dismissed without any definite statement concerning its attributes. As it can be only an astral reflex of the earth it corresponds to the green ray. Concerning Uranus and Neptune the following is said: "After the seven notes of the magnetic gamut have been sounded, the next note must be upon a higher octave and form a repetition of the first." The following statement is of interest: "There is still another planet more remote from our Sun than Neptune, but its action on our organism at present is nil, because the present races have not yet attained to that special state of spiritual and mental development that will admit of its influence becoming manifest. Neither will such a planet become visible to this earth's inhabitants until there is sufficient

A fine astro-phrenological chart prefaces Chapter III. It explains that the Sun and Jupiter are related to man's moral sentiments; Saturn to the selfish propensities; Venus and the Moon to the domestic qualities and semi-intellectual sentiments; Mars to perception. Phrenology is accepted with considerable caution and modification, though its general teachings are undisputed. Some very curious and elaborate explanations of these statements are given in clear, perspicuous language; among them we find the singular declaration that sorrow is symbolized by a square or angle of 90°; harmony by a triangle, or angle of 120°. Chapter IV. deals with the Four Triplicities, each of which contains three zodiacal signs. The fiery trigon embraces Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius; the earthly trigon, Taurus, Virgo, and Capricornus; the airy trigon, Gemini, Libra, and Aquarius; the watery trigon, Cancer, Scorpio, and Pisces. On page 201 we read: "The four ancient elements have been symbolized from time immemorial as the Man, the Bull, the Eagle, and the Lion." In Christian art these are the symbols of the four evangelists, which fact alone, were others wanting, should be enough to convince the thoughtful student that Christianity, both in its history and its art, is not by any means a solitary revelation. Chapter IV. ends with a beautiful interpretation of Eden. On page 203 is a chart entitled, "The Grand Astrological Key of Alchemical Science." In its center is a blazing golden Sun, radiating four sets of rays respectively denominated Sylphs, Undines, Gnomes, and Salamanders. These, according to Kabalistic science, signify the four great groups of human faculties, — the spiritual (salamanders), the imaginative (sylphs), the intellectual (undines), and the animal (gnomes).

Concerning nativities, we are told that the longest livers are usually born in March, April, or May; while the bulk of the short-lived are born in August, September, or October; but this is only true in a very general way. Alchemy is treated spiritually and sensibly, and proper warning is given to all in search of earthly gold by means of desecrated occult energies. The metals have their planetary rulers designated.

The Astro-Kabalistical Planisphere of the Signs and Constellations of the Zodiac, facing page 210, assigns the twelve tribes of Israel to the following signs and months: —

Aries, March, Benjamin; Taurus, April, Issachar; Gemini, May,

Simeon-Levi; Cancer, June, Zebulon; Leo, July, Judah; Virgo, August, Asshur; Libra, September, Dan; Scorpio, October, Gad; Sagittarius, November, Joseph; Capricornus, December, Naphtali; Aquarius, January, Reuben; Pisces, February, Ephraim and Manasseh. Thus fourteen names are given to the tribes, as Gemini and Pisces are dual signs, and thus express duality in their correspondences.

The symbolical aspects of the twelve signs are very interestingly amplified as the work proceeds. Aries represents sacrifice; astronomically it is the lamb slain upon the equinoctial cross. Kabalistically it refers to the head and brains of the grand man of the Cosmos. Upon the intellectual plane it signifies the martial or contending spirit. On the physical plane it gives the native a spare but strong body, medium height, long face and neck, and powerful chest. People who are dominated by this sign are usually courageous and ambitious, but irritable. Taurus symbolizes all the procreative forces in nature; it is the sign of husbandry. Kabalistically it represents the ears, neck, and throat of the grand man, and is considered a silent, patient, listening sign. Upon the intellectual plane Taurus governs carefulness and self-reliance, industry and application; but persons of Taurus' nature are fiery as an infuriated bull when greatly aroused, though ordinarily reserved and equable. Gemini symbolizes unity. The bright stars, Castor and Pollux, have also been regarded as typical of twin souls. Kabalistically this sign represents the hands and arms of the grand man, and therefore governs executive and mechanical ability. Upon the intellectual plane Gemini denotes the union of reason with intuition; those under it are of nervous temperament and highly magnetic; physically they are tall and erect. Cancer symbolizes tenacity to life. Kabalistically it signifies the vital organs of the grand man; it governs inspiration and respiration. Upon the intellectual plane it denotes considerable force, but those dominated by it are usually timid and retiring; but their passivity renders them highly mediumistic; physically they are apt to be small and fair. Leo symbolizes indomitable courage, linked with extraordinary strength. Kabalistically it represents the heart of the grand man; those born under its influence are generally possessed of fine constitution and great recuperative power. On the intellectual plane it works sympathetically, making the native generous in the extreme; physically, this sign is expressed in a large, fair person, broad-shouldered, with golden hair. Virgo symbolizes chastity. Kabalistically it is the solar plexus of the grand man, and therefore represents the assimilating and distributing functions of the human body. Intellectually it denotes the fulfillment of hopes. Those receptive to its influx are characterized by love of reflection and study, consequently they become repositories of knowledge. Their chief attributes are hope and contentment; they are therefore well fitted for close application to scientific pursuits. Such persons possess large brain power, and make excellent statesmen. Physically they are usually of medium stature, very compact, and of dark complexion. As orators they are fluent, practical, and entertaining. Libra typifies justice. Kabalistically it stands for the reins and loins of the grand man, and therefore represents the central storehouse of reproductive ability. Upon the universal chart it denotes equilibrium as expressed in the perfect man. Intellectually it rules external perception, balanced by intuition, which union gives foresight; but those born under it rarely become practical interpreters of their theories: they possess a finely balanced mental and magnetic organism, but are seldom elevated to very prominent positions. Physically they are usually tall and slender, perfectly proportioned, with brown hair, bright blue eyes, and clear complexion; sometimes, however, Libra produces very dark hair. Scorpio symbolizes death and deceit. Kabalistically it typifies the procreative system, which by the ancients was always typical of divine power when employed spiritually, but of sensuality and loss of innocence when treated of as carnal emblems. On the intellectual plane Scorpio signifies the generation of ideas; persons governed by it are of active, evolutionary minds; their brains literally crammed with inventive imagery. They possess keen perception, clear intuition, and powerful will. Physically such persons are strong and inclined to corpulence. Sagittarius symbolizes retribution, and also a hunter. Kabalistically it signifies the thighs of the grand man — the muscular foundation of the seat of locomotion; it is emblematic of stability. Intellectually it stands for organizing power. Persons ruled by this are loyal, patriotic, and law-abiding; they are also generous and free, charitable and kind to the distressed. They possess strong conservative qualities, and their characteristics are self-control and ability to rule others. Physically they are well-formed and, indeed, handsome. Capricorn typifies sin and the offerings made to put away sin. In all ancient mythologies the Saviour of mankind was born at midnight, directly the sun enters this sign. The young child laid in the stable in Christian commemorations, according to a far older system denotes the birth of the year in midwinter. Kabalistically this sign represents the knees of the grand man; it is emblematic of servitude. Intellectually it denotes a scheming temperament, very little developed spiritually; its natives are intensely quick to see the weak points in others, and turn them to their own advantage. Physically they are, as a rule, of medium stature, not very well proportioned, and though energetic in their own interest, indolent in the employ of others. Aquarius symbolizes judgment. Kabalistically it stands for the legs of the grand man; it emblematizes the migratory forces of the body. Intellectually it represents popular science: those governed by it, though brilliantly intellectual, are confined to the evidence of their senses, and cannot peer at all into the realm of such truth as must be discerned spiritually. Physically this sign gives a decidedly prepossessing appearance, coupled with an amiable and refined disposition. Pisces signifies a flood. Kabalistically it represents the feet of the grand man; it is emblematic of patient obedience. Intellectually it betokens mental indifference: persons ruled by it take things as they come, and pay no serious attention to anything. Physically its natives are usually short, and inclined to be stout. Their nature is peaceable, but their actions are largely influenced by their surroundings.

Concerning the occult application of the twelve signs, we learn that the four triplicities symbolize the four cardinal points of the universe, constituting the universal cross, sacred in all ages, and the four occult elements, Fire, Earth, Air, and Water. The Fiery Trigon corresponds to the eastern horizon at daybreak. Fire was undoubtedly the origin of all worlds, and from a fiery state they have gradually cooled, at length becoming inhabitable. The principle of heat, termed Caloric, sustains all living organisms. Fire represents courage, zeal, daring, and will; in fact, it pertains to every kind of activity; while on the higher or esoteric plane it signifies the very source of being, which is, of course, spiritual. Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius correspond to the intellect, the emotions, and the offspring of the two when they are closely united. The Earthly triplicity stands for the frozen north, the symbol of crystallization: it is concerned with the mutual relations of solids, from which are evolved form, proportion, and sound; it also refers to all metals and metallic industries. Esoterically, Taurus, Virgo, and Capricorn correspond to patient effort, formation, and reformation, and the results of these in distinct expressions of force, either on the upward or downward grade of action. The Airy triplicity represents the west, or the setting sun; but this only gives promise of a new and brighter day. This triplicity deals with the higher qualities of the social, political, and priestly relations. Its esoteric significance is the one true science, the knowledge of life as spirit — the one enduring life of the entire universe. The Watery triplicity, symbolical of the south, signifies the polar opposite of the Earthy, and therefore represents the liquefaction of crystals and all hard substances; it expresses the union of opposites, the harmonious adjustment of contradictories. On the esoteric plane it denotes triumph over mundane obstacles, difficulties vanquished, paradise regained. The reader is reminded that the four triplicities are but different sections of attributes within the human soul; the twelve constellations reveal the mystery of Adam Kadmon, the archetypal man of the starry planisphere. We begin with fire and terminate with water.

We here append a notice of the twelve precious gems, which correspond to the twelve signs, and are, therefore, according to astral science, respectively appropriate to be worn by persons born in the month named, as a magnetic talisman.

Aries	March	Amethyst.
Taurus	April	Agate.
Gemini	May	Beryl (Crystal).
Cancer	June	Emerald.
Leo	July	Ruby.
Virgo	August	Jasper.
Libra	September . . .	Diamond.
Scorpio . . .	October	Topaz.
Sagittarius . .	November . . .	Carbuncle.
Capricorn . . .	December . . .	Onyx (Chalcedony).
Aquarius . . .	January	Sky-blue Sapphire.
Pisces	February . . .	Chrysolite.

Having entered upon this subject of precious gems and their significance, we will only add our decided conviction that as colors and gems, of vivid hue especially, exert a marked influence both upon human beings and animals, and as we can suppose no outward form to originate without some spiritual impulse, we conclude that were more attention given to this subject, we might derive much valuable and practical information as a guide to dressing our bodies and furnishing our rooms according to our necessities. Certain it is that all persons are not influenced alike by gems and colors: those most agreeable to some cause annoyance to others. Dr. Babbitt, in "The Principles of Light and Color," enters very deeply into this theme; and those who desire to pursue it to a length impossible in a work not exclusively devoted to that topic, would do well to peruse that learned volume.

As w have no further space to follow out the line of thought suggested by "The Light of Egypt," — the second half of which is fascinating in the extreme, and deals with astrology more succinctly than we have ever seen that abstruse subject dealt with elsewhere, — we will conclude this lengthy, though incomplete, review by testifying to our own perfect agreement with the best views on astrology now being given to the world. As man contains all the planets and constellations within himself, or, at all events, man being the microcosm, there is no element without him which is not also within, it stands to reason that the wonderful occult sciences of the ancients, now being stripped of their mystical garb as rapidly as the public mind can benefit by the process, all end at the same grand point, and declare man to be the arbiter of his own fate, the creator of his own destiny. The essential germ of life we vaguely call the innermost spirit of man can expand its latent forces, in every instance, until human beings shall completely dominate the earth, and be free to roam at will through the constellated fields of space, unhampered by any external limitation. True Theosophy is the knowledge of how to live above the senses, so as to make them serve the spirit in all things; and this they will not do, so long as the pressure of material greed is allowed to make such heavy demands upon human thought and energy. To live in the world, and yet above being enslaved by it in anything, is to find the royal road to health and happiness. When we have found this way, and are walking in it, for us there will indeed be no more sin, sickness, or dying; old things will have passed away, and all will have become new. From many different sources we may gather material to enrich our store, but, turn where we will, the same great truth confronts us, — Man is the measure of the universe, and mind is the measure of man.

Twenty-Five Years of Psychical Experiences.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of my first introduction to public life having occurred on the 4th of this present month, I have been particularly requested to give some definite account of my connection with psychic problems during a quarter of a century. If I am to relate faithfully, even in barest outline, my experiences with 'unseen helpers,' I must go back to my very early childhood, when my 'mediumship' originally declared itself. I was practically an orphan from birth. My mother passed to spirit life in my infancy and my father was called by important business to travel in lands remote from England, where I was left in charge of a guardian. My childhood was singularly unchildlike, as I was separated from children altogether, and compelled to associate exclusively with persons of thoroughly mature age.

How I first came to see my mother clairvoyantly I do not know, but I distinctly remember becoming vividly conscious at frequent intervals of the gentle, loving presence of a beautiful young woman, who invariably appeared to my vision gracefully attired in light garments of singular beauty. The head of this charming lady was adorned with golden ringlets; her eyes were intensely blue; she was tall and of rather slender build, and manifested many attributes of almost ideal womanhood. I cannot recall to mind any occasion when this lady spoke to me as one ordinary human being on earth converses with another, but I distinctly recollect that when I saw her most plainly and felt her presence most distinctly, I was intensely conscious of information flowing into me. I can only liken my experience to some memorable statements of Swedenborg concerning influx of knowledge into the interiors of human understanding.

THE PROBLEM OF CLAIRVOYANCE.

I should probably never in those early days have thought of such a problem as clairvoyance, had it not been for the surprising fact that what I saw perfectly other people did not see at all. I was first led to realize the unusual character of my vision when I mentioned the presence of the 'beautiful lady in white' to two persons who were with me when I saw her very distinctly, and they declared that we three were the only occupants of the apartment. The mystery of the fourth inmate was for me greatly intensified when it appeared to me that the other two persons, besides her and myself, could pass through her and she through them, while they appeared completely unconscious of each other's presence. An elderly lady with whom I was living, who was a devoted Churchwoman, summed up all my singular visions, when I related them to her, in the following words: 'Well, I can't account for it, but it must either be the work of God or Satan.' Though not many months over five years of age at the time to which I am now referring, I had already heard Satan called the 'father of lies' and had also been taught that truth belonged to God and came from heaven; so my youthful intellect was not perturbed with dread of any power of darkness, as I found that all the information which flowed into me when this beautiful spiritual being manifested to me was correct in every particular. I was, therefore, quite content to believe, with simple faith supported by reasoning, that my dear mother was watching over me as a guardian spirit. I often heard of guardian angels, and I was sometimes taken to a children's service in a church where a favorite hymn before the catechising began with the following invocation:—

'Dear angel ever at my side!
How loving must thou be
To leave thy home in heaven to guard
A little child like me'

Instead of conjecturing angels as well-nigh incomprehensible beings belonging to an order in the creation entirely different from ourselves, I rested satisfied with the simple, reasonable conviction that the messenger from unseen spheres who watched over me most intimately, was the dear mother whose physical presence had been withdrawn from earth long before I had reached an age when I could have consciously appreciated it. I do not forget the strange shock I felt when someone said to me: 'It is impossible that you should see your mother; you have no mother; she is dead.' Such vulgar, brutal words made no other impression on me than to set me thinking along psychic lines, far more often pursued by little children than adults generally suppose.

A GIFT OR A NATURAL ENDOWMENT?

It must be borne in mind that I was an isolated and often a lonely child, thrown very largely upon my own resources for amusement and enjoyment. This circumstance may suffice to suggest instructive thoughts regarding conditions singularly favorable to mediumistic development. Is mediumship a gift or a natural endowment? is a query often raised. To answer this inquiry it is surely necessary to recall the two distinct senses in which the word 'gift' is commonly employed. We speak of natural gifts, of the universal gifts of God to humanity, as well as of particular bestowments vouchsafed to those who are sometimes segregated in our philosophy from the 'common herd,' and designated a 'chosen few.' Having used the term 'clairvoyance' in connection with my own earliest spiritual experiences, I wish to define it in my own case as applying to extended vision of three distinctly different, though closely allied, varieties. The first evidence of my own clear vision, which came to me so spontaneously and unexpectedly that for a considerable season it caused me no astonishment whatever, related to beholding a form of real, consistent substantiality, existing on another plane of being than the one usually termed terrestrial. This form was completely and symmetrically human in every detail of outline, and was attired in artistic dress, not foreign to ordinary worldly convention, but vastly more beautiful and graceful than the customary mortal dress fashionable in the sixties of the nineteenth century, which included the crinoline and the chignon. The second evidence of clairvoyance did not refer to sight, even on the psychic or astral plane, as sight is ordinarily understood, but to mental enlightenment or intellectual illumination, and this, not only of a general but also of a particular character, as the knowledge which entered into my understanding related not only to topics of usual information, but went deeply and precisely into manifold details of private family history, and included many revelations which brought great consternation to the hearers when I reported my experiences, seeing that the people among whom I was being reared were very desirous of hiding from me many facts connected with my parents of which my spirit mother undoubtedly wished me to become aware. The third feature in my clairvoyance was the actual predicting of coming events, and I use the term 'coming' in the precisest possible manner for the very events I was led to foretell had, in many instances, actually occurred in one sense, and were on their way to occurring in yet another. A single example will illustrate.

THE MYSTERY OF PROGNOSTICATION.

My grandmother's sister in Lincolnshire had decided to visit Sussex, but had not communicated her intention to anyone, though her mind was fully made up. Though I had never seen my great-aunt, and had rarely heard her mentioned, I distinctly saw her in the house where I was then living, and accurately described her appearance, even to the strings of the cap which she actually wore a few weeks later when paying her sister a visit. Two questions naturally arise at this point: First, how is it that we can see people who may be thinking of us, or perhaps only of a place we are inhabiting, when they are not consciously or deliberately projecting their thought, or an astral likeness of themselves, to us? Second, how is that we see articles of wearing apparel which those persons may not be actually wearing at the time when we behold them? The following reply may serve to elucidate, at least in part, the foregoing mystery. When Herbert Spencer many years ago criticised somewhat adversely the notion of clothing as pertaining to the spirit world, he evidently overlooked a very important consideration, to the effect that our clothing is all mentally designed before it can be physically confected. A new fashion in dress is impossible except as an outcome of a new mental concept of apparel. Not only Swedenborg, but Shakespeare also, clearly illustrates the close connection which must ever logically exist between the wearer and the garment worn; and in no case do we find the suggestive doctrine more clearly taught by inference than in the play of 'Hamlet,' where the father of the Prince of Denmark appears in spirit, clad in armor, at the very time when he is seeking to inspire his son to make war against an uncle who has incurred the fierce displeasure of the discarnate king. Not only do we clothe ourselves physically in such raiment as becomes our immediate mental state, but we often unconsciously supply, gratuitously, portraits of ourselves doing things we intend to do, things, indeed, which we have spiritually already done, and which we shall certainly ultimate materially unless our plans are unexpectedly frustrated. It generally simplifies the mystery of prognostication if we do but consider that seership is a faculty which enables a seer or seeress to actually behold what exists on a plane of ultimation prior to the physical.

AN EVENTFUL DAY.

As I grew from childhood to rather riper age, and in the meantime attended schools and became interested in many external pursuits and objects, my singularly spontaneous mediumship became less prominent, and with the exception of an occasional prophetic dream of rare lucidity, which always came as a needed warning, I gradually drifted into a more prosaic state of life, from which I was suddenly aroused by the presence of the world-renowned Cora L. V. Richmond (then Mrs. Tappan) in England during the seventies of the last century. When I was nearly fourteen years of age, and a member of a church choir, Mrs. Tappan greatly excited the population of Brighton, where I was then residing, by her marvelous discourses and poems, and singularly erudite replies to all kinds of questions, which she claimed were not due to her own erudition, of which she made no boast and to which she laid no claim, but to the action through her instrumentality of a band of guides who were ready to speak through her whenever their services were in demand. May 24th, 1874, was, indeed, an eventful day in my history, for though my public career as a lecturer and globe-trotter did not begin till nearly three years later, it was on the evening of that beautiful Whit-

Sunday that I experienced the first thrill of consciousness that it was my principal lifework to travel nearly all over the earth, guided by unseen but not unknown inspirers, who would carry me safely over all tempestuous oceans and protect me from all dangers by land if I would but be faithful to the mission entrusted to me by wise and kindly helpers. I have always greatly disliked the word 'control,' and I dislike it still, for in my ears it savors of coercion, and I have never been coerced by my inspirers, who have ever proved themselves faithful teachers, counsellors, and guides—veritable 'invisible helpers,' to use Leadbeater's felicitous expression, a title we may well apply to those numberless assistants who render multifold services to us of which we are often quite unconscious, but from which we derive inestimable benefit.

The record of my original introduction to the work of inspirational speaking is now an oft-told tale; in brief, I may sum it up as follows: When I was walking home after greatly enjoying Mrs. Tappan's wonderful eloquence, I registered a vow that if any good and wise intelligences in the unseen state would inspire me as they were wont to inspire the marvelous lady who styled herself their 'instrument,' I would most gladly take service with them and go whithersoever their counsels led me. I earnestly desired and confidently expected that inspiration would come to me if it were genuine at all, and come it did that very evening and within an hour from the time when I invoked it. Had no obstacles been placed in my way, I should have darted forth meteorically as a speaker before my fourteenth birth anniversary, but my legal guardian refused to grant permission until I was at least two years older, though she did not prevent my occasionally appearing at private gatherings, nor was she able to deprive me of some wonderful experiences of mesmeric or hypnotic character, which opened my eyes in my early teens to many of the marvels of psychology which are now demanding and receiving attention from distinguished savants the wide world over.

HYPNOTIC INFLUENCE AND SPIRIT CONTROL.

Hypnotism and its dangers, like Spiritualism and its dangers, is now being discussed at every turn, and I am often greatly interested to hear discussions on these recondite themes, when the debaters are people of experience, but whose experiences have been largely unlike my own. I do not presume to settle any question for my neighbors, I merely speak in the first person singular when I declare that I was never hypnotized against or even without the full consent of my own will; and as spiritualistic literature abounds with references to the virtual identity of hypnotic influence with spirit control, I deem it advisable to bear personal testmony in this connection. Shortly after my discovery that I could speak inspirationally, and even be spoken through by an unseen intelligence, to whose words, uttered through my lips, I could attend as a quiet, interested listener, I made the acquaintance of a brilliant young nobleman who was both an operatic singer and a practising psychologist. This young 'star' was introduced to me as desiring to conduct some delicate mesmeric experiments for which he needed the services of a lucide, or natural clairvoyant; or failing to discover anyone who would entirely answer to the above description, he considered it highly probable that his experimentation would be successful if he could meet a sensitive young person who was thoroughly willing to yield to his suggestive influence. My first ejaculation when the subject was broached to me that I might serve for the experiments, was 'I should be delighted, and feel sure they will be successful.' Though all the experiments were conducted in strict privacy, so far as the general public were concerned, many distinguished persons high in the learned professions took active part in many of the most satisfactory of them. It is not usually supposed, at least by the uninitiated into psychic mysteries, that the words passive and negative are quite as correctly qualified by the terms wilfully and willingly as are positive and active. We are frequently told that mediumship is impossible without passivity, and such is doubtless the case, but voluntary rather than involuntary passivity or negativity conduces to the most reliable results. Operator and subject are terms of double import, but such terms as sender and receiver or transmitter and recipient are clearly not open to valid objection, seeing that they in no way imply enforced surrender of one individual to another. During the nearly three years which intervened between my first insight into my capabilities as an inspired lecturer and my debut before a London audience, I had many opportunities for witnessing extraordinary phenomena, as I became well acquainted with many prominent Spiritualists, who treated me with great kindness and consideration and placed many exceptional advantages at my disposal for witnessing manifestations of all varieties. Some of these appealed strongly to me, others did not. I had many opportunities for sitting in circles with Williams, Herne, Monck, Eglinton, and other extraordinary mediums, who, at about that time, were either in the inception or at the zenith of their fame. Though I was told repeatedly that I was a physical medium, and though I sat in many seances where tables moved and furniture in general behaved grotesquely, I never knowingly officiated as a physical medium, though planchette has worked for me repeatedly and automatic writing has been often with me quite an every-day occurrence. During the greater part of 1877-8, I was privileged to investigate the evidences of phenomenal Spiritualism all over England. The most private gatherings were open to me, and I was times without number privileged to sit with the most distinguished mediums under thoroughly satisfactory test conditions; but though I saw enough to convince me a thousand times over that some mysterious occult force was operating, and the spiritualistic hypothesis always seemed to me more reasonable than any other, I do not think, with my peculiar and naturally sceptical cast of mind, that I could ever have been completely convinced of the truth of spirit-communion had it not been for experiences of my own which absolutely forced me as a rational individual to accept the only sane conclusion.

ON THE PUBLIC PLATFORM.

When I first took the platform I felt very much as I had often felt in more private places when voluntarily obeying the silently expressed dictation of the talented psychologist who could transmit to and through me any information he desired to convey when I was in a susceptible condition; but though he declared that I was perfectly his 'subject,' and I was quite willing to be such, I could not be induced by any professional mesmerist or practising physician, who was engaged in the conduct of hypnotic experiments, to receive or transmit anything, simply because I did not choose to make myself passive or susceptible. I remember well sitting on the platform in old Doughty Hall (a Masonic edifice no longer in existence) on Sunday evening, March 4th, 1877, and gazing out upon a large concourse of people gathered to hear the 'kitten orator,' as I had been called because of my youth, discourse on a subject to be selected by their own vote. A hymn was sung to open a semi-religious service, and then I rose and offered a prayer, the words of which formed themselves in my mouth without forethought or conscious volition of my own. After a second hymn the presiding officer—the then celebrated James Burns, editor of the 'Medium and Daybreak'—announced in my hearing that the youthful occupant of the platform was prepared to discourse under inspiration on any theme the audience might think proper to select. I heard this without the slightest internal trepidation. I had become tense, callous, self-assured, but completely confident that an intelligence beyond my normal own would certainly render me entirely equal to the occasion. A subject was quickly decided upon by show of hands, and I rose to lecture. I spoke unfalteringly for fully an hour, and resumed my seat unexcited and unfatigued. A third hymn was sung, and then Mr. Burns called upon the audience to mention topics for an impromptu poem. Three or four subjects were given, and no sooner was a decision reached by the chairman as to which topic had received the greatest show of hands, than I rose for the third and last time that evening, and heard myself reel off a number of verses as easily and fluently as though I had them well committed to memory, though I am certain they were nowhere in print, and I was listening to them for the first time. The report of that memorable meeting created a great sensation twenty-five years ago; but events crowd thickly upon each other in these days, and a new generation has arisen since I was a 'youthful prodigy,' 'one of the marvels of the nineteenth century,' and much else, according to the newspapers, which I have long since forgotten.

Immediately after my appearance in London I was called to all parts of England. I went as an inexperienced child to places rough and smooth, aristocratic and uncouth, clean and dirty, refined and vulgar, religious and atheistic; and wherever I went I found my unseen prompters ready to help me in all emergencies and to pilot me safely over many difficult and unpleasant places from which I should certainly have shrunk had I seen beforehand what awaited me. During the nineteen months of my touring as a lecturer in England, between March, 1877, and October, 1878, I certainly saw the world in a large number of its varied phases, and though many episodes in my career during that eventful period were extremely enjoyable, as I met kind and true friends almost everywhere, I could, without the slightest difficulty or exaggeration, unfold many a tale which might amuse or startle more than it would edify the listeners. My constitution was not considered naturally robust and I had to encounter many hardships from which many a stronger person would have fled in dismay, but though I cannot say that I quite enjoyed all the harsher features of my travels in all weathers to all sorts of places, instead of succumbing I grew steadily stronger physically as well as mentally, so that when I left England for America near the close of October, 1878, my constitution was quite equal to endure the strain of a singularly tempestuous, though not dangerous, ocean passage and the rigors of a New England winter, to the severity of which the fickle climate of Albion had never subjected me. I well remember my departure from Liverpool for unknown Boston across the wide Atlantic, whither I was journeying entirely alone save for the clearly distinguished presence of those faithful unseen helpers who never deserted me.

CLEAR VISIONS.

One of the clearest visions of my life attended me during the night prior to my departure from Liverpool. I fell asleep about 3 a. m., apparently as a result of fatigue following upon intense excitement, but my seership asserted itself triumphantly in a manner which I was soon able to verify, even to the minutest detail. I saw myself standing on a wide platform which was covered with thick red carpet, in a great hall, with high windows on either side. There were an organ and choir gallery over the entrance to this audience room, and surmounting the rostrum on which I stood was a fine bust of the great New England preacher, the famous Theodore Parker. In that hall I saw a very large audience numbering from 600 to 800 persons; and in the midst of the assembly the dignified figure of Dr. J. M. Peebles, whom I had met in London some months previously, loomed large before me. The vision impressed itself indelibly on the tablet of my memory; then I fell into a dreamless slumber, which continued until I was called to partake of my last breakfast in England for many a year to come. On reaching America I found that not only had my advent been heralded in the columns of the 'Banner of Light,'

the oldest spiritualistic paper in the world, but the friend who met me at the landing stage (Robert Cooper, of Eastbourne, who was then a prominent worker in America) informed me that Dr. Peebles had just completed a lecture engagement in Parker Memorial Hall, and that he had announced me as his successor, the committee having accepted me for that large and prominent position on the good doctor's kindly recommendation, though I was only eighteen years of age and entirely unknown to the directors of the Parker Hall lectureship. No sooner had I landed in America than I was quite at home on what was in no sense to me a foreign soil, for there I heard the same language spoken, and, with minor exceptions of no definite importance, soon discovered that England and America are at least first cousins, if not still nearer relatives. In Boston my work quickly grew apace; then I was called to New York, Philadelphia, and other mighty cities, not excepting Chicago, where I filled Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond's platform for an extended period, while she was filling an engagement in Boston. Nearly five busy years had sped their course when, in 1883, I found myself again in England, taking up afresh the work which I never laid down, but only temporarily suspended when I was led to cross the ocean and become a prominent worker in America. In 1884 I returned to the United States, and in 1885 again revisited England. During those years I accomplished a large amount of literary work in addition to extensive traveling and constant lecturing. In 1886 I visited California for the first time, and spent five delightful months on the sunny Pacific slope, in which charming country I addressed daily audiences often numbering many hundred persons, and saw wonderful results from the practice of mental healing, of which I had by that time become, and of which I still am, an uncompromising, though I trust not a fanatical, advocate and exponent.

A 'MIRACLE' OF HEALING.

At the close of a lecture which I delivered on a spiritualistic camp ground bordering on Lake Merritt, adjacent to the city of Oakland, California, a lady who had long been a cripple handed her crutches to her husband, walked home, and did not resume the use of artificial support subsequently. This 'miracle' of healing took place unconsciously to me, for I did not know there was a crippled woman in the assembly. I do not claim any part in the accomplishment of this marvel further than to declare that I was led to say before I concluded my exposition of the philosophy of healing, 'You can use your limbs if you determine to use them, no matter how long they may have failed to serve you.' I had no idea that I was addressing anybody in particular, and no member of the audience was more greatly astonished than myself when the 'miracle' occurred. My explanation of it is twofold; I firmly believe that there was an influence at work with that afflicted woman beyond my consciousness, and I feel also convinced that through her own auto-suggestive act she greatly facilitated her recovery. This case is thoroughly authenticated, and is now in print in the supplement to my old standard work, 'The Spiritual Science of Health and Healing,' under the heading, 'Testimony of Mrs. Lily Bothwell.'

During that marvelous summer of 1886, which was in some respects the most astounding in my whole career, I received pressing invitations to visit Australia, from which far-distant land cablegrams came to me in quick succession. Nine years previously, at the very outset of my public work, I had been assured by my unseen preceptors that there was a great work for me to accomplish at the Antipodes after I had crossed America, and I may here mention that I had daringly announced in a London paper, in 1885, that I was going to California in consequence of a communication to that effect having been written through my hand when I had no earthly prospect of pursuing my westward way further than New York and Boston. My disappointment was singularly keen when obstacles arose, mountain high, to forbid my leaving America on the completion of my first season in California. Duty called me back to Boston, and reluctantly I obeyed its call, with heavy heart and doubtful mind, for I was beginning to suspect that my unseen directors had been in some way thwarted in their plans for me, I having been solemnly assured by them that I had a mission to fulfil in Australasia; and now that the way had plainly opened, the door had been ruthlessly closed and by no voluntary act of mine. On the way back across the American continent, when I paused to lecture in St. Louis, a message came to me with unmistakable clearness, 'You are going to Australia and New Zealand but not just yet! plans are ripening but not yet matured; have perfect confidence in your inspirers, for though there is a seeming delay there has been no hitch in the arrangements.' 'But when shall I go?' I inquired eagerly. 'We cannot tell you just now; you would think the time too long did you foreknow its duration; but rest content; you are going, and you will fill a large place while you reside there.' With that assurance I had to remain content, for I could receive nothing further concerning the Southern Hemisphere though many directions were given me concerning my continuous work in the Northern. For ten years I saw nothing of England, and it was through the joint instrumentality of Lady Caithness, Duchesse de Pomar in Paris, and the special excursion of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union from New York, in June, 1895, that I revisited Europe after ten years' unbroken residence in America. Those ten years had been very busy and highly eventful ones; my singular experiences during their highly chequered course would fill many a bulky volume. I had scoured America from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and had met with warm receptions and enthusiastic audiences everywhere, though let no one imagine that a prominent public life means constant resting on a bed of roses; roses abound but thorns are often their intimate neighbors. I had produced a number of books, edited several periodicals, and contributed many hundreds of articles to magazines, besides having written thousands of letters to newspapers, in addition to musical work, before I again set foot in England after my departure in 1885.

A TELEPATHIC INCIDENT.

What first led me to turn my attention back to Europe during the winter of 1894 was a psychic or telepathic incident well worth repeating, though it has been previously recorded. I well remember December 8th, 1894. On that day, between 2.30 p. m. and 3 p. m., I was seated at a desk in New York writing an article for a periodical which demanded copy at short notice. I was scribbling away at full speed, writing 'against time' as literary hacks describe the process, when I was suddenly arrested by a vision of Lady Caithness, whom I had not seen for over nine years, seated at an escritoire in a sumptuously furnished boudoir, the most conspicuous feature of which was a magnificent painting covering nearly the whole of one side of the wall. This painting, which I saw distinctly in my vision, represented 'Jacob's Ladder,' and I remember being particularly impressed with the singular beauty of the faces of the angels. Lady Caithness was elaborately dressed, and engaged in writing to me; it seemed as though I could see ink falling from her pen on to the paper, while she informed me of many interesting events connected with the erection of her ducal palace, 'Holyrood,' to which she had recently moved from the fine old house in an older quarter of Paris, where she had hospitably entertained me and where I had held several conferences during 1884-5. The letter she was then writing embodied the request that I should without delay contribute an article for a periodical she was then editing, and it also expressed a fervent hope that I should see my way clear to accept her offer of an engagement to deliver a course of lectures at 'Holyrood' during the ensuing June. For nearly thirty minutes this vision continued with me, and then, before the letter appeared finished, it suddenly vanished, and I resumed my interrupted article. I went to Boston for Christmas, and while there, on December 24th, I received, among other letters from New York, the identical letter from Lady Caithness, dated 'Paris, December 8th,' which I had beheld in my extremely vivid vision. In the course of the letter I learned that it was indited between 7.30 and 8.00 p. m., Paris time, which is five hours ahead of New York, and therefore the time coincidence was as nearly exact as it well could be.

THOMSON JAY HUDSON'S THEORY.

I have been repeatedly asked to describe the difference between telepathic and spiritual messages, and I frankly confess that I have rarely been able to clearly distinguish between them. And this statement suffices to introduce a consideration which is in my opinion a matter of great importance. Take, for example, Thomson Jay Hudson's much-discussed theory of two minds and two memories. Hudson avers that the subjective mind is the sole seat of the telepathic faculty, and in his three celebrated books, 'The Law of Psychic Phenomena,' 'A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life,' and 'The Divine Pedigree of Man,' he industriously undertakes to prove that, though the objective mind with its memory may perish with the decease of the physical organism, the subjective mind with its memory continues to live on in the life of immortality. If this premiss is sound, then Hudson's conclusion, as put forth in his recent article (February, 1902) in the 'Era,' a well-known American monthly, is quite unwarranted; and it is the height of absurdity on his part to declare that Spiritualists are 'fighting in the last ditch,' because recent experiments in the ample field of psychical discovery have abundantly proved the reliability of just such telepathy as Hudson and many others intelligently vouch for. My own experiences in numberless instances have completely satisfied me that in nine out of any average ten instances when psychic communion between friends can be clearly demonstrated, it is almost impossible to discriminate exactly between a message received from a communicant on earth and from one who has passed to the other side of existence. What, indeed, is that 'other side' but the side to which telepathy is indigenous? And can we afford to be sure that when we are functioning telepathically we are not behaving just as we should continue to behave were we suddenly divested of our material envelopes? If the physical frame be but a sheath or vehicle of the abiding entity, which is the true individual, then all these fascinating evidences of thought transference, or mental telegraphy or telephony, accumulating everywhere, are but so many convincing proofs of the reality of our spiritual nature in the here and now, which will prove continuous in the hereafter and the future. Evidences of psychic presence and spiritual guidance having attended my steps from infancy, I cannot specialize any particular season when I have enjoyed the greatest number of distinct proofs of super-terrestrial guidance, but such have always been most distinct and multiple when the need for them has been greatest.

I will now select, almost at random, a few notably striking instances of warning, guidance, and simply interesting seership, which stand forth prominently in my recollection as my thoughts revert to days gone by.

A WARNING VOICE.

Once in California, when I had arranged to lecture in a theatre in Los Angeles while I was yet in San Francisco, I purchased a ticket and secured a berth on a steamer leaving on a Thursday, and due at San Pedro, the port of Los Angeles, by noon next Saturday. It was summer weather and the coast steamers were almost invariably punctual to schedule time. Feeling perfectly sure that I should reach Los Angeles at least twenty-four hours before I needed to appear in the theatre, I felt no apprehension, after securing my tickets, as to fulfilling my engagement, and therefore I was greatly surprised when, while walking up Market street, I heard a voice saying distinctly beside me, 'Change your ticket; go by train: boat will not arrive till Monday.' At first I paid no attention to this strange admonition, and was simply perplexed to account for its origin; but after it had been twice repeated I resolved to run no risk of disregarding a necessary counsel, and I therefore returned to the office where I had secured my passage and changed my tickets from boat to rail, despite the positive declaration of the booking agent that the boats were always on time, and that I could rely on meeting my engagement if I adhered to my first intention. Having procured a railway ticket in compliance with the urgent request of the unseen monitor, I mentally asked, 'What will cause the delay?' to which I received an answer, clairaudiently, with great distinctness, 'Accident to propeller; no danger, but vessel will have to return for repairs; it will arrive safely on Monday.' On arrival in Los Angeles on the Saturday morning, friends remonstrated with me for having forfeited a pleasant water journey at a season when boats were far preferable to trains in that vicinity; but I insisted that as I was announced to deliver two lectures on the following day it was imperatively necessary for me to arrive before the steamer, which I was certain would be belated. Saturday and Sunday both passed and no steamer arrived. I addressed two great audiences before the boat finally got in on the Monday morning, telling a tale of broken propeller and return to port of departure for repairs.

Another incident of quite a different character, but none the less phenomenal, even though less practically useful, concerned an acquaintance I formed in London in 1895, during a course of private midnight seances I was privileged to attend at which conditions were exceptionally fine. To accommodate the several professionals who were members of the circle, we assembled twice a week at midnight and continued our sittings till from 2 a. m. to 3 a. m. Our chief centre of attraction was a huge crystal placed in the centre of a large library table. The crystal was as large as an ordinary globe for containing goldfish, and into this brilliant object we all quietly but intently gazed, with a view to increasing concentratedness of thought and vision. After we had become susceptible to psychic vision we let our eyes close if they seemed so disposed, and we described whatever came before us. Among a multiplicity of telling incidents connected with that circle, I remember describing accurately scenes then being enacted in a house in Brighton occupied by the parents and other relatives of a young army officer whose regiment was soon afterwards ordered to India. Some months later, when this gentleman was in Calcutta and I in New York, I saw him as plainly as though he were physically beside me, and on the occasion of his birthday, when some friends presented him with a handsome pair of ivory-backed military hair brushes on which his monogram was richly chased in blue and gold, I saw those articles as plainly as though he and I had been actually in a room together, inspecting the birthday presents. A letter which came to me from him a few weeks later described those brushes precisely and contained the words, 'I am sure you are receiving a telepathic despatch from me at this instant.'

SPIRITUALISM BASED ON TRUTH.

Though I have narratives to relate which would fill many a volume, all illustrative of the great question of psychic intercourse between friends yet on earth and those who have 'passed over,' as well as manifold descriptions of most convincing telepathy where both parties have been still incarnate, I must reserve for future opportunities the narration of other striking incidents. But now that I have just rounded out a full twenty-five years of public service, I feel it a solemn duty as well as a high privilege to bear unequivocal testimony to the always beneficial effect which mediumship such as I have developed has had on me from all standpoints. Mentally and physically I owe immensely much to those very endowments and experiences which mistaken people imagine are weakening to mind and body. That there are dangers and drawbacks I do not deny, but through all my varied and protracted experiences on and off the platform, for more than a quarter of a century, I have invariably found that the directions given me from unseen helpers have been sound, elevating, and truthful to the letter in all particulars; while the telepathic incidents, at which I have scarcely more than hinted, have been always interesting, never mischievous, and invariably calculated to throw bright light on many a mystic problem. During the nearly two years which I recently spent below the Equator, I have pursued my way unflaggingly and untiringly in all varieties of climate and in a great variety of surroundings. I owe a deep debt of gratitude to friends, seen and unseen, for the many tokens of their care and kindness which have brightened all my journeyings and rendered possible of accomplishment the widely extended mission which took me to the Southern Hemisphere. Adelaide, Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Newcastle, and many smaller places in great Australia, I shall ever feel united with as centres of work which I know has already borne good fruit in numerous ways. Auckland, Wellington, and Christchurch in picturesque New Zealand will always remain equally sacred in my memory. During all my Antipodean wanderings I found my psychic faculties fully as clear and as much in evidence as in other lands where the Southern Cross is an unseen constellation. I am now assured that my traveling days are not yet over, and that I still have oceans to cross, and continents to traverse, before I can honorably retire from active service, if such retirement shall ever be my portion. The dangers of Spiritualism are in my judgment greatly overrated, while its blessings are often minimized; for though I have been since 1890 a member of the Theosophical Society, and my acquaintance and connection with the Mental Science movement is a matter of public knowledge, I wish publicly, emphatically, and irrevocably to bear my testimony to the irrefutable truth of spirit communion. With the peculiar theories advocated by some Spiritualists I have no sympathy; and I daresay there are tricksy spirits, as well as unreliable people on this side the mystic border; but though I must remain the 'free lance' I have ever been, and work wherever I am called to operate, and therefore cannot pose as exclusively a Spiritualist, inclusively I am as thorough-going an advocate of Spiritualism as any of its most enthusiastic representatives. I owe nothing to developing circles, and comparatively little to spiritualistic literature, or to phenomenal mediumship of an objective type; therefore my assurance of Spiritualism's central claim can never be weakened by any controversy which may rage concerning dubious phenomena. I have seen the unmistakably genuine, the ambiguous, and the fraudulent, and having seen so much I am prepared to testify to this effect, irrevocably—that Spiritualism is based on truth, and no matter how many barnacles may have to be swept from such institutions as are devoted to its special advocacy, the twentieth century must and will witness a spiritual revealing for which all the wonders of the nineteenth, stupendous though they have been, have only paved the way.

A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Colville on the motion of the President, who said he had noticed with pleasure the evident gratification with which the company had, throughout, listened to the speaker's interesting narrative, and he had no doubt that the friends would be glad if arrangements could be made for Mr. Colville to continue his narrative at an early date. This suggestion was received with manifestations of cordial approval.

The Question of Spirit Identity.

Lecture delivered by W. J. Colville before the London Spiritualist Alliance, in St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, May 15th, 1902.

The vexed question of spirit identity is one which is always liable to occasion considerable discussion, chiefly by reason of the fact that what appears thoroughly conclusive to some types of mind seems inconclusive to others. It is, therefore, necessary to approach this immense and vital subject not only entirely free from prejudice, but also fortified with clear understanding of the actual worth of the various theories now submitted for popular acceptance as substitutes for what is often termed the spiritualistic hypothesis.

A very friendly correspondent in 'Light' has recently asked whether it is possible for us to explain clearly how we discriminate between telepathic and spiritistic messages—to use the exact words of the courteous truth-seeker who raises the inquiry. Frankly, we admit that it is often quite beyond our present ability to discriminate completely between them, but this lack of ability always to discriminate, far from weakening the testimony favorable to simple Spiritualism, only necessitates a reconsideration of the entire problem of our human constitution before we attempt to formulate an inclusive theory to explain the entire bulk of our diversified psychic experiences. A very large number of thoughtful readers have been much impressed by Thomson Jay Hudson's three celebrated books: 'The Law of Psychic Phenomena,' 'A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life,' and 'The Divine Pedigree of Man,' in which the hypothesis known as the dual theory of the human mind is very fully and forcibly expounded. Professor Hudson, in common with many other able writers, labors to some extent under a burden of preconception adverse to Spiritualism, which often mars the beauty and consistency of his otherwise excellent literary work. The evidence for telepathy which this author puts forward is very strong and in some instances unimpeachable, but the alleged evidence against Spiritualism is rationally inadmissible, because it is of a singularly negative and supposititious character. We must face our problem bravely, not attempting to disguise the fact that during the past several years much evidence has accumulated in favor of simple telepathy which some over-enthusiastic Spiritualists may have been liable to undervalue because it has been erroneously supposed that, if accepted, it would tend against the interests of the cause which is nearest of all to their hearts. A better understanding of telepathy, and a fuller comprehension of what is logically involved in Hudson's 'two minds' theory, may serve to set many doubters at rest. We must not forget that the title of Hudson's second book is utterly misleading and an entire misnomer, if the evidences of telepathy prove communion between friends on earth but throw no light on the condition of those who have 'crossed the border.' The author persistently claims that of our two minds, which he consistently designates objective and subjective, the former perishes at the time of physical dissolution, but the latter lives on and finds a sphere for fuller and more perfect functioning than it ever enjoyed on earth. This theory accounts for telepathy as a sort of foretaste of the method of communion between friendly entities which will prevail unceasingly in the future life. The only flaw that we have been able to detect in Hudson's chain of reasoning is the poor opinion he seems to entertain of the moral integrity of the subjective mind, coupled with the utterly foundationless assertion that overwhelming evidence of unrestricted telepathy will drive Spiritualists, ere long, even out of that 'last ditch' in which they are now desperately fighting (according to Hudson) to save a lost cause and rescue a forlorn hope.

Reasonable identification of telepathy with direct spirit-communion, instead of introducing a new perplexity and further complicating an already complicated situation, introduces us for the first time to an orderly, harmonious, and easily comprehended interpretation of many analogous facts and parallel experiences which have long perplexed the average student of psychic phenomena, though there have always been singularly luminous exponents of mental and spiritual science and philosophy, who have gone a long distance on the road which must lead eventually to universal understanding of man as a spiritual being.

We have frequently been asked to define clearly wherein consists the difference between a message received from a friend yet on earth, and a similar communication from one who has 'passed over.' Spiritualistic literature has largely been encumbered with two oft-repeated phrases, 'spirit return' and 'spirits coming back to earth.' These phrases are to a large extent misleading, for, though there are instances where such language may accurately and adequately describe the nature of certain manifestations, such expressions do not by any means correctly serve to describe the actual experiences of the great majority of seers and seeresses of ancient or modern times. Intromission to the spiritual state is a phrase full of deep significance, and, were it used more frequently, it would serve to elucidate many a problem of clairvoyance, clairaudience, clairsentience, and phychometry. Professors Denton and Buchanan, in their learned dissertations concerning psychometry, illustrated by numerous recitals of personal experience, have insisted that a true psychometer perceives the aura of an object, and can at times distinctly see into the spirit-world and become consciously en rapport with denizens thereof. Such quickened perception may fairly be considered as in some degree an anticipation of the means of intercourse we shall enjoy one with another when we have bade farewell to our robes of flesh.

If at this point we are reminded that the question of spirit identity is specially our theme at present, we may surely claim that if we are called upon to identify those intelligent beings with whom we are in communication, we must apply the same laws of evidence to this matter as to questions of individual identification when only mundane matters are involved. To identify a fellow-being in any world is not always easy, and indeed it often is found to be extremely difficult when we rely solely on outward tests. 'The hands are the hands of Esau, but the voice is the voice of Jacob' is a vivid Scriptural instance of the extreme difficulty experienced by an ancient patriarch in deciding which of his two sons was actually in his presence. The blindness of Isaac is easily typical of the condition in which most people are found when some sort of deception is successfully practised upon them. Evidences of two kinds are presented together. One set of evidences appeal to feeling, the other to intelligence. We judge people very often by outward appearances which we subsequently find to have been altogether deceptive, and if it be admitted in any degree that there are deceiving spirits who sometimes visit us, we are obviously placed in precisely the same position with reference to them as with regard to persons yet on earth who play us false because we are open to deception. The difficulties attending spirit identification are not necessarily greater than those surrounding the identity of persons who are yet encased in mortal garments.

No purely external tests are always valid. Indeed, to place extreme reliance upon such alone is to encourage swindling, and play into the hands of forgers who are usually very capable of simulating perfectly the outward garb of those they seek to personate. Testimonials, references, and letters of introduction constitute no infallible criteria, as these may all be counterfeit or stolen. The only sure way to identify anyone absolutely is by cultivating psychic perceptiveness, and this is more apt to be strongly developed in highly sensitive persons than in any others. Deception is, however, less likely to be practised on the spiritual than on the material side of existence, because the motive to deceive is far less strong. Expectation of worldly gain urges most deceivers on earth to ply their nefarious vocation, and it may be safely assumed that at least ninety per cent. of all deception would vanish from the earth if no financial or other ulterior gain could accrue from it. To palm oneself off as another would be objectless folly in which very few people would care to indulge did they not think they saw in such deception a means for self-enrichment or aggrandizement.

It may with some fairness be assumed that when communicating intelligences who display only very meagre intelligence profess to be very celebrated and illustrious personages, they may be hankering for the incense of adulation, but when no great names are given and no pretentious claims are made, it is difficult to see what reason could be fairly given for simply stupid masquerading or deliberate misrepresentation of any sort. We know from experience that auto-suggestion on the part of the alleged recipient of a spiritual communication may account for some instances of falsification, especially when such self-deception tends largely to self-glorification or the gratifying of personal vanity. A great drawback to untainted spirit-communion is the prejudice and vanity of many sensitives, but this very foolishness on their part sometimes serves to reveal an aspect of truth which is frequently neglected, viz., that there may be perfect sincerity and frankness on the side of the unseen communicator, while the person to whom the communication is made may be the sole suggester of the deceptive element.

A lady in one of the Southern States of America declared that she was in direct communion with George Washington, the first President of the United States; but her friends as a rule laughed at her claim, because by means of automatic writing through the lady's hand, and by means of trance speaking through her lips, 'George Washington' expressed himself most ungrammatically and in negro dialect. On a notable occasion when 'George Washington' was speaking through this lady's mediumship, he was distinctly seen by a fine clairvoyant who had been invited to a seance, and at the conclusion of the address this seeress described what she had witnessed during its delivery, which was the presence of a very decided African of Ethiopian tint and cast of feature, and who appeared strongly attached to the lady through whose mediumship he had been able to deliver a lengthy message. On being requested to describe all she saw, the seeress went on to give particulars of a venerable old servant who had been named 'George Washington,' who had been a faithful retainer of the family prior to the Emancipation Proclamation issued in 1865, and had in that year steadily refused to accept his freedom, as he dearly loved the old estate and was devotedly attached to his master and mistress, parents of the lady through whom he was then able to communicate and whom he had often nursed during her earliest girlhood, ere he passed to spirit life, when she was not over eight years of age. That simple incident served to explain the entire problem, and it afforded a thoroughly rational explanation of a phenomenon belonging to a class, by no means uncommon in America, which have led to denun-ciations of fraud where none existed—theories of wicked personating spirits, and many other vagaries of unbalanced judgment—to say nothing of the would-be clever remark made by people who were more 'smart' than wise, that it must be a terrible thing to die if in our post mortem condition we so quickly and sadly deteriorate. An instance like the foregoing will bear thorough sifting, and it is surely much easier to explain such an instance in the light of direct spirit communion than by straining an auto-suggestive or telepathic hypothesis to the breaking point to invent an improbable, in place of a probable, interpretation. Had the lady referred to suggested the matter to herself she would certainly have been fairly grammatical, as she was a comparatively well-educated woman, and not being a negress she would not have clothed an imaginary message from George Washington, as she conceived of him, in negro dialect. Admitting telepathy, mental telegraphy, or telephony, or aught else that is in any measure psychical, nothing can well be more likely than that a good old negro who had been for many years a faithful servant to the family residing on that particular estate, should seek an avenue of communion with it through the agency of a member to whom he had been greatly attached just before he passed into the realm of spirit.

It is doubtless true that many spirits leave the earth and all pertaining to it, very shortly after the demise of the physical body, while others remain closely connected with the scenes of their earth existence, not because they are earth-bound in the sense of being unhappy creatures who cannot, on account of their sensual vices, rise above the mundane level, but because their affections still cling to persons and places with which they have enjoyed pleasing associations up to the latest moment of their terrestrial existence. Andrew Jackson Davis, as well as Swedenborg, and many other gifted seers, have said much concerning the many spheres in this solar system encircling the various planets, which have often been numbered from one to seven, and then again divided and sub-divided into circles within circles, like wheels within wheels in Ezekiel's visions; and those who have become strongly attracted to such teaching—and their name is legion—have brought forward the revelations of these prophets to disavow the declaration, made from a somewhat different standpoint, that multitudes of spirits cannot return to earth as they have not yet taken their departure from this planet's immediate atmosphere, or even from the exact localities where a large portion of their earthly days were spent in work or amusements in which they took a decided interest.

While indulging in personal reminiscences, and not desiring to repeat a record of experiences already published and circulated, I will narrate a very recent instance of what seems to me clear evidence of spirit identity. When I was in Australia about eighteen months ago, in Sydney, I frequently employed the services of a bright, enterprising young man, who was an excellent typist, and to whom I dictated portions of several books and numerous magazine articles. Before taking my last earthly farewell of this young gentleman, on the eve of his departure for New Guinea, whither he went to occupy a post of trust and influence, he said to me that he hoped when I returned to England he might accompany me on the ocean, as he much desired, though by birth an Australian, to visit the Mother Country, which, though twelve thousand miles distant, is invariably called 'home' by Australasians. My reply was that though I could not definitely foresee my own plans for the near future, and could, therefore, promise nothing, I held myself in full readiness to fall in with his wishes should opportunity occur to favor the carrying out of the project. Shortly after his arrival in New Guinea in full possession of health, and seemingly of vigorous constitution, he caught the local fever, and in three days he had made his exit from the mortal body. I cannot say that he was very frequently in my thoughts, or that his loss would seem to me irreparable; still there was a link of sympathy between us which evidently made it possible for him to manifest his presence to me on more than one occasion during three distinct stages of my voyage from Sydney, via New Zealand and across America, to England. The first time he attempted to make himself known to me was between Sydney and Auckland, but as I was seldom alone during the four brief days that voyage occupied I cannot remember any very definite evidence of his identity, though I was fully conscious of his presence. The second visit which I know he made me was en route to California, when I had a large cabin to myself on the 'Sonoma,' and not being much acquainted with any of my fellow passengers I had many opportunities for quiet silence and uninterrupted meditation. I well remember distinctly feeling the presence of my young friend with me, just as I had known him in Australia, and so real and tangible was the sense of that presence that it seemed exactly as though another person was sharing the cabin with me. I was quite awake, perfectly calm, and fully able to determine all he said to me, and yet I am certain I heard nothing with my external ears except the motion of the vessel passing through the water. Not only did I feel, or sense, his presence, but he gave me information concerning his situation in New Guinea, and the circumstances of his life there, which I subsequently learned, through correspondence with a mutual acquaintance, were correct in every detail. On the third occasion, when I as strongly realized his presence, I was nearing Plymouth on my voyage from New York last February, and on that occasion he gave me information concerning his present state and occupation, and told me several things in regard to my own near future, which have since been fully verified. Such definite, direct, and truthful communications certainly do not proceed from lying spirits, nor do they emanate from my own subself, whose reputation for veracity and sanity I am naturally interested to maintain; and when I speak a good word for my own subjective mind—which is to live hereafter when my objective mind has perished—I stand up equally for the corresponding sub-selves or subjective minds of all my neighbors. It is immeasurably more rational to maintain a reasonable spiritualistic version of such facts as I have just related than to invent, and uphold at all hazard, a contradictory and extremely complicated theory of the mysteries of telepathy, which serves to befog far more than to enlighten rational inquirers. In seeking to reply definitely to the very natural inquiry whether there is any marked difference in appearance between the psychic, or astral, body of a person yet on earth, and of one who has parted company with earthly raiments, I venture to suggest that only when the factor of clairvoyance is added to telepathy is this clearly determinable. Usually the appearance to psychic vision of one who has left the flesh is more ethereal than that of one who is still connected with it, but when only a sense of presence is realized, and intelligence is inwardly communicated, it is often impossible to decide whether the despatch in question is being received from a friend yet on earth or from one who is more frequently designated a 'spirit.'

Unnecessary difficulties in the way of rational spiritual identification are created by many persons who evidently mistake identity which pertains to abiding individuality for the most external incidences of ever-fluctuating exterior personality. Such questions are often raised as, 'If you see my father can you describe his appearance? does he wear a beard? how is he dressed?' and much else of the same almost ridiculous character. A little sober reflection must convince the veriest tyro that such questions, answered one way or another, cannot determine identity. We all know that fashions alter and habits change with wonderful rapidity, and it is by no means difficult for a man to remove a full beard in a few moments, or let one grow in a few weeks, thereby completely altering one aspect of his appearance. Black hair easily turns white, stout persons grow thin, and slender persons become stout, very frequently, while changes wrought by passing years and varying emotions frequently suffice to render old photographs, once speaking likenesses, no longer discernible, unless to the acutest students of physiognomy. It is, however, continually declared that clairvoyants see our spirit friends as they were when we last beheld them or as they appeared when we were most intimately associated with them. And such testimony, founded as it often is on actual fact, needs to be interpreted in the light of other knowledge than that obtainable by simple and often mysterious clairvoyance. Astral pictures are often beheld in the air of old houses, where certain people have lived long periods, and to which they have become greatly attached, and these psychic photographs are often mistaken for the actual presence of departed spirits by persons who rely on sight as evidence apart from feeling or manifest intelligence. A fact in my own experience may serve to illustrate two features of this portion of the subject of spirit identity.

Some years ago I was sojourning in an old country mansion in America, which had been the abiding place of a single family ever since its erection. The room assigned me as a sleeping apartment had, as I afterwards learned, been for many years the special working and reading room of a maiden aunt who had been quite a second mother to the family. In that room she had spent a great part of her time during her latest years on earth, and one of her favorite occupations was knitting stockings by the fire. For four nights in succession, during my occupancy of that room, did I see that quiet elderly lady, with knitting in her hands, seated before a fire in the grate, which was at that season of the year filled with a summer ornament. At first I thought I must be actually in communion with the kindly, placid dame, and that she might have a message to convey through me to some member of the household; but, concentrate my thoughts and attention intently as I could upon the vision, I could detect no animation, nor could I receive even the faintest intimation of intelligence. The people with whom I was residing were not at all averse to Spiritualism, and when I told them exactly what I had seen four nights in succession in that particular bedroom, they all agreed that it was an exact description of their aunt, even to the smooth bands of brown front hair, and the cap with lilac satin ribbons tied under the chin; but they, in common with myself, wondered why, if I could see their aunt so clearly, I never saw her move and could obtain no impression of her intelligence. On the fifth night of my occupancy of that apartment I experienced a totally different sensation in connection with the same apparition, which I again beheld stationary and unresponsive as before; but on this occasion, hovering over the astral picture I beheld a radiant, youthful form bearing a certain family resemblance to the abiding simulacrum, but instinct with the fire and energy of active life and operating intelligence. Contemporaneously with this new additional experience, information clearly flowed into some receptacle of my consciousness, causing me to become aware that the original of the portrait desired her nieces and nephews to find in her old writing desk certain papers she had written long ago and which she desired should be revised, edited, and published. Following the minute directions given me by this guiding intelligence, I accompanied several members of the family to a lumber room in which many discarded articles of furniture had long been stored; and there among them stood an ancient escritoire, in which we found a completed story setting forth a romantic and highly edifying history of marvelous episodes in what the world would doubtless have looked upon as a secluded and uneventful career. After this startling confirmation of the veracity of my vision, we formed a private family circle for further investigation, and thereat, by means of automatic writing, supplemented by clairvoyance, we verified many extraordinary statements made by this living relative of the family, who assured us that she was no longer sitting by a fire engaged in knitting, but most actively employed in spiritual occupations, which did not, however, alienate her in the least from her old associates but, on the contrary, kept her in close vital touch with all of them, though in a subtler and more ethereal manner than before she had quitted the material frame.

Another interesting experience of my own dates back only to the autumn of 1899, shortly before my departure for Australia. I had long known Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten, but my first interview with her was in 1877, at a lecture delivered in Manchester, when she was a middle-aged woman, dressed in much the same style as she continued to adopt till she finally withdrew from the public platform. Since her passing to spirit life, this earnest worker has occasionally made herself distinctly known to me, both on and off the platform, and in November, 1899, I distinctly saw, in connection with a most forceful realization of her close proximity, the likeness of a radiant maiden with light golden curls, somewhat resembling the earliest pictures of Mrs. Richmond when she was Cora Hatch, but in no way suggesting Mrs. Britten to me by the appearance. I never could have understood that vision had I not visited Mrs. Wilkinson (Mrs. Britten's sister), about a month later, and, while her guest in Manchester, been shown a picture taken many years ago, representing Emma Hardinge in youthful costume as 'Queen of the Fairies.' This picture represents the young lady who afterwards became Mrs. Britten with flaxen ringlets, and in every way precisely as she showed herself to me on the occasion of my vision. Had I suggested to myself a similitude of Mrs. Britten, I should certainly have conjured up from the depths of memory a likeness of her as I had known her; and when I interrogated her spiritually through the mediumship of automatic writing, subsequent to beholding the portrait at Mrs. Wilkinson's, the following message was communicated: 'I knew you were going to my sister's; therefore, I wished to give you a singular test of my identity, which I find I have succeeded in doing; and there is another reason why I showed myself to you thus—I wished to impress you with the knowledge that I can now show myself in various forms to my friends, and my present appearance far more closely resembles that of my youth on earth than that of my later age.'

'How do we know each other here?' is quite as grave a question as 'Shall we know each other there?' I remember some years ago, in New York, being asked by a mutual friend to meet a gentleman who was returning to America after ten years' residence in Germany, and who was described to me from a portrait as a slender man with jet black hair. And such he doubtless was when he embarked for Germany, but during the decade of years he had spend in Europe, he had grown decidedly corpulent and his hair had become positively white. I nevertheless knew him by instinct, though I had never met him previously, and I accosted him by name, greatly to his surprise, directly he had left the steamer. Had I been slavishly governed by my physical senses instead of trusting to some surer and subtler faculty of discernment, I should certainly have failed to acknowledge him, so greatly did he differ in appearance from the description I had been given of him. We cannot expect that when we change in outward aspects thus rapidly on earth, we shall remain stationary in external aspect in the world of spirits. There is, however, this to be said concerning relatively fixed appearance in the life beyond. We are not there, as here, so greatly affected by outward climate, and outer appearance changes only as it indicates alterations in our interior state. Such is the unanimous and unfaltering verdict of spiritual testifiers wherever they have made their presence known.

And now, finally, concerning the weighing of evidence in the scales of reason. We may certainly maintain in the face of all opposition that every individual communication should be judged on its particular merits, and neither be accepted nor rejected on the merits or demerits of any other submitted message. We cannot believe, unless we part company with reason, that we are victims of stupid or wicked deception in cases where the teachings given are of the highest moral import, and where the information offered is proved correct in every detail as far as we can possibly verify it. The crude and intricate theories now afloat to discredit evidence of spirit intercourse are far more difficult and far less probable than the plain satisfactory conclusion long ago reached by all intelligent and dispassionate inquirers—that we do on many occasions receive convincing proof of the identity of communicating spirits. In conclusion, let us look for an instant at the mental characteristics of a few of the typical students of psychic phenomena who during recent years have become thoroughly satisfied that in many instances, though not in all, proof positive of spirit identity has been obtained. Professor Hodgson and Mr. Myers were thoroughly satisfied at length, through Mrs. Piper's mediumship and that of other sensitives; and so were Miss Lilian Whiting and Rev. Minot J. Savage, as well as many other representative and cautious investigators. These famous persons had nothing to gain and possibly something to lose, by outspoken advocacy of Spiritualism; and in the case of Dr. Savage it is well-known that his tendency of thought was decidedly agnostic, and for many years during his popular ministry in Boston he was largely a champion and exponent of the philosophy of Herbert Spencer. It is difficult to see why people should prefer the Devil to their own friends who have passed beyond the mystic portals, and it surely cannot be easier for normal intellects to believe in imaginary evil demons, of whom we know practically nothing, except on unsupported hearsay, than in the presence and activity of the very people whom we have known on earth as real personages, and who reappear with their own well-known characteristics. Telepathy and all other demonstrable phases of psychic phenomena must be freely admitted by every student of psychic science, and it has now become the imperative duty and solemn privilege of all who have knowledge in this direction to elucidate as far as possible the truthful doctrine of the close resemblance and intimate relation of telepathy to Spiritualism. Simple telepathy throws much clear light on our present spiritual abilities, and spirit communion transcends mundane telepathic experience by carrying telepathy across the unseen border into those sympathetic realms of spiritual activity where the powers and functions of our 'sub-selves' or 'subjective minds' are more fully unfolded and more freely and extensively exercised than they seemingly ever can be during terrestrial embodiment. Let us be open to all classes of evidence, and construct theories to account for facts, but never seek to squeeze facts into grooves of premeditated theory.

Following the lecture, a number of questions were asked and answered. Among the replies the following were conspicuous. The lecturer said, in reply to an inquiry concerning telepathic intercourse with spiritual beings who might be occupying positions in the solar system far remote from this planet's immediate atmosphere, that it was easily possible to hold communion with sympathetic intelligences without coming into local contact. It was also stated that intermediary intelligences often serve as connecting links between two spheres which have some measure of affinity with each other, though they cannot be described as actually near together. And the further declaration was made that space plays a far less important part than state in all spiritual interblendings. And it was yet further insisted that higher spheres can commune at will with lower planes of activity, but lower circles cannot rise into full conscious communion with higher circles except through such interior growth as proceeds from continued aspiration.

Regarding elemental and elementary spirits and the future existence of animals, the speaker said that this is a living universe; therefore, every element is in essence psychical. Life is everywhere, and all forms of animate existence are oragnized expressions of a universally diffused life principle. Magicians may command the lower forces of Nature and employ them in magical productions, but elemental influences cannot simulate human intelligence, at seances or elsewhere, any more than animals can speak with human voice or display such attributes as pertain only to the human species. Many clairvoyants have had some evidence of the temporarily continued existence of certain animals in the post-mortem state, but their actual immortality cannot be demonstrated.

In reply to a question concerning the likelihood of 'astral shells' producing the phenomena of Spiritualism, the lecturer argued with such decision against the supposition that galvanized reliquae of the departed could display intelligence, and the utmost that could be rationally conceded to that theory would be the bare possibility—and that an improbability—that some human intelligence might use a 'shell' as a vehicle or utensil in the production of a phenomenon, but in that case the source of the manifestation would still be an intelligent entity.

Some ladies questioned the lecturer concerning the legitimacy or desirability of perpetuating such elementary modes of spirit communion as table-tipping and other rudimental phases much in vogue in the early days of the Modern Spiritualistic movement, to which the following reply was given:

There is always a place for elementary phenomena, which are well adapted to the present requirements of many truthseekers who are as yet unprepared to appreciate or comprehend more advanced phases of psychic demonstration. For that reason it is far better to encourage than to discourage home circles and select friendly gatherings of congenial sitters, where the simpler forms of phenomena recur. Wherever two or three, or any larger number of friendly, harmonic persons unite to seek enlightenment, the response they win from unseen spheres is far more a result of their interior states of thought and feeling than of the method employed externally by those who are seeking to pierce the psychic veil. If the chief attention is always paid to aspiration, motive, desire, and all that constitutes the inner side of psychical investigation, the outward means employed may well be extremely diverse, to suit the varied needs of the great multitudes who are now knocking at the portals of the House of Wisdom.

Replying to a question concerning fraud practiced during seances, the lecturer said that during extensive travels in various parts of the world he had witnessed much genuine phenomena of many varieties, and also much that was ambiguous, but actual fraud was comparatively rare except in cases of persons who did not actually claim any mediumistic gifts when they were freely conversing with their cronies, and who undertook to simulate phenomena when they thought it would redound to their financial interest. Such persons, particularly in America, where they had been sometimes numerous, were turncoats in profession, for they invariably felt the pulse of a neighborhood and adapted their trickery to the largest prevalent demand. Many church officials had employed these tricksters to expose Spiritualism in one place, while they had quickly gone to another and posed as ardent Spiritualists and faithful mediums devoted to the cause of Spiritualism. It has been largely owing to impostors of that stamp that phenomenal Spiritualism has been at times under a heavy cloud and honest mediums have been exposed to assault and persecution. When phenomena are sometimes fraudulent though casually or frequently genuine, in the presence of certain public sensitives, something can be said in support of the plea that such mediums are sometimes greatly influenced by the immoral calibre of sitters, and being often not particularly strong morally in themselves, even when their sitters are not deceptive persons carrying a deceiving sphere with them, there is strong temptation to produce imitations of genuine manifestations when the demand for phenomena greatly exceeds the supply. The chief cause of fraud in America has been the insatiable demand of a voracious public for twenty or more full form materializations every night in the week at circles where a dollar per head has been the price of admission. It stands to reason that genuine phenomena of so marvelous a character cannot be doled out to order for just so much money whenever payment is forthcoming, and it is the height of folly to patronize and encourage such proceedings and then vehemently denounce the people who have only catered to a vociferous demand. A great deal of alleged fraud deserves careful, unexcited scrutiny, and it is not likely that fierce denunciation will ever effectually prevent it, as people will probably always be taken in more or less frequently until they have reached a plane of clear perceptiveness where they are no longer deceivable. Fraud may occasionally emanate from the spirit side of life, but that is an obscure problem and a remote contingency. Mind-reading and unconscious thought-transference will account for much seeming deception in connection with mental phenomena; but as this consideration opens a particularly wide field for psychological investigation, we should be extremely chary of condemning anyone without overwhelming evidence of guilt. Mediums certainly should not be prejudged unfavorably, and we cannot reasonably expect to remove deception by surrounding hyper-sensitive persons with a blighting atmosphere of suspicion.

At the close of the proceedings a cordial vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Colville for his very interesting and instructive address.

THERE are moments in the life of every one when the soul seems to be stirred by some inner force; when the mind becomes illuminated by new ideals, new hopes, new desires. What has caused this state? Who can tell? It may be in a moment of rest and repose, when mind and body are relaxed and for a brief space of time the duties and cares of the world are lost sight of, that such an awakening comes—for thus we might speak of it. During this brief interval we see things as we never have seen them before. Power, or earthly greatness, has no place in our thoughts; but we see, dimly though it may be, something of our own inner greatness—something that, if it once could be fully realized, would change the whole tenor of our lives, and the world with all its allurements would occupy a minor place in our thoughts.—Charles Brodie Patterson.

THE SPIRITUAL MAN—HIS POWERS AND PRIVILEGES.

When entering upon a consideration of human nature, it is essentially necessary to consider, first, exactly what we mean to convey by the special terms we are intending to employ. The title of this chapter provokes inquiry, as the adjective Spiritual qualifies the substantive Man. The reader will naturally ask, are there then in your estimation two or more distinct kinds of human nature of which that variety entitled Spiritual is the highest, or do you simply mean that human nature is in essence Spiritual? As just such a question has frequently been put to the writer of these pages, the following reply seems an appropriate introduction to all that is to follow:

Human nature is distinctly what we mean when we speak of spiritual nature, for by human we signify humane as distinguished from brutal, which we designate inhuman. When the word humanity is employed it at once suggests two meanings. First, it is a designation applied to the human race as distinct from and superior to all other types of animate existence on earth. Second, it is the synonym of kindliness, gentleness and all the mild and gracious attributes which the purest and most elevated friends of religious thought ascribe to Deity. The much-contested first chapter of Genesis, when read with unprejudiced candor, suggests the beautiful idea of human divinity and of equally divine humanity. Theomorphism and anthropomorphism unite in the sublime declaration that human nature is in the image of Divine Being; for to no less august a cause than Deity is the origin of human life attributed. Chronology and geography can not be called into court to testify concerning what lies entirely beyond their province, nor can astronomy and geology bear testimony to what lies far beyond their ken. All the varied stages and kinds of biblical criticism from the highest to the lowest unitedly fail to touch in one way or the other the primal conviction imbedded in the deepest consciousness of the most gifted of Israel's ancient seers—the divinity of human nature, and it is this doctrine and this alone which glorifies the commencement of the Pentateuch and constitutes it in a sense unique. This consciousness of God as the author of human life is far too deeply rooted in human reason to be eradicated by any assaults which may be directed against it. Man conceives of himself as divine offspring and presumes in consequence to call the Almighty Power which sustains the universe his parent, not simply his Creator and Sovereign. If it be contended, as it often is, that to-day's thought of God differs widely from that current some thousands of years ago, supposing it does, it is surely not a lower but a vastly higher idea of Deity which is taking the place of earlier conceptions; and by so much as the God-idea rises does the Man-idea rise also, for if we still claim that our origin is divine, our views of the Divine Original can not improve or advance without our thought of the dignity and splendor of human nature advancing equally.

The theomorphic view of Man blends with the anthropomorphic view of God. The statement put forcibly, and to some minds perhaps shockingly, reads thus: God is Human, Man is Divine; and reverse wise, Man is Divine, God is Human. This statement which is an extremely bold one, is by no means irreverent, and unless we are prepared to stand by it we can not teach the Fatherhood of God and the Sonship of Mankind.

If God be the author and cause of humanity then the child and effect must resemble the source whence it proceeded, and it is impossible for us to sustain the relation of children to a Divine Parent unless we are possessed of kindred Divine attributes; we must not hesitate, therefore, to claim our birthright and enter upon our inheritance. Faith, so greatly extolled by name, is often seriously objected to, directly an attempt is made to translate it out of the realm of vague abstractions into a domain of practical application. Have faith in God as your Father, means, have faith in yourself as divine offspring; and so strongly imbued was the apostle Paul with this assurance that Man is one with his Source that he uttered the startling prayer that we might be filled with all the fulness of God. Though this is an age of transition somewhat overshadowed with doubt and tainted with pessimistic theories of existence, optimistic conclusions are steadily gaining ground, as evidenced by the self-evident fact that the brighter the view a writer or speaker takes of men and things in general, the wider does his or her influence extend, and the larger the number of really thoughtful people found ready to pay tribute to what Matthew Arnold might have called the "sweet reasonableness" of so encouraging a set of propositions. The truth of it all is, we are beginning to realize how totally absurd a philosophy must be which is found self-contradictory and which leads to the exaction of tasks which can not be fulfilled. Everything depends upon the view taken of human nature at the outset of any topical inquiry into the scope of human duties, responsibilities, and privileges; therefore, we propose to base all we have to suggest concerning practical methods for the improvement of human conditions on a radical foundation properly impregnable. It stands to reason that no such reconstruction of a human individual as would necessitate an entire change in the essential constitution of said individual can be looked upon as feasible, and surely no thoughtful or intelligent reformer would ever attempt the self-evidently impossible task of converting a man, woman or child into a sort of being other than human even though the ideal being were of a much higher type than the present actual human. At this point it is well to pause and remark upon the impossibility of our conceiving of superhuman entities in any other than a human manner or regarding them in any other than a human light, seeing that we ourselves are human and by the very limitations of our humanity necessarily circumscribed to a human view of the universe. This thought is an immense help in the direction of our ascertaining how far we can reasonably pursue our studies and carry our reflections Godward.

The universe as seen through human eyes is necessarily a human universe and the conception of Deity inherent in human nature is perforce a human concept. Of abstract Deity we know nothing; of absolute unconditioned Being we can form no idea. It is through ourselves that we view all things; therefore from lowest to highest, from crudest to most sublime, our interpretations of universal life mark stages in our own growth or evolutionary development.

It is in this connection that the differing theories of revelation bearing upon natural and revealed religion come into play, and around this focal centre all theologies and philosophies revolve. We are told by surface students of the career of religious ideas that natural and revealed religion are diametrically opposed, and many a fierce battle of words has been waged over the question, How far is natural religion reconcilable with revealed truth?

In the first place it is absolutely necessary to determine exactly what is meant by the respective terms, for without precise definition of terms employed there can be no clear understanding of what is aimed at.

By natural religion we mean all those conceptions of a spiritual order which have seemingly arisen out of the natural consciousness of human beings, without supposing there to have been any extraneous pressure brought to bear or any tidings furnished from without.

Animism, ancestor worship and all so-called primitive forms of worship are catalogued as natural by those who are sticklers for the widest possible discrimination between natural and revealed, while everything contained in what people are pleased to term the Bible is included in the revealed category. This arbitrary separation has brought about an immense amount of belligerence manifested toward the very book thus over-highly extolled as well as against all institutions and persons committed to its support. The simple Deism of Voltaire, Thomas Paine and other "Radicals" or "Liberals" of the eighteenth century, as well as nearly all the opposition to so-called revealed religion expressed in the writings of Renan and other scholars of the nineteenth century, has largely taken rise in this foolish separation of religious instincts into two diametrically opposed camps; the one inspired and the other not inspired from Heaven.

Though what has borne the name of Secularism is now waning and the professed leaders in the avowed "Liberal" camp are confessing the necessity of devoting more energy to constructive philanthropy and far less than formerly to destructive onslaught upon ecclesiastical institutions, it can not fairly be said that the failure of simple iconoclasm as a basis for permanent union among thinkers and reformers indicates a return to an old order of thought which popular modern authors do not hesitate to call "that wicked old Calvinistic Theology." Present signs clearly point to reconstruction along new lines; lines far broader and in every way more comprehensive than the old. Old theological positions have been abandoned, and what is more, they never were the positions occupied by the best thinkers in the days of our forefathers.

The best type of orthodoxy is the very oldest and the newest heterodoxy is often more largely a revival of the best statements in the old orthodoxy than anything else. The divinity of human nature is declared in the first chapter of Genesis, and primal statements are often the work of greater intellects serving as instruments for more unfolded consciences than are any of those superstructures which are built partly of valuables and partly of rubbish upon the first foundation which is immovable.

Paul, the farsighted apostle, saw that wisely and clearly enough many a time as recorded in his epistles, especially when he referred to there being but one abiding foundation upon which people could build whatever they choose, whatever wisdom in one case and folly in another case may prompt. There will surely come a time of judgment, and when that day of disclosure breaks there will be a perfectly impartial sifting out of refuse, while honor will be paid to every fraction of what is worthy to be preserved.

Simple natural religion may be too small a term to use in order to convey the full meaning which to-day's best thinkers are seeking to make plain, because the word nature has been downgraded very considerably through many successive centuries, and the process of its legitimate up-grading is of course gradual and by no means finished yet. Natural means that which is born; it is therefore quite as exact to speak of that which is born of God as natural as to use the word in connection with that which claims an origin lower than essential Deity. Revealed religion may be quite as natural as any other variety of religion, for on close inspection we find that revelation and discovery are so closely allied that we can scarcely dissever them; they may almost be compared to Siamese twins; they grow together; one can hardly exist without the other. Discovery of truth is the human, or objective, aspect of the situation. Revelation of truth is the divine, subjective side of the question.

What constitutes revelation? Revelation necessitates not only a revealer and something to be revealed, but a third factor also, viz.: some one to whom the revelation can be made or by whom the revelation can be understood. If this latter be lacking there is no revelation, for the picture presented requires an observer to behold it; therefore it is, as we may say, uselessly presented to space when no human eye beholds it and no human reason comprehends it. God can not be revealed to the cattle in the fields as to the reverent human observer of the celestial galaxies, yet sun by day and stars by night are as visible in the field where the cattle are grazing as in an adjoining field where a company of students of astronomy are discussing the glories of the Milky Way or the possibilities of human existence on Sirius or Aldebaran.

"The heavens declare the glory of God," to whom? To whom does the star-bespangled firmament declare God's glory? Verily hath the foolish man even while contemplating the skies said, "There is no God." To Plato, God geometrizes; to John the Evangelist, God is Love; and both are right: one approaching the divine through reason and the other through affection. If, as Swedenborg has told us, Divine Love and Wisdom constitute the totality of real Being, and if as Greek bards, quoted by Paul at Athens, have assured us, we are ourselves Divine offspring, there can be no other basis for the idea of divine revelation except in the consciousness of man responsive to the breath of God.

We can not reasonably or humanely contend that revelation is arbitrary, nor will we ever be justified in teaching that the God who is "no respecter of persons" does respect certain persons and show marked disrespect to others after the manner of a tyrannical autocrat who as a Sovereign dispenses favors on the one hand and metes out cruelty on the other. We may well rejoice that the eclipse has nearly ended, that pessimistic views of divine government are in their death struggle, while the birth cry of a glorious optimism already finds the air tremulous with promise of better, brighter days to come. Let not the reaction against the dying misbelief blind any of us to the verity which underlies it, for the worst features of time-honored error were only incrustations, and excrescences are never integral parts of an anatomy.

We might easily picture to ourselves some ignorant students of anatomy and physiology, dissecting a body and finding an unnatural growth therein, straightway proceeding to speculate upon the place in the structure of that supposed "organ." How the learned doctors would laugh if such well-meaning tyros were to publish a new work on Structural Anatomy or

Comparative Physiology in which place was given to a large tumor in the breast, mentioning it as though it were one of the natural parts of the human mechanism with functions difficult to determine, as, for example, the spleen, which is really a useful organ though not very clearly comprehended.

The excrescences which we find depending upon religious systems are exactly like the faults we detect in others and in ourselves likewise; they exist at the present moment but they are no necessary or even legitimate portions of human character, and, like all parasites, they can be exterminated. We do not in artistic circles confound dust and candle smoke with a rare old painting, though a priceless Murillo found somewhere in Italy may have been brought home to a modern studio in so blackened a condition that the original features of the picture were scarcely discernible.

Restoration removes the dirt and shows up again the original beauty of the painting as it came fresh from the hand of the marvelous artist. How often in religious meetings do we hear the words Redeemer and redemption. And what do they mean when all glosses and subtleties are removed from them? To redeem is to buy back or to restore, and that was the original thought when the word entered the ecclesiastical vocabulary. The orthodox Jew addressing the Eternal Being with no thought of mediator or intercessor in his mind says in words of ancient song, "Thou art our Redeemer." How shall we apply such a phrase directly to our present subject? If God is the original Creator of humankind and we are the makers, shapers, or fashioners of our ulterior existence, then we have turned away from the divine pattern in the soul and made an outward semblance which instead of being a true resemblance is a non-semblance. It behooves us to acknowledge our mistake, confess our error and turn willingly, gladly and submissively to the fountainhead of all wisdom in a spirit of voluntary co-operation with divine activity as expressed in the words of the great Teacher of humanity, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." There is no apparent limit to the conflicting views expressed at present concerning the need of reliance upon God and the necessity of self-reliance. Like all other extremists, those to whom we now refer are on either side making the fatal blunder of looking only upon one side of the two-sided shield; and like the Knights of old they are prepared to fight each other to the death for the honor of one inscription, heedless of the fact that there are two inscriptions upon the same shield though upon opposite sides of it.

To trust in God, to place reliance in boundless goodness, to repose confidence in eternal wisdom, is to prepare ourselves for the actual work we are called upon to do. Instead of trust in God weakening men and making them less self-reliant, it invariably makes them more so, and this is abundantly proved by history and confirmed by the experiences of daily life. "God and I constitute a majority," but one alone constitutes a wretchedly feeble minority. One alone may be a stubborn egotist, but he is no healthy egoist, and there is a vast difference between these two words, though in literal construction there is but the consonant "t" to distinguish them. To place one's self in a receptive attitude toward Divine influx is to harmonize with the Infinite Life all about us, above, below, around, within; and only as we harmonize with our environment are we safe, happy, strong, or free.

The Western world is learning much to-day from Oriental visitors, and at no point are the Indian teachers more helpful than where they insist that the truly spiritualized man could walk safely through the jungles and not be molested by lion, tiger or any other ferocious beast.

The Apocalyptic book of Daniel is familiar to all Bible readers. In its opening chapters that book informs us of four young Hebrews at the court of Babylon who were superior to all things because they had subdued entirely their own animal propensities. Here looms up in gigantic proportions the mountain of limitation which is yet to be cast down and driven into the sea by the power of omnipotent faith. By beginning at the wrong end we are constantly informing others of our failures, and depressing ourselves at sight of our lack of achievement in directions where our energies have been earnestly and at first enthusiastically put forward.

We should never fail or grow discouraged or suffer from a sense of disappointment did we but realize that all development must be from within outward, never in reverse order. Why is it that we trust ourselves so little? Is it not because we have so poor a conception of ourselves, a conception based not on the thought of spirituality, but materiality? What are we? Who are we? Why are we here? What is our mission? These are searching questions, and on the answers to such questions as these our hopes must necessarily depend. If we really are God's image, if we are truly of the same nature with Deity, if we do truly partake of all Divine attributes, and these are infinite, then the "Don't Worry" people have eternal right on their side, or, to phrase it better, they are in harmony with eternal right when they declare God to be infinite and every human individual a part of God's infinite plan.

All outward achievements are gradually evolved; therefore, the Eastern sages who tell us of modern Daniels now alive in Asia must explain step by step to their Western audiences how the heights of attainment of which they speak may progressively be scaled. It is always line by line that we advance in knowledge.

It is ever best to hold steadily before us the highest of all the high ideals of which we can conceive, and declare that these ideals of ours are verily ours, not merely some one's else. We can outwork in action all that we feel we inwardly possess. We must do justice in thought to our own containment and not let false humility figure as a virtue when it is a vice in any right esteem.

There is a proper pride and there is an improper humility; therefore, though the former is generally considered a fault and the latter a virtue, their relative values are by no means thus easily determinable. "Be temperate in all things" is the most salutary counsel. Think no more highly of yourself than of your neighbor. Love your neighbor as you love yourself, neither more nor less. This is the golden path of equity, for we are so indissolubly connected one with others that there can be no safe de-flection from the exact road of absolute impartiality.

Let us neither condemn in ourselves what we praise in others nor condone in self what we blame in others, but, ever seeking honorably to discriminate between the real human nature which often lies concealed and the surface appearances which when unlovely are entirely parasitic, learn to summon forth the divine in the humanity we encounter anywhere, through practical application of that truly ideal philosophy which, while never confounding changeless being with varying existence, takes for its motto the brave, true words of Pope, "Whatever is, is right." All that is, is right, furnishes food for endlessly profitable meditation; then, having defined to ourselves wherein we conceive existence to be but an expression of being, we are ready to set bravely and intelligently to work to make our external operations conform in all respects with the Divine ideal.

THE THREEFOLD MAN—THE FULL DEVELOPMENT AND RIGHT USE OF ALL FUNCTIONS, FACULTIES, AND POWERS—THE IDEAL LIFE.

Having already outlined the dignified, exalted view of human nature which the inspired teachers of all ages have unanimously sought to present to the world, and which all the wisest and clearest among modern thinkers are working earnestly to confirm, we may now pass to a consideration of that ancient threefold idea of human nature which, though permanently emphasized by the Christian Church, by no means entered the world with the commencement of the Christian Era. It is by no means our purpose to discuss any doctrine of divine and human trinity in a dogmatic spirit or with the slightest intention of seeking finally to settle the age-long controversies which had, perhaps, better be abandoned than renewed; however, as this question is forever rising, What are we? or, How are we constituted? we shall make at least a slight attempt to point out by what clearly natural, and, at the same time, truly spiritual processes the idea of three in one has fastened itself upon human thought; yea, more, has deeply and seemingly ineradicably imbedded itself in human consciousness.

Egyptians of long ago, though they held the circle and the winged globe in highest veneration among their sacred emblems, placed the triangle only second to the circle. As the number one represents Life itself, or being per se in all its infinite eternal entirety, the triangle reveals by a mathematical device the threefold properties of Unity. Turn wherever we may we shall find the union of two producing a third; therefore, father, mother, and child are the persons of the original trinity. The most recent archæological discoveries in Egypt are leading explorers in the direction of accepting far more traditions as historical than was their wont even a few years ago. Osiris and Isis, Horus and Set, and many another "divinity of ancient Thebes or Heliopolis," is now being reinvested with historic garments; and the latest Egyptologists do not hesitate to declare that there are strong evidences now accumulating that we can soon read without difficulty records fully ten thousand years old. The God-Kings of whom Manetho and other historians have written are therefore probably not anything like so fabulous as many scholars have long supposed. Be this, however, as it may, the religious concepts of the learned in Egypt in the long ago were certainly intended to deal with far more than simply historical matters, though history has always served to illustrate and embody transcendental ideas.

Human nature alone reveals the universe to man; therefore, however sublime may be the dazzling disc of the solar orb, however inspiring the incessant march of a myriad constellations, it is only in, by, and through human nature that human entities can learn to interpret the universe. And as all results in nature are brought about through strict undeviating conformity to one changeless order commonly called LAW, we must of necessity advance to something like a clear comprehension of how this order works in and through us before we can in any manner solve the riddle of existence.

The Jewish Creed given to the world in the twelfth century of the present era by Moses Maimonides—one of the greatest philosophers Europe has ever known—contains the following highly suggestive and expressive statement: "There never arose in Israel a prophet like unto Moses, who beheld God's similitude." Mark well the words; the philosopher does not say that Moses saw absolute Deity face to face as one man may behold the visage of another: he wisely and reasonably confines himself to the statement that it was the divine similitude which the great prophet actually beheld. What can God's similitude be if it is not human nature? To see the image of God is to be so wise an anthropologist that human nature is no longer a blank mystery to itself. What enigmas we are to ourselves until we become experts in the field of self-discovery! But just to the extent that we have come to know ourselves does everything about us become transparent and luminous. The true scientists of ancient days taught unity and trinity in man and in the universe in the following manner.

There are three great elements, said they—Spirit, Force, Matter; and in man there are three distinct and discrete planes of operation—Spiritual, Intellectual, and Physical: and these three planes are always operative.

So-called death does not—according to the teachings of the mystics or of any who are versed in esoteric philosophy—destroy or remove any one of these three planes of conscious human operation, because the real abiding body is not the physical shape seen with mortal eyes, which is only a correspondential representative.

From Hermes Trismegistus to Emanuel Swedenborg, the great seers and sages of the whole world have all taught essentially the same doctrine couched exactly in such sentences as the famous Hermetic axiom, "As it is above, so is it below," and vice versa.

Cause and effect, inner and outer, must be in correspondence, therefore one must resemble the other; no matter then whether you range yourself with Platonists or Aristotelians, the inductive and deductive philosophers reach the same conclusion finally though they start from diametrically opposite starting-points. To the dreamy introspective visionary of the Orient, the soul (Atman) is primal; all beside it being only expression, but to the externally alert business-driver of the Occident the body is the focal point, and the soul, when first mentioned, seems like some vague, dim abstraction which no one knows where to place or how to define. Among the most modern of metaphysicians, a good deal of haziness prevails, particularly in the use of terms; and as we are apt any day to encounter materialists who declare that matter is everything, and also Christian Scientists, one of whose cries is there is no matter, it will be well for all of us to seek to become clear in our own thought as regards this highly perplexing problem.

Without seeking to dogmatize, it may be helpful to suggest that the three words—Spirit, Force, and Matter—may be treated as notes in a descending scale. Spirit contains Force, Force contains Matter. Were all that we call material to be dissolved, nothing would be destroyed; if force is the larger and matter the smaller fraction, then it is not difficult to comprehend how the lesser can disappear in the greater while the same lesser can not by any stretch of the imagination be supposed to contain or include the greater. Spirit is greater than Force, and Matter is the lowest of the designated elements. In the human economy our spiritual plane of consciousness is the highest; our intellectual plane is intermediary and our physical is the lowest.

These three are good; it is utterly erroneous to teach or even insinuate that spirit is good and matter is evil, though it is perfectly right to insist that the lower must bend to and obey the higher. While man as man contains all the kingdoms of nature, the mineral, vegetable and animal expressions of life are respectively smaller and larger fractions of what is contained in humanity, as they are definitely lower and higher expressions of the universal life-principle. The Oriental teachers now in America often astonish their audiences by statements which must sound at first utterly outlandish to undisciplined ears because they enforce the above propositions, though not always in the same language. Truly the Western races have prized the Hebrew Scriptures, and in them—particularly in the prophetic portions—do we recognize teachings and declarations in perfect consonance with the most extravagant claims of the Brahmins, Buddhists, Jainists or Parsees who may be among us; at the same time it must be remembered that to the bulk of Bible readers such stories as that of Daniel and his three companions in the Babylonian Empire are either fairy tales or else accounts of miraculous or supernatural phenomena which, though occasionally possible thousands of years ago, are impossible to-day, though nobody has ever been able to tell why the law of nature which is said to be unchangeable has changed thus radically in its bearing upon human experience.

The book of Daniel is a correct setting forth of esoteric science and philosophy, but the key to unlock its similitudes must be found, and that key is in ourselves. No amount of simple learning has ever made a man a magician or wonder-worker because nothing short of a consecrated life—a life dedicated to a chosen ideal—can ever suffice to develop the singularly august power over the forces of surrounding nature which our Oriental informants assure us characterize the true magician, differentiating him (or her) from the common throng. To be soberly told in a fashionable hall on Fifth avenue, in New York City, that a really pious or worthy man can walk safely through the jungles of Bengal, because no lion, tiger or other ravenous beast could or would molest him, is to experience either a thrill or a shock until one begins to realize the standard of piety to which the man or woman must have attained before the words of the Eastern lawyer can be accepted as true or reasonable; but once come to understand exactly what is implied in such a startling teaching, and, the mystery beginning to vanish, the seemingly incredible statement becomes comprehensible.

Not alone the teachers who represent distinctly Oriental faiths and schools of philosophy but (in measure) all who have ever sincerely attempted to explain the science of self-mastery have contended for the same ultimate result of psychical development.

In the first place it would be well for the Christian student of the Mysteries to read carefully those portions of the epistles of Paul to the Galatians, Ephesians, Romans and Corinthians in which that true adept of eighteen centuries ago points the way to victory over carnality which is possible for all who seriously undertake it. Paul's threefold classification of human nature is familiar to all readers and churchgoers. Body, Soul and Spirit is the conventional translation. By soul in this connection is meant simply psyche, from which the very popular word psychical is directly derived, not zoe, which is the higher term for life in Greek.

There are clearly three planes of consciousness in every one of us, and according as one or the other predominates in action are we masters of circumstance or slaves of fate. Swedenborg's teaching concerning the three loves is perfectly clear, for however much people may dispute over such scholastic terms as soul, mind and spirit, the love of God, of neighbor, and of self are easily definable without recourse to scholasticisms. The love of God is a purely spiritual affection which may be defined as love of goodness per se. Lovers of righteousness there are among us to-day who are so devoted to ideals that no personal considerations weigh heavier than thistle-down with them if placed in the balance with fidelity to conviction or loyalty to equity itself. This highest love is absolutely universal, it transcends all personalities and is in nature absolutely equitable and equable. To the one who loves goodness itself all else seems paltry and contemptible in contrast therewith. Such a love defies temptation of every sort and serenely surmounts every allurement of the senses, as it conquers completely every sophistication of the intellect and subdues to itself every passion of the flesh.

To the earnest student of philosophy who can never rest content until he discovers how to make transcendent teachings apply to daily living, Swedenborg's treatises concerning the subjugation of lower to higher affections can not fail to afford the sublimest satisfaction, living as we do in the midst of all varieties of conflicting and depressing theories, tending to favor a reversion to Buddhistic pessimism rather than a true advance to the ideal condition which the greatest teachers of all the earth have acknowledged as one of complete expression, never of enforced repression or restraint.

There are as many different theories of life promulgated in Asia as in Europe or America, and while it is well that we should become acquainted with all theories it is highly essential that we should learn to discriminate between misconceptions and beautiful ideals. Though there are many who contend that the main difference between Oriental and Christian philosophy is that the former denies while the latter insists upon individual immortality, it is not by any means true that the doctrine known as absorption into Deity is anything more than a tenet of one school of Oriental dreamers unindorsed by the brightest Asiatic thinkers.

Sir Edwin Arnold's poems have received the cordial indorsement of eminent Buddhists in Ceylon, and wherever that distinguished English bard has traveled in the East he has been welcomed most cordially as a worthy and truthful exponent of the faith of the native Hindus. In "The Light of Asia" we are introduced to Buddha as a young man practising rigid asceticism, but as an older and wiser man recanting self-imposed torture and counseling his faithful and devoted disciples to practise all the virtues indeed, but at the same time to partake freely of those right and useful pleasures pertaining to the external state which are not sinful, but, on the contrary, virtuous.

There are several intimations in the New Testament that Jesus was no ascetic or recluse, though John the Baptist was undoubtedly an anchorite of the desert, and on some occasions the great hierophant of Galilee, the Man of Nazareth, was severely censured because he did not throw in his lot with those who considered the practice of physical austerities the only road to spiritual emancipation. At the base of the austere and forbidding view of life which builds monasteries and confines men and women in silent solitary cells lies the poisonous belief that the flesh is an enemy to be destroyed, instead of a servant to be governed or an instrument to be employed by the dominating spirit.

The ascetic who spends his time in flagellations and other equally useless self-imposed tortures is as much a sensualist in one sense as the roué or libertine who lives only for sensuous enjoyment, for, though the one hates the flesh and makes war upon its appetites while the other idolizes and pampers it, one is no freer from constant thought about the flesh than is the other.

The ideal life is a life that travels along a reasonable road between the extremes of self-indulgence and self-destruction, and though we may safely say that of the two the recluse is the less dangerous person to society, we can not hold up as an ideal any state that has some negative but no positive virtue to recommend it. The ideal life is that which understands how the spirit which is the life can make itself manifest in the threefold manner which we call moral, intellectual, and physical perfection, and though perfection seems very far off from even the most advanced among us, it must be steadfastly adhered to as obtainable.

Be ye perfect is ever the Master's Word whose wonder-working power no mind short of a Master's can duly estimate; and this command would never have been given to disciples by the wisest of Adepts had it not been possible for us all to profit by holding it before us as a beacon-light to guide us on our way to the harbor of celestial accomplishment. The three planes of our nature denominated moral, intellectual, and physical are alike good, but they must be rightly subordinated one to the other. This is a truth which needs reiteration.

Moral impulses are necessary to guide intellectual force aright, and reason must at all times hold the rein and compel the flesh to serve its legitimate superior. The Oriental teachings which divide man into seven parts are very ancient and not at all difficult to understand so soon as any one has mastered the esoteric meaning of seven days of the mystical week, seven rainbow colors, seven musical notes, seven churches of Asia, seven spirits of God, etc., etc., all of which seemingly mysterious lore is clearly capable of scientific elucidation. But though the septenary constitution of humanity is a favorite theme with those who drink in wisdom through Oriental channels, the whole drift of Oriental Theosophy tends only to an ultimate admission that there is a higher and there is also a lower division of human nature, rendering possible the alchemical work of transmutation, mystically viewed.

The higher triad is to govern the lower qua-

ternary—so say the advocates of the sevenfold idea. As the sevenfold classification is rather complex and bewildering to Western ears, it is always best when speaking to general audiences in America or England to endeavor to unlock existence with a fourfold key, and as the square is a symbol which all appreciate, as it is the symbol of equity and certainly of concord, we will confine ourselves to a fourfold terminology in our present endeavors to make plain the basis on which we may cause to rest an edifice of culture of which none need feel ashamed.

Spirituality is the first and highest of the four necessary terms. This must be apprehended in some such appreciation of divine truth as that which made possible the writings of Jacob Boehme, Fenelon, Mme. Guyon, and indeed all the mystics. The conception of divine immanence as well as transcendence has made possible the sublime poetry of William Cullen Bryant, who could not otherwise have written his Thanatopsis, and of all who have ever apprehended in any sense something of the rich vein of inner meaning in the mighty words, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

No crude belittling thought of measureless divinity is voiced in so magnificent a phrase, for truly the sight of God does not consist in any petty vision of a monarch on a gorgeous throne, but in the intense realization that all is good essentially, and that, no matter in what direction events may move seemingly, in reality all paths are winding onward and upward into ever-brightening light.

Spirit means strength, energy, force, power, breath, air; it comes in English from the Latin Spiritus and the Greek Pneuma. In old Saxon the word Gast, and in German Geist, means about the same, and it is from those two words that the term Holy Ghost has entered the English ecclesiastical vocabulary. To be high-spirited, brave-spirited, noble-spirited, etc., is to be strong, vigorous, energetic and capable in the extreme.

There is surely nothing resembling weakness in Spirit, which is the very breath of life. The term low-spirited correctly means possessed of very little spirit, i. e., of very slight energy or power.

When Bulwer Lytton wrote "The Coming Race"—in some respects the most marvelous of all his strange romances—he called the people, who were further advanced in many ways than we of to-day, Vril-Ya, and surely it is not difficult to trace the etymological origin of the term Vril, so close of kin is it to the Latin Vir, meaning the superior man, contradistinguished from homo, the ordinary man.

Hebrew contains two words of similar import, viz.: Ish, the superior or spiritual man, and Odom, the earthly man. Though both are good, each in his proper place, the one must dominate the other, just as the vril sticks in the hands of Lytton's heroes enabled them to control all nature around them, as well as preserve health in their own organisms and rid their country of all noxious and dangerous creatures, such as the monstrous Grec, which the boy of twelve reduces to a little pile of cinders with a move of his enchanter's wand.

Magic, stripped of all its superfluities, is only the knowledge and practice of that true Occultism which is by no means made up of terrible secrets and weird incantations, but consists truly of knowledge how to gain complete mastery over all the inferior planes of consciousness which the spirit must finally completely rule. As the spirit expands to take the sceptre of government in hand, it masters all inferior things, reducing to perfect obedience whatever has aforetime seemed incorrigibly insubordinate.

Morality, which we regard as the first of the three planes on which the jurisdiction of the indwelling spirit is to be made manifest, is not by any means spirituality itself, and it is for this reason that theologians have clung (though often very blindly) with such amazing tenacity to their favorite doctrine that mere morality is utterly inadequate for salvation. Faith has been the theological term which has been made to do duty for spirituality, and this has occasioned much misunderstanding among many honest people largely on account of the diverse meanings attaching to the word faith, and most of all by reason of its being so frequently identified with belief—a term which is by no means correctly employed as synonymous with it. It is only when we rise to the higher meaning of the word faith that we can intelligently connect it with spirituality, which truly signifies capability for discerning spiritual realities through an opening up of those interior faculties which enable us to enjoy intromission to the spiritual state which is immortal.

If faith in this sense be understood as the evidence of things unseen by mortal eyes or the substantial realization of what we have long been hoping for, there is no difficulty whatever in comprehending the province and use of intelligent faith considered as a means of introducing us to the palpable realities of the spiritual realm.

Agnostics and even materialists may be thoroughly ethical in conduct and therefore faithful in the restrictive moral use of the term, but though moral and therefore exemplary in their lives they are painfully destitute of spiritual perception, and from that cause experience far less joy, and consequently far more depression, than would fall to their portion were they convinced of spiritual realities.

Morality is often legal, compulsory and sometimes almost entirely conventional, and though a good thing as far as it goes, if it is unillumined with light from spiritual perception, it can scarcely be trusted to stand the test of any severe strain upon it, though it must honestly be confessed that many people are far more spiritually unfolded than they know. True spirituality shines through every thought, word, and deed, but though luminous as the brightest light and all-pervasive as radiant heat, it is entirely unassuming and equally unobtrusive.

Swedenborg was unmistakably correct when he averred that truly regenerated people do not know of their own regeneration, meaning that they are so entirely simple and natural in their way of living as to be entirely free from every disagreeable phase or variety of self-consciousness.

An ideal life must in some way resemble the pattern described in the Gospel narratives, for no matter how widely scholars may differ as to the authority, genuineness or authenticity of one or all of the four evangels, and regardless also of the many seeming discrepancies in all accepted or authorized texts, there is something in the amazing versatility of the character of the Ideal Man which calls forth supremest admiration from all who allow their hearts and minds together to be touched by the sublime beauty of the matchless narrative of the life of Jesus.

Ernst Renan and other sceptical writers have paid magnificent tributes to the Christ ideal, and if the picture as presented in the New Testament be imperfect (as it doubtless is) the reality which inspired it must be infinitely more glorious than the transcript in the world's possession. It is not, however, necessary to settle any historic controversy or to look back 1,900 years to view humanity's ideal. Look within is ever wiser counsel than gaze without. History may be partly fabulous; some facts may have been suppressed and others altered, but the light within ever points the road to the highest imaginable attainment. It is not to the outward but to the inner Horeb, Sinai, Tabor, and Olivet that we must ever turn for completest guidance in the heavenward direction.

An ideal life is not a copy: it is an original; and therein lies the vital distinction which forever separates immortal genius from mortal talent, the work of the great masters from the imitations thereof by their followers. No two human lives can be precisely identical. No one individual can live through all the experiences of the race, but wherever any of us may be situated in the anatomy of the Grand Man we may be healthful, happy, noble, useful, and in every way contributive to the general weal.

The Kingdom of Heaven can not be a republic because the citizens of a republic must be equals, and all men and women can be esteemed equals, but the heavenly kingdom which is to be set up first in individual lives, then in special institutions, and finally in the entire world, is a state or condition of affairs in which the true order of life must be acknowledged and openly declared.

Moral impulses must direct the intellect so that it in turn may exercise rightful and beneficent sovereignty over all physical conditions.

The Spiritual Realm per se may be regarded as the all-containing sphere out of which all expressions of life proceed. The moral region is the seat of all that we mean by conscience and whatsoever else directs us to obey the moral law, without which we should be utterly unable to live together in any organized social conditions.

The intellectual plane is the abode of executive ability, the seat of all that we call reason—the storehouse of practical knowledge; while the physical condition is one of final expression or ultimate embodiment in which all things perceived by understanding can be wrought out in corresponding forms of use.

An ideal life socially considered, i. e., an ideal communal life, is a life which expresses all varieties of possible human excellence, but an ideal individual life may be devoted to but a single aim and fulfill but a solitary purpose, but it must so fulfill whatever it has undertaken as to make its influence felt for good as a vital part of the Great Life in which it finds itself inclosed. This teaching concerning life is in no sense offered to the world as a completed system of philosophy so far as particular details are concerned, but in bold, general outline we claim for it universal acceptance sooner or later, because it is based not on doubtful speculations concerning what may be, but is evolved out of actual experience of what human nature really is, as that nature reveals itself in every instance of unfolding humanity.

CONSCIENCE, INTUITION, AND INTERIOR ILLUMINATION.

The three terms which head this chapter are often used indiscriminately, without much if any attempt so far to disengage them one from another as to cause them to convey definitely distinct ideas to the mind; it seems therefore helpful at the outset to make an endeavor to differentiate their meanings clearly. The word conscience though a very common term is very rarely analyzed, but no sooner do we divide it into the two words con and science than we find that it necessarily signifies what we know collectively or concretely or what we all know together. The syllable con and the noun science need to be considered first apart and then together, in order to lead to a clear understanding of what must have originally been the thought of those lexicographers who introduced conscience into the dictionary. When we speak of cons as distinct from pros we mean arguments against instead of for, but when we use such words as congregation, consociation and other terms of kindred import we intend to suggest co-operation or confederation, i. e., more than one, generally quite a considerable number of persons (ten or more) working together with a common end in view and united in the bonds of intellectual and moral fellowship. Individual conscience is properly the sum of individual knowledge, which the word science signifies. A social or corporate conscience is the sum of the knowledge possessed by a community. It is therefore equally correct to speak of private and public or of particular and general conscience. Is conscience or the sum of knowledge a matter for education? is often asked. Of course it must be if by education we mean development, but not if education is degraded in our esteem to the base level of something nearly approaching cramming. Conscientiousness is one of the commodities of the brain expressed through one of the organs clearly discernible through the skull and easily traced by any or all who have even a superficial knowledge of phrenology or who can delineate character by means of cranial diagnosis.

This organ like all others contracts or develops, expands or shrivels accordingly as it is stimulated to increased expression or permitted to become dormant through lack of exercise. Though conscience may be determinable as to its essential nature or distinctive quality, no one is justified in stating that it is equally developed in all persons; therefore, two or more persons following equally the dictates of their own consciences may display very different and widely unequal degrees of moral excellence.

If one person is highly conscientious while another is far less so, it is but reasonable to declare that the conscientious act of the one will be a very much higher or more truly moral act than the equally conscientious act of the other; i. e., the one who has undergone but slight expansion in the region of conscientiousness may be as conscientious as the other intentionally, though the actual conduct of the one might be repellant to the moral feeling of the other. To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him the non-action or reverse action is sin, but without knowledge there can not be the responsibility that comes only with knowledge. The foregoing proposition suffices to account in a thoroughly logical manner for very much that frequently causes great embarrassment among such as listen to controversies concerning the nature and functions of conscience without having reached anything like a clear decision of their own. Wherever there is room for controversy there is assuredly some truth on both sides of the debate; neither the one who takes the affirmative nor the one who takes the negative ever being wholly in the right, for self-evident propositions or axiomatic certainties such as go to make up the multiplication table do not admit of discussion. Debatable ground must be to a certain extent terra incognita, or undiscovered country. Honest debaters are explorers seeking fresh supplies of truth rather than priggish egotists vainly imagining that their bucketful of information on a given subject exhausts the reservoir or ocean of ascertainable knowledge.

Conscience is an infallible guide to its possessor so far as it extends, just as mathematical knowledge is infallible to the extent that one possesses it, but no further. Because a child knows that $12 \times 12 = 144$ does not prove that the same child can give a correct answer to the examiner's question: What is 13 times 13? Conscience may be compared to knowledge of the multiplication table, which everybody learns as far as 12 times 12, but often no further. Questions may need to be decided requiring answers to such advanced queries as what is 83 times 947? And though there is an answer to the more advanced as well as to the less advanced inquiry, it by no means follows that because you can reply accurately to the one you know the answer to the other.

Here comes in the doctrine of the infallibility of ascertained truth and the companion doctrine of the limitless progress in the discovery of truth possible to all humanity. Truth is necessarily unalterable in character but our apprehension of it is necessarily progressive; therefore, though our knowledge of truth can not alter, it enlarges. This distinction between alteration and enlargement is surely a vital and most important one.

An architect designs a building say seven stories in height; he submits his plans to a builder who employs workmen to erect the edifice in exact accord with the predetermined plan; this they do, continuously erecting one story upon another till the seventh story is finished and the roof put on. Digging for the foundation is the first stage of the process, roofing in the structure is the last. Between the first and the last there must be many stages of the work arrived at, each in successive order, but no one process is any more important or better than any other, seeing that all are alike necessary to the completion of the pile. In like manner we are all building our temple of character; raising the house from its foundation upward, step by step, logically and consecutively, for in no other way can the temple be upreared.

Our conscience is not by any means so large in development at the beginning as at the end of this process, for only as we practically build do we evolve our inherent or involved ability to acquire knowledge. Potentially we do not change but actually we grow constantly, and as the lower stages must be passed through as we journey toward the higher the degree of light obtainable below is far less than that which we shall clearly discern as we mount above.

Faulty because inadequate, as all illustrations must be, analogies frequently help to suggest a truth otherwise obscure. Our illustration of the gradual building of a structure is at least suggestive and may serve the useful end of helping some incipient thinkers along the road of reasoning to a point where they will be able to revise their terminology or at least retranslate it, so that "an accusing conscience," "a guilty conscience" and similar phrases will mean something far more definite than they may have signified hitherto.

Conscience can not be guilty, but conscience does upbraid. Through the very act of upbraiding it bids us to rise to higher moral levels; it should therefore be regarded far more in the light of a monitor than in that of an accuser. The doctrine of evolution which is now applied to morals and religion fully as much as to purely intellectual and physical development has threatened to make complete havoc of all time-honored theologic views of conscience, for instead of conscience appearing as it formerly appeared as the direct voice of God upbraiding rebellious man by reason of his transgressions, it is relegated to a position of equality with other human faculties and along with all the rest is coming to be regarded as simply a product of education or of evolution.

On closer examination we shall, however, discover that only the harsh and forbidding phases of the old idea are becoming obsolete. Such pleasing phrases as "A good conscience," "A conscience void of offense," and many others of similar import are to be constantly encountered in the course of Paul's epistles, from which letters the entire body of orthodox Christianity has been deduced. Paul is a much overrated as well as underrated man. To the eyes of his devoted admirers this remarkable Saul of Tarsus ranks fully as high as, if not higher than, even John the beloved disciple, while to those who are distinctly unfriendly to his claims he appears as a cruel fanatic, his fanatic cruelty being just as evident on the one hand after his conversion to Christianity as it was on the other prior to his change of intellectual front and moral aspect.

Paul's views on conscience like all his other opinions are various; he can not be other than uneven in the expression of his sentiments, for he is too intrepid a character to be a calm, dispassionate philosopher, and only the utterly unprejudiced or entirely dispassionate can so calmly and clearly weigh all matters submitted to their judgment that their views on every subject, though not infallible, are at any rate sane. With the Paul type of individual, life is a conflict, the world a battle ground; fleshly lusts are constantly warring against the soul, therefore what is known as conscience plays an intensely real and sometimes a cruelly formidable part in the experiences of such a person's interior or subjective existence.

It is interesting to note that Paul's letters contain numerous allusions to bodily infirmities, and his pathetic mention of "a thorn in the flesh" is a characteristic instance of how keenly he felt his physical derangements.

As so very large a portion of the modern Christian doctrine concerning conscience has been derived from the Pauline epistles, it is well to remember that their author was by no means a perfect type of vigorous, healthy manhood, and though at least four of those epistles are beyond doubt "genuine" in the scholastic or critical sense, it by no means therefore follows that the teaching they contain is untinctured with unduly pessimistic views of life. We are living in days when bodily and mental action and reaction are being analytically considered as never before, and though many physiologists attribute altogether too much to the influence of the flesh upon the spirit, there are not lacking those among metaphysicians who are too narrowly exclusive in their dealing with mental states, seeing that they entirely overlook reflex action in their passionate zeal for the honor of the cult of mental healing.

Primarily it is always true that mental states are responsible for physical conditions, but so many questions pertaining to heredity and outside influence upon sensitive natures must be taken into account in addition to one's own mental activity that a wholesale statement of an utterly unqualified character is apt to be misleading.

Such eminent women as Harriet Martineau and others equally conscientious in the highest moral sense did not hesitate to attribute a large portion of their mental despondency to physical disabilities, while the noble English preacher, Frederic Robertson, told his congregation that when he was suffering acutely from physical distemper he saw everything as through a thick, black crepe veil.

How frequently it occurs that people condemn themselves for the commission of all manner of crimes of which they are innocent by reason of the disordered states of their physical organisms! Conscience and health are vitally related, and one can not be fairly treated without considering the other. It is far juster as a rule to attribute wrong-doing alike in children and adults to illness (and then seek to aid them on the road to health) than it ever can be to resort to ferocious punishments which are unmistakable souvenirs of barbarism even though intelligent people are not found wanting who sanction and advise them.

When, however, benevolently-disposed people advocate barbaric measures it is never because they prefer such measures to milder means, but always by virtue of their belief (which is false) that no better way exists for protecting society or reforming the aggressor. When you say to some people that it would be better to appeal to the consciences of evil-doers, their answer is apt to be the manifestly unfair and unkind one—"Such people have no consciences." Truly the consciences of such are dormant, possibly embryotic, but germs of conscience at any rate are theirs. Much confusion exists in many places concerning the attitude which a conscientious person feels called upon to take in a disputed religious matter where cruel persecution of others is frequently involved. Consciences may be enlightened by reason, or unenlightened; therefore the act of a conscientious person is largely determined by his intelligence, though

In days of fierce passionate struggle for the ascendency of some particular dogma against all opposition, conscientious fanatics may burn and imprison "heretics," believing they are doing God and humanity a righteous service. Such people are ignorant and belligerent, and have carried ignorance and belligerence into the field of religious controversy. They are unreasoning; therefore, while they speak of acting conscientiously, we shall find them too much blinded by prejudice and too much excited by partisan feeling ever seriously to question the right or wrong of their intrepid acts.

It is at this point that we would take decided issue with many gifted orators and writers concerning the place occupied by conscience in the work of persecution. In many a professedly religious person strong animal appetites are simply held in check by the command of a creed, but they are not conquered; therefore whenever the subterfuge can be resorted to that the cause of religion will be served by indulging those passions to the utmost, they are given unrestricted freedom and in the name of religion brutality is enthroned. In war times the savage instinct to go out and kill something is let loose to a terrible extent, and even though some of the causes leading up to war are justifiable, war itself is nothing other than a venting of the lowest spleen in human nature.

We very much prefer the doctrine that there are different degrees in the unfoldment of conscience as manifested by different individuals, and that conscience may be spoken of in terms of more or less, than the theory that conscience itself is ever unethical.

Turning from conscience to Intuition we pass to decidedly higher ground and reach a plane of thought where all the doubtful workings of what may or may not be correctly designated conscience are left far below. Intuition however is a vaguely translated word, though its etymology is plain. It is simply tuition with the prefix in. All ordinary training through the senses might rightly be termed extuition, as the tutor is generally one who relies altogether upon external sources of information and employs equally exterior means to reach the understanding of the pupil. It is in the school of Plato rather than in that of Aristotle that we learn of the workings of intuition.

The dæmon of Socrates need not have been an extraneous guardian spirit, but may well be considered as the "higher self" or anima divina of the great philosopher. Plato, the faithful scribe and devoted disciple of his illustrious teacher, though he pays ample tribute to the influence exerted by his personal master, goes very much further than could any mere follower or imitator in expanding the Socratic theory. Innate ideas are not acceptable to the materialistic reasoner, therefore the typical West which is essentially materialistic in its mode of thought and action has taken very kindly to the views of Aristotle, while Plato has been regarded chiefly as a classic dreamer, a master of style, but not a practical guide for the young thinkers of Europe or America.

The East, essentially mystical and contemplative, recognizes intuition and along with it telepathy, psychometry and all else that the West is investigating at the present time with more or less of thoroughness. It is, however, in the spiritual region of consciousness that intuition finds its stronghold. Not only Emerson, but James Martineau as well, may be cited as an example of confidence in intuition, though the latter if not also the former has again and again proved himself a very close intellectual reasoner. Dr. Martineau's great book, written as late if not later than his eightieth year, "The Seat of Authority in Religion," is in one sense extremely rationalistic, as in some places it suggests the conclusions of Lecky in his "History of European Morals," but when the final test is to be applied and the soul of the subject is to be revealed, Martineau, with consummate skill, uses rationalism to defeat agnosticism and comes forth solidly as an advocate of the religion of the indwelling spirit. Such a book is a noble study, and particularly helpful must it be to those who are tossed and buffeted upon the desolate ocean of doubt, unable to accept any historic evidences of Christianity or any other formulated system of theology, and yet deeply conscious within themselves of an indwelling spirit which not only makes for righteousness in the ethical sense, but also testifies to the reality of God and the certainty of human immortality. Martineau's exquisite poem, which begins with the well-known lines:

> "He who himself and God would know
> Into the silence let him go
> And lifting off pall after pall > Reach to the inmost depth of all,"

is one of the most beautiful specimens of modern sacred verse in any language. So noble a hymn agrees well with the conclusions reached by its scholarly author, who, fifty years ago, was a fine specimen of conservative English Unitarianism, as his old collection of hymns still used in some chapels abundantly testifies. Later on in his ministerial and literary career his "10 Services for Christian Worship" show still the conservative spirit permeated with a deep extra-theological spiritual consciousness, while his more recent hymnal, "Hymns of Prayer and Praise" (for the last twenty years a great favorite in England), breathes an ever-widening spirit and shows that the compiler of so fine a collection of sacred songs knew how to cull the finest gems of psalmody from all sources, and while not by any means avoiding distinctively Christian sentiment, could minister equally well to devout thinkers and aspiring hearts outside as well as inside any denominational fold.

The most vulnerable places in all ecclesiastical armors are the most external. Popular Biblical criticism even of the "higher" order deals almost entirely with matters which are after all historical rather than spiritual. Were there two or three Isaiahs? How many psalms out of the one hundred and fifty which constitute the accepted psalter were written by David? Who wrote the Fourth Gospel or the Epistle to the Hebrews? All such questions, which could be multiplied indefinitely, in no way touch the essence of religion, though they are of great historic interest and the answers to them are not to be despised. The new polychrome Bible is the latest, most ambitious and most useful of the many attempts yet made to familiarize the reading public with the results of late Biblical scholarship, but after examining specimen pages of this great new work—a monumental undertaking—one does not feel at all indisposed to turn again to Joseph Parker's "People's Bible" and listen to a pastoral rather than to a rigidly scientific rendering of the venerated text.

Suppose Joseph's coat was "long-sleeved" rather than many-colored, and Abraham's wife was afraid of being "laughed at" instead of expecting to be "laughed with," as an old version phrased it, it is gratifying in the extreme to see how little difference all these changes and revisions make in the general trend of the moral instructions suggested by the narratives.

Intuitive people are apt to be somewhat regardless of textual criticism, as they do not depend on literature (even the best) for illumination. Authors before books; painters must exist prior to paintings; therefore, should all the venerable volumes now extant be looked upon as forgeries, the soul would not be dismayed because it never depends upon books for its enlightenment.

If the seat of authority in religion be not outward, but inward, intuitive and prophetic, not sacerdotal and ecclesiastic, then should all hierarchies be found to rest on sand; the solid rock of interior certitude would forever constitute the stable base for all abiding religious consciousness. The scholastic theologians have always admitted that God can be revealed to man in two ways, viz.: either by direct divine action within the individual human soul, or through the agency of an appointed hierarchy. Because individual perceptions differ, the plea is made that God has ordained the hierarchy; a claim easy to assert but very difficult to substantiate if we study facts of history.

Intuition of course varies in degree in different persons, also in the same people at various times; but though this may be taken as an accepted fact based on science and verified by innumerable experiences, such an admission by no means invalidates the claim of intuition itself to high regard as the chief factor in conveying truth to the innermost consciousness of humanity.

Intuition is in no sense whatever a substitute for reason—a faculty which it certainly is never destined to supplant—because reason is appealed to in all normal cases to act upon the information brought to it through intuition's gateway. An illustration here may prove helpful. Picture to yourself an auditorium to which there are two entrances, one from the outer street, a busy public thoroughfare; the other from a college or private residence like a bishop's house attached to a cathedral. Access is gained to the center of the audience-room through both aper-

tures, but those who enter by these respective doors face while entering in opposite directions. Two sets of information can be given by these two distinct classes of people, who, if they are both intelligent and truthful, will say nothing contradictory to each other's statements, though they will furnish news respectively which could only have been gained in the quarters whence they had come.

Question the spokesman of the one party concerning the affairs of the street, and he, fresh from the marts of trade, may readily acquaint you with the transactions of the marketplace though he can know absolutely nothing of the private or collegiate life to which he has not been admitted; the spokesman on the other side who has entered from the bishop's palace or the seminary behind the church can give information of a totally different kind, but knows nothing of the outer world.

The testimony of the senses and also of intuition like that of these two sets of people can be submitted to the reason for analysis and application, but it must always continue to be the case that whatever enters the house where reason sits enthroned from the outside must pertain to the realm of sense, while demonstrations of spiritual truth can only enter through the gate that leads within.

It has been commonly supposed that, because intuition has been esoterically termed feminine and reason masculine, therefore females are more intuitive than males. This is not necessarily the case, though it is a recorded fact that more women than men have been hitherto distinguished by the possession and exercise of a very reliable and helpful intuitive faculty. Woman's quieter and more domestic mode of life has not militated against her intuitive development as it has against her brother's, and as it must always be the province of women to be the mothers of the race, and maternity greatly fosters the intuitive side of human nature, there will probably always remain a majority of intuitive women and of intellectual men until the stage in common growth is reached where there will be such an equalization of human development as the world hitherto has never realized or seen.

Business of an entirely secular kind is perforce conducted in an atmosphere not very highly conducive to spiritual culture; at the same time it needs to be enforced that we need not continue to be as blatantly materialistic in our business methods in future as we have been in the past and still are in the present.

Commerce, when it is righteous commerce, is no drawback to the leading of a noble moral life, and the day will surely come when no phase of spiritual experience will be hampered by engaging in any form of secular employment. But as yet the time has not fully come when business methods are spiritual methods, therefore only in occasional instances—marked exceptions to the general rule—do we find the leaders in commerce palpably dowered with a very large supply of intuition.

It must not be inferred from what has just been said that we are arguing against the introduction of intuitive guidance into the field specially occupied by worldly duties; on the contrary, our contention is that not unless and never until intuition inspires commerce will the business of the world be successfully accomplished.

Intuition is insight, seership, ability to detect motives and witness the operation of underlying causes which give forth physical effects. Consider, then, how great a boon would be conferred on honest workers and how greatly discomfited dishonorable schemers would be if insight, penetration, or interior discernment could throw a flashlight on the crooked dealings of "Jim the Penman" and his ilk. Of what use are letters of introduction, "gilt edged" or "A 1" references, unless one can be assured of their genuineness? And it is surely admitted everywhere that history has proved again and again that counterfeiting in many directions has been brought to such a pitch of perfection as to almost defy the skill of the most accomplished experts.

Intuition can never be enjoyed where prejudice of any sort prevails, for wherever there is present a fixed idea, an intuitive revelation, unless it accord therewith, is almost certain of rejection. The intuitive man or woman is transparently honest, keen, shrewd, discerning, but never in the least suspicious. Suspicion is allied to jealousy and many another vice and weakness, therefore Othello, who was suspicious, was deceived by the treacherous Iago; while Emilia, who was pure, was penetrative enough to know that Desdemona was entirely innocent of the fault of which she was cruelly accused. Shakespeare, in his Moor of Venice, has shown us very clearly how extremely liable to become deception's prey is a suspicious spirit, because the willingness to accuse a person of a wrong on hearsay evidence gives proof of an undiscerning, undiscriminating temper.

Interior illumination is, if we may use such an expression, intuition raised to its highest power. Simple intuition may concern and often does concern matters of personal or private interest chiefly, but spiritual illumination is nothing less than a flooding of the understanding with celestial light to such an extent that dark problems become luminous; and, where once there was no guiding star above, the heavens have become radiant with the glory of the Star of Bethlehem and the air vocal with the songs of heaven's choristers.

In olden times there were three classes of acknowledged superior people, respectively designated Literati, Inspirati and Illuminati. The first were what we understand to-day by the literary fraternity, only by reason of literature being confined within very much narrower limits than at present; men of letters were rare birds in a sense in which they are certainly not rare to-day, albeit the highest type of literature is even now scarce and at a premium.

The second of the three classes mentioned contained all those singularly gifted people who furnish food for special thought and give opportunity for particular investigation by reason of their "psychical" endowments. The third class, and the third only, was composed of those who realized within themselves the truth of what some of our recent poets have referred to as "the inward light and living word."

The first division embraces the lettered; the second, the specially "mediumistic;" the third, the divinely enlightened. All have their place and work; all are honorable, useful, and necessary if they are but faithful; but however much the world may be indebted to the two former classes for instruction, it would be vain to deny that only the third comprises such teachers of the race as deserve to rank as masters and who have learned to possess themselves at all times and in all ways.

Let no one think that earlier and feebler stages of attainment can safely be despised because the higher far transcends the lower in point of dignity and use alike. Those who have been faithful over a few things are promised rulership over much; those who have used one talent are soon found to possess two, while those who decline to honor a small trust or fulfill a trifling opportunity are after awhile deprived of the little they have scouted.

Fidelity to seemingly insignificant obligations is the certain stepping-stone to eventual illumination, for no matter how small a duty may appear it must never be considered unimportant. The true road to prophetic heights is traversed by all who in any capacity, no matter how humble or obscure, diligently live up to the highest truth perceived by them. The world's standards of measurement are often radically false, therefore there are no exterior criteria whereby the adept of the ages can be judged. Illumination may radiate over the earth from a temporal throne as in the tradition of Zoroaster, or it may proceed from despised Nazareth as in the legend of the Christ. Wisdom is justified of all her children, regardless of their birthplaces or their occupation.

The story of the twelve apostles is marvelously impressive when read in the light of universal knowledge. Several of the disciples, who become apostles, are fishermen, and there is no hint in any one of the four Gospels that they relinquish their business after they have received illumination from on high. One apostle (Luke) is a physician, another (Matthew) is taken from the receipt of custom; he is therefore a tax collector: and in no instance are we told that occupation or previous training had aught to do with qualifications necessary for the work of an apostle. As the world's population is made up of all varieties of people it is essential that all classes and descriptions should be reached by teachers specially competent in their respective fields of industry. The scholarship of Oxford or Cambridge is not needed for the east end of London, nor is the dialect of Whitechapel adapted to the drawing-rooms of Belgravia. Let us steer absolutely clear of attempted uniformity on which so many narrow-minded workers wreck their vessels and lose their fish. Unity of spirit we do require; uniformity of method is a drawback, not a help. Rejoicing in our special capacities to do useful service in some given direction (no matter what), we can heartily co-operate in heart with all sincere philanthropists the wide world over, and, if we are but absolutely faithful, illumination may assuredly be ours regardless altogether of our outward state.

IV.

SLEEP, DREAMS, AND VISIONS—HOW WE MAY GAIN THE MOST FROM THEM.

Though sleep is one of the commonest or most matter-of-fact experiences in our lives, it is very rarely that we encounter any one in these excited days who is inclined to take the view of sleep and its spiritual benefits taken by many of the worthies of olden times, whose experiences during sleep form the topic of a considerable portion of the Biblical narrative alike in the Old and New Testaments. The well-known text, "He giveth his beloved sleep," has formed the suggestive headline of many a touching hymn, but beautiful though the sentiment in its ordinary rendering unquestionably is, by no means the full value of the original is brought out in the conventional translation. "He giveth to his beloved while they are sleeping" is a much fuller interpretation, carrying the thought as it does very much further than the familiar reading suggests. If we are wearied and in need of sleep, sleep is a precious blessing; but if our idea of it rises no higher than the ordinary conception of temporary repose or cessation of activity, we can not take that ennobling and satisfying view of sleep which those seers and sages have ever taken to whom the spiritual world has been a vivid reality—not a phantom of hope or at best a remote ideal for the future.

Sleep, when regarded solely as a means for needed mental and physical recuperation, is looked upon by many active, enterprising people as only one step removed from actual waste of time; they consequently grudge time to sleep, and as a result bring themselves into a hypernervous condition which soon degenerates into hyperæsthesia or some other perilous form of nervous excitability entirely incompatible with normal health and corresponding mental and moral vigor. Sleep must be assigned its rightful place as a means of spiritual education before we can appreciate anything of the psychic import of the tranquil words, "If he sleep he shall do well." How true that saying is, is well known to every nurse and watcher by the bedside of the sick and suffering; but though in its merely outward sense it is universally admitted, such an admission as is merely called forth by physical experience leaves all higher questions relative to sleep still decidedly in the background.

Insomnia is a disease of the mind and nerves resulting finally in complete nervous prostration and mental overthrow. To induce natural sleep anæsthetics or physical hypnotics are powerless and generally worse than nothing, as their tendency is to debilitate and depress rather than to exhilarate and sustain either the mental or physical organism.

As the word Hypnotism is now very greatly in vogue, and this term is more or less connected in popular esteem with what is technically known as artificial somnambulism, it often becomes necessary to divide hypnosis under two distinct heads and seek thereby to disillusionize that large section of the public which is ever on the outlook for some new form of danger or else some novel mode of charming away disease and suffering by recourse to magic or mystery in one or other of its myriad forms. The popular belief concerning hypnotic or sleep-inducing treatment is very largely erroneous; on scarcely any subject does more general misconception prevail, and that chiefly on account of the difficulty commonly experienced on the part of the multitude to comprehend the part played by the will in the field of psychic experimentation.

The first thought which strikes the average person who hears of hypnotism is that some one has been mysteriously compelled to yield to the mental domination of some one else, and that in a manner often calculated to inspire terror in the breasts of the excitable and timid who usually form a large element in any population.

The second idea connected with hypnotism which strikes that section of the public which is willing to reason out a conclusion is that hypnotism is very likely a good substitute for chloral and other opiates, and if handled cautiously may become a great boon in nervous cases to say the least. The first position mentioned is so largely untenable that we do not think it necessary to discuss it at any length, in this volume at any rate, because it has been so well disposed of by Hudson, Flower, and other able writers whose efforts have been to dispel illusions and place the subject in its true light before the public. The second position referred to bears so closely upon normal sleep and how to induce it that it deserves more than passing notice.

Sleep need never be induced by artificial means if we are in a well-regulated mental and bodily condition, but in times of physical sickness and mental distress the kindly help of an outside person is often necessary when one is in no condition successfully to practise auto-suggestion. Sleep and fatigue are by no means so closely allied as is commonly supposed, therefore we look to see allusions to tiring out the patient by repeated monotonous suggestions give place to a superior terminology. People are not at all unscientific in the use of language when they say they are too tired to sleep, for it is an incontrovertible fact that we need to get rested before we fall asleep, otherwise we are deprived of sleep through restlessness, or if we fall asleep our dreams are apt to be even more fatiguing than prolonged wakefulness.

There are temperaments which require very little sleep comparatively, while others require a great deal; but something of a misapprehension usually comes in when such a statement is unqualified, especially when Napoleon and other noted characters are cited as examples of requiring very little.

Quality rather than quantity of sleep is the more important consideration, and as quality where sleep is concerned refers to depth or profundity of repose we may safely conclude that Napoleon I., and the other extraordinary characters who did whatever they did with great thoroughness, slept actually more in four hours than average people do in eight.

Length of time passed in slumber is largely unimportant, though the Masonic division of time into three equal parts daily is fairly reasonable. It is a safe general rule to recommend eight hours' steady work at one's regular occupation, eight hours' sleep, and eight hours for eating, dressing, and recreation. But however excellent general rules may be, and however well adapted they may prove to a large percentage of the human family, we are sure to find some natures to which they do not prove congenial. A safe attitude to affirm is one that succeeds in steering clear of bigotry on the one hand and indifferentism on the other; one, in a word, which embodies the following widely-accepted maxims:—In things essential, unity; in things doubtful, liberty; in all things, charity. To lay down hard and fast rules for all to follow in any spiritual direction works even less desirably than when that mistaken course is pursued in simply physical directions, consequently the instructions given by Oriental Swamis and Asiatic teachers in America and England can not be followed very particularly by the bulk of any Western population. The Oriental is usually a person of much greater leisure than falls to the lot of the average Occidental, therefore the rules for retiring and resting easily obeyed in Asia are extremely difficult to observe in Europe or America. To rise at 4 A. M., and retire at 8 P. M., is regarded as ideal by some professors of hygiene who desire to have as much sleep before midnight as after.

Were we all farmers living in rural districts we might conform to that regulation quite conveniently and do a good day's work every day and thrive upon it; but seeing that among us are those who are night editors, night clerks, and others who can not possibly observe such a law, it is not wise to hold it up as one of the necessary aids to spiritual development,—a question in which we are all interested regardless of our occupations.

Similar remarks apply equally to stated times for retirement for the purpose of meditation. It is not feasible that all should observe 12 M. or 9 P. M. or any other stated time appointed by certain fraternities or societies, because business and domestic engagements often make such an act impracticable. The theory we uphold is not open to any such objection, because every one sleeps at some time, and our counsel is to take your last waking moments, whenever they occur, as the special time you devote to meditation, for by so doing you strike the right chord which will go on reverberating the whole time you are asleep.

Du Maurier's "Peter Ibbetson" is in some respects a masterly production, immeasurably superior to the somewhat questionable "Trilby," which far exceeded it in popular recognition. In "Peter Ibbetson," the author shows how sleep can be employed for the most perfect telepathic communion between two devoted friends whom a relentless fate had cruelly separated on the eternal plane. For nearly thirty years a man in prison and a woman traveling at will in some of the most beautiful parts of the world were consciously united and even after one had dropped the mortal frame tidings came to the other from beyond the Styx. In such a narrative as that a suggestion is made even to the most casual reader in strict accordance with the noble lines, "Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage."

We can never be quite sure what our exterior circumstances may be; we can not quite guarantee that untoward conditions shall never hold our bodies captive, but we can learn to apply in more senses than one the memorable words, "He is a free man whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves beside." Imagine the bliss of realizing that no matter what our outward fate may be, eight hours out of every twenty-four are entirely our own to do exactly as we please with, go where we like and associate with whom we choose.

Fantastic though such an idea may seem at first to many, the very fascination of its possibility is such that whoever begins, however vaguely, to grasp the thought of its practicality is sure to take some steps to test its certainty.

The Bible is very positive in its delineations of great dreamers and interpreters of dreams. The two Josephs were in every sense great men possessed of unusual force of character, and both Testaments tell us of what use their dreams were to themselves and others. Time and space necessarily vanish when we consider problems of world-wide application. Egypt and Palestine are no more favored climes than England and America. The days of old were no more conducive to spiritual unfoldment than are the passing hours through which we are now traveling. We can be Joseph-like and learn to sleep and dream as did the Joseph of whom we have often read in ancient story. One of the best phases of modern thought is that which annihilates distance and period and confronts us with mental and moral states instead. To be a "just" man, like unto Joseph, is to be ever on the alert for heavenly guidance, especially in times of difficulty and danger, when outward aids are vain and exterior intellect has proved totally inadequate to meet a pressing need. Three times was the gospel Joseph, we are told, specially warned of God in a dream through the agency of an angel. This "angel" may have been his own higher self or an outside ministrant, but in either case the angel was revealed to the superconscious state of the sleeper.

Even in such ordinary affairs as concerts, lectures and other public entertainments, the experience to be gained during sleep is altogether outside the limits of general belief.

Whenever people go to sleep in public places they are apt to be thought inattentive or else extremely tired, whereas, in many instances known to the writer, highly sensitive people (but in excellent health) have gone sound asleep at the very point of their greatest interest in what was going on, and during sleep have dreamed out grander music and heard far more instructive discourses and far profounder than any which were being given at the time to the outward ears of the waking audience.

We, of course, do not mean to imply that all we have to do is to go to sleep during the progress of public exercises in order to get interior enlightenment; such a conclusion would be erroneous in the extreme, for unless you are in a receptive condition you receive no ennobling influx, nor do you see any glorious visions or hear any wise discourse because you are oblivious to the outer world around you. We must centre our thoughts on a special subject in a particularly definite way before we are in a state to receive special illumination; therefore, intense interest in the theme being discussed or in the music performed is clearly a desideratum.

On one occasion the writer had agreed to report a very important sermon delivered by a celebrated preacher on a topic of great interest to the entire community, and attended the church with notebook and pencil prepared to take copious notes in the exact words of the speaker or as nearly that as possible. What was the writer's surprise may well be imagined, when sleep instantly overtook him after he had taken down the text, and the sermon had just ended when he awoke feeling extremely mortified and considerably embarrassed. The sequel, however, was most satisfactory, for the substance of the entire discourse soon welled up from the depths of inner consciousness, and the epitome furnished to the newspapers was pronounced by many, who had kept wide awake during its delivery, an unusually good abstract of the discourse.

The sub-self or suggestive mind, as some people call our inner self, acts like a phonograph and treasures up by means of psychic cylinders whatever impressions are made upon us when we are peacefully asleep. Like all other faculties, the faculty of dreaming true, as Du Maurier has styled it, needs cultivation in most people, though in many children and also in adults who are of sedate temperament and live much alone, it asserts itself largely without any special invitation.

The reason why the ancient Orient has bequeathed to us so rich a legacy of narratives of portentous dreams while the West during recent centuries has been rather barren of such histories, is because the mode of life of the Eastern races is quieter than that of Western peoples, and in olden times the stress of material existence was not usually so great as it is to-day. Could the records of mediæval monasteries be revealed we should find therein a mass of evidence in favor of psychical experiences beside which the records of modern Psychical Research Societies would pale into utter insignificance; and even were we to go no further afield than the Scotch Highlands we could easily collect an enormous amount of well authenticated testimony of the undoubted reality of such visions as the one which furnishes the theme for the popular Scotch song, "The Campbells are Coming," and many others in similar strain.

The Scotch Covenanters and many other austere companies of people, not excepting the Puritans and Pilgrims of New England, have borne witness to the reality of "special teachings" during sleep, and though their harsher types of theology are giving way to milder and sweeter religious views to-day, their arguments in favor of their interior experiences are far too strong to be refuted. The higher word vision, which after all is only sight, goes beyond in its significance the more ordinary term Dreams, though in teachers' Bibles and in many commentaries on the Bible text the two words are employed as very nearly synonymous.

There are three clearly separable kinds of dreams: First, the commonplace dream which is never definite, and when at its worst becomes nightmare. Secondly, the dream to which we instinctively attach some significance because it leaves a decided impression upon us after waking. Thirdly, the prophetic dream, which borders very closely on the seer's vision. The commonplace dream is simply the result of ordinary thinking; therefore, what we feel ourselves to be going through with during sleep differs in no sense widely from the pursuits of mind and body in which we are commonly engaged during the day. Distressing dreams would never afflict us were we to keep ourselves free from confusion and worry while awake, but as it seems too much to expect just yet that people should abstain entirely from worry—so deep has the worrying habit become ingrained—it is surely not unreasonable to propose the following simple exercise just before retiring (or just after) as a preventive of any disagreeable dreams which might otherwise encumber sleep.

If you have been annoyed or worried over anything during the day and find it difficult to perform an evictive mental act, you have always the good counsel to fall back upon—concentrate your whole attention upon some pleasing, helpful suggestion made to you either by reading, contemplating a beautiful object, uplifting conversation with a congenial friend, or simply by direct inward determination to rivet mental gaze upon a solitary selected ideal. If you are sufficiently at home in the abstract, you need have no concrete symbol in your thought; for in that case such a word as hope, faith, peace, success, or any other you may elect will suffice. If, however, you can not realize the abstract and feel the need of something concrete, you can employ subjectively whatever it would be useful to introduce objectively. Here comes in the good of a high degree of development of the visualizing faculty, the successful visualizer being one who can at any time summon at will just that sort of image he would like to have externally within his range of vision.

We can not always be in beautiful places or surrounded with objects exactly suited to our tastes, therefore if we are not adepts or experts at mental picturing, we are often sadly disturbed by surrounding inelegancies and incongruities, and when we go to sleep dwelling upon sordid or distasteful circumstances, we are extremely apt to dream of whatever they naturally lead up to. Fix your mental eye on some object which gives you pleasure, especially on one which affords instruction and embodies a high ideal. Let this be your last thought at night; fall asleep thinking of it and your dreams will soon cease to be unpleasant. As food and creature comforts generally have something to do with mental states as well as with physical conditions, do not go to bed hungry, but if you feel the need of something to eat, take any light refreshment which is most palatable and which experience has proved to be in every way agreeable. The temperature of the sleeping room, the coverlets of the couch, and all other accessories of a night's repose should be attended to with reasonable forethought; but as so much is always being written on this, the purely external side of hygienic science, we feel called upon to devote a preponderance of thought to those internal exercises which far outweigh in importance and influence all superficial aspects of sanitary law.

The Bible informs us that the prophets were usually called of God during sleep, and we can well understand what the ancient writers must have meant to convey by this expression when we take careful note of our own highest experiences. The day is usually occupied with exacting duties, the fulfillment of which keeps the attention fixed on things without. Night brings respite from these engagements and thus allows freedom to the spirit to answer to a celestial call.

It must be remembered that the term "Angel of the Lord" is an elastic one and legitimately covers a great deal of territory. Angel only signifies messenger, thus any one or anything employed in ministration may be included in the collective noun angels. Whatever or whoever may have been the speaker and the voice which the Samuel type of child heard in the silence of the night, it is clearly something which is capable of endowing him with more than ordinary knowledge and enabling him to predict coming events with accuracy.

At this point in our discussion of dreams and visions we are surely confronted with one of the most perplexing of problems to the general mind. Foreordination seems clearly revealed in foresight, for it is argued that unless our future is mapped out for us it can not be foreseen; therefore if prevision be possible, predestination must be regarded as a truth. Such at first sight seems unanswerable, but on closer examination we find a weak point in the chain of reasoning, and especially do we discover a false note in the prevailing idea of what foreordination means. In the realm of vision to which we may be intromitted during sleep, we may discern the operation of causes already set in motion which are working toward inevitable effects which, though certain, can not possibly be discerned in the outward region of effects which they have not yet visited.

The seer (one who sees into things, through them, and below their surface) is one who has more opportunity by far for calculating coming events on the mundane plane than the best reasoner could possibly enjoy were he confined to the realm of material observation. Suppose you are traveling through the fields and by means of clairvoyance you are capable of beholding buried grain so that you can actually see the sprouting wheat, barley, oats or corn beneath the surface of the soil: you are certainly in position to declare that certain varieties of harvest will make their appearance on plots of ground which you can indicate. In like manner if you are able to pierce the veil of outer sense and see what has already taken place in the subjective or causative world, you can play the part of prophet quite successfully without importing into your work any miraculous or alleged supernatural claim. Even the word supernormal is unnecessary, for we are presumptuous in the extreme when we dare to affix limits to the normal and pronounce definitely upon what lies beyond its realm. Coming events cast their shadows on a lower or outer plane of action when they are actually traveling toward ultimation from a more interior plane where they have previously occurred; thus "coming" is not a misnomer.

Another highly important reflection is that though events like weather may often be predicted months or even years ahead there is no justification whatever for absolute fatalism on this account. The old Buddhistic proverb is a very wise one where it says: "Rain soaks through an ill-thatched roof, but through a well-thatched roof it can not penetrate." We may well decide that in a very real sense "whatever is to be, will be;" but the important question for us is—Are we prepared to meet what needs must come in such a spirit that its advent to us shall prove a blessing? Opportunities present themselves, but we must take advantage of them for it is ours to fulfill them, and if we fulfill them not we have lost them. Talents are bestowed as trusts, but upon our use, nonuse, or misuse of them depends our promotion to honor, or our discomfiture whenever a time of reckoning arrives. Days of judgment are perennial; we can not say that any special period for judgment is appointed. "The day and the hour knoweth no man," but results are sure; and as all depends for us upon the nature of the seed we are continually sowing and the use we are making of our opportunities, it is worse than useless to talk of "unlucky stars," "adverse fate," or aught else that shifts responsibility for conduct from our own shoulders where it rightfully belongs, by placing it in our imagination entirely beyond our own control and completely outside the range of our conscious vision.

A charming, pathetic little story appeared in Godey's Magazine for May, 1898, titled "His Life's Failure," by Frederick H. Dewey, in which the probable judgment of heaven upon many human lives is beautifully portrayed. The man, who had seemingly failed, had in reality succeeded, because he had lived the best life possible in the circumstances in which he had been placed. The author of that brief touching romance may not have presented in that particular story all the elements necessary to spiritual success, but at least one of them is graphically portrayed.

The belief that greatness can only be achieved along certain narrow or conspicuous lines is a fatal error because it cripples many a life which would otherwise be far brighter and more useful than it has yet proved to be, because it would be far more hopeful, and without hope it is impossible to make real progress. Horoscopes and other astrological inventions can be used or abused, and the same may be said of character-reading by head, face, or hand, as the case may be. There are certain things undoubtedly in store for us just as there were seven years of plenty and seven years of dearth ahead of Egypt in the time of the Joseph of the book of Genesis. Joseph no more than Pharaoh could prevent the seasons being as they were going to be, but the lower type of mind (Pharaoh's) could only dimly and allegorically foresee that future as presented to him in nightly vision, while the superior penetrativeness of the Joseph type could and did successfully read the astral hieroglyphic.

Daniel alone could interpret the writing at Belshazzar's feast which all the guests could see, and so it ever goes. Signs and omens are all about us and they are intended for our service, but the true oracles are only in the keeping of those who can correctly decipher the caligraphy of Nature. To be forewarned is to be forearmed. To know that storms are coming suggests to the men in charge of stations to hoist signals and prevents many a captain from making rash plunges into a tempestuous ocean with

Our best wisdom often consists in lying low; there are times for silence, as well as for speech; and for retirement as well as for public action. The wise are they who read and interpret signs aright, neither discarding the aid of prophecy nor so perverting belief in seership as to build up a system of blind fatalism, than which there can be nothing more disheartening or depressing. Practically everything depends upon being ready to meet a crisis when it comes; if we are prepared for emergencies our experiences are not terrible, though many around us prove utterly discomfited.

Fires break out, storms arise, earthquakes shake the ground; but to those who are fortified against calamities, what others call calamities are not such to them. Further is it true that boiler explosions, railway and steamboat collisions and many other so-called accidents are often entirely preventable. They are not foreordained, but only liable to occur; and were it not that warnings could be utilized they could not be given, for a bald prediction would not possess anything in the nature of a warning which must of necessity be precautionary.

As we grow less and less anxious about material affairs, we shall become increasingly sagacious, even in the conduct of secular business, because insight goes with foresight; the ability to look below the surface of people as well as of things must prove of incalculable benefit in all commercial as well as other undertakings.

The intuitive faculty may or may not assert itself in a prescribed manner, but whoever quietly and diligently sets to work to allow this inherent faculty to develop (and it needs no forcing) will soon come to find that what has long been regarded as the exceptional endowment of a few is the real possession of the many.

V.

MENTAL SUGGESTION—THE HUMAN AURA—HOW WE MAY ATTRACT THE HIGHEST INFLUENCES FROM BOTH THE SEEN AND UNSEEN SIDES OF LIFE.

The title which heads this chapter is a somewhat formidable one, dealing as it does with some of the most perplexing and intricate phases of what is commonly known to-day as "psychic experience." In the four preceding essays in this volume we hope we have done something in the way of clearing the road for a definite statement of what is meant by Suggestion. As we define the nature of suggestion, it is in no way to be identified in thought with coercion, command, control, or any other word which stands for an idea incompatible with the fullest individual liberty or personal freedom, which is never to be confounded with lawlessness or license, both those terms involving disregard of the common requirements of the social order. There are practically no limits to the exercise of beneficial suggestion, though the area in which adverse suggestions can be made to operate is distinctly limited. It becomes necessary at this point again to refer to what we understand to be the natural quality of human nature regardless of its plane of development, so as to present an intelligible base on which to erect the structural edifice of Suggestive Treatment. Our most earnest contention and most serious proposition is that we are all open to good suggestions, while only some of us are open to such as are of inimical varieties; this ground is taken safely as a necessary correlative of our perception of what Nature is in general and human nature in particular. Certain desires and tendencies are common to all living beings, and these all of us certainly share, but none of these are evil; on the contrary, each is good, but only in its rightful place and time. Extreme individualism is far less civilized or advanced than intelligent mutualism, but the rankest individualist professes no shade of ill-will to another; he only claims good for himself. Perversions of self-preservative and kindred instincts must never be confounded with the instincts themselves; the instincts are good, though the perversions are evil. There are no evil instincts per se, but we often encounter perverted instincts; these, by means of practically applied suggestive treatment, are all vincible.

We do not say that no disorder exists because we pronounce no disease or discord incurable. It is not the honest detection of error and our protest against its continuance that interferes with our success as moral reformers and mental healers, but only our frequent pessimistic attitude toward a victim of error which disqualifies us from helping a captive to release himself from unseen fetters.

Now that Suggestive Therapeutics is a popular phrase in medical circles, and Bernheim's valuable treatise bearing that caption is being carefully studied in America as well as in Europe, the time is certainly ripe for a sober common-sense discussion of the theme in which the "laity," as well as professional physicians, surgeons and dentists, have a sovereign right to take part. Sidney Flower, editor of the Journal of Medical Hypnotism, issued in Chicago, has taken decided exception to the narrow cliqueism of a fraction of the medical fraternity, as he very wisely urges that not only doctors and professional nurses, but all parents and teachers should have some thorough knowledge of suggestive methods,—not chiefly, perhaps, for vanquishing bodily ailments, but certainly to aid them in the highly necessary work of training the rising generation to live worthy of any high vocations to which they may be called. A right knowledge and practice of suggestion in the nursery and in the schoolroom will go very far indeed toward banishing every vestige of barbarity which has so long hung like a nightmare over educational efforts, all of which have been greatly impaired by lack of knowing how to make learning a delight and the schoolroom and playground merely two harmonious dimensions of an educational centre. It is interesting and always profitable to observe how incessantly we express different ideas in closely similar language; that we do so proves that we have by no means lost lingual traces of a time when no such arbitrary distinctions between work and play were imagined as are now far too common. Playing upon musical instruments includes performing in a manner which calls into expression the fullest knowledge of technique, and embraces what in other words might be called extremely hard work. The harmonious play of our varied faculties, and many similar expressions, such as bringing latent forces or capabilities into play, shows that the original idea of play was inseparable from that of work, and vice versa. We need now to restore the original connection and identify the thought of doing good work with the fullest and freest enjoyment of all that pertains to our normal existence. Suggestion in the infant schoolroom, nursery, or kindergarten must commence with the root idea of pleasantry and easy stimulating to action of a dormant, though really present and ready-to-become-active, power. A phrenological bust or chart is often very helpful because it embodies abstract ideas in concrete imagery so that every one can see what is meant by giving a mental treatment in a scientific manner. At the present moment certain faculties, or commodities of the brain as they are sometimes called, are very active in some persons but very inactive in others. The most effective suggestion can always be made by one in whom a certain quality is strongly in evidence to one in whom that quality is as yet only in a state of dormancy. It is, of course, much easier in a large percentage of cases successfully to suggest to another person than it is to help yourself; and that for the following among other easily comprehended reasons. Primarily, when you are in need of some special helpful suggestion, you are usually in a state of mental or moral darkness or depression, even when not suffering from any conscious physical disability. To treat yourself when you are in the deep shadows is no easy task, and you are really in no condition to do it. Your extremity is another's opportunity, just as at some future time another's need will constitute your similar opportunity. We must stand ever ready to help and to be helped, and as it is no disgrace to render aid, it is no disgrace to receive assistance. This is a portion of the general subject which needs strong ethical treatment, because too many people are to be found who enjoy the dignified, self-important feeling which comes with rendering help to others, but are too proud to place themselves as they should on a footing of equality with others by taking as a life motto (than which none better can be selected), "I'll help you and you'll help me." It is exactly this sense of mutuality of which we stand sorely in need at present everywhere. Beggar and lord as pictured in the old song, "London Bridge," are still amongst us in feeling as well as in outward expression, and no matter how many ulterior steps may be taken to relieve actual poverty, so long as a domineering spirit prevails on the one hand and a beggarly servile temper on the other, would-be reformers will inveigh in vain against the piteous inequalities which to-day prevail, many of which are easily remedied and quite unnecessary.

Suggestions are often made quite unconsciously, and just as unconsciously are they taken up and acted upon.

The scientific investigation of the psychic realm now being undertaken is very praiseworthy and is productive of real good in many a community; but, useful though such investigation be, it must not for a moment be imagined, though suggestions can be given and taken at will and also rejected at pleasure, that the entire ground or even the major portion of territory covered by suggestion is traversed when we allude exclusively to that noble philosophic aspect of suggestive action which happily promises to inaugurate a new era in education and medicine alike.

Suggestions are made very powerfully upon little children and unborn babes quite without the knowledge or desire of either the one making or the one receiving the suggestion. So much is this the case that the whole story of heredity can be written from this standpoint and truthfully from no other. The Greek mothers, yea, and fathers also, in the palmiest days of Greek supremacy, knew much of this, and turned their knowledge to excellent account by treating the wives of their race with almost divine honors, as well as with tender affection and unfaltering esteem. The real ego, the essential entity or primal soul (sol), is not affected from the standpoint of what it truly is by heredity or any other environment; but, though this essentially divine centre of universal consciousness can not be intrinsically impaired or altered, it would be contrary to all human experience to deny that the mind (mens)—from which we derive such words as mental and mentality—is influenced both by antenatal and postnatal impressions made upon it.

The primal nature, the pure, changeless, incorruptible essence of life, is untarnishable, but the intellectual and physical media through which entities are expressed are built up by suggestion from the moment of conception onward. The babe in the womb is more susceptible than even the infant at the breast; then on through all stages of adolescence susceptibility lessens on the involuntary side, till, with the approach of what we call maturity, voluntary susceptibility begins commandingly to assert itself. The strong-willed young man or woman scorns and repulses the thought of being compelled to do anything, no matter how good the thing proposed in itself may be; but exactly in proportion as compulsory obedience ends, voluntary submission asserts itself with matchless power. It is the budding maturity, the incipient manhood or womanhood in your children, which makes them what you call so headstrong and rebellious. Great is the error of supposing that what is called self-will or wilfulness is wrong, and ought to be mastered. Never should we attempt to repress or suppress

it. It needs training or directing, but never ought we to make war upon it or regard it as other than a necessary, indeed a highly important, element in our economy.

The right sort of suggestion is always an appeal to will, never from it. Will is that which gives us strength of character and the disposition to be, as Longfellow puts it, not "dumb driven cattle," but "heroes in the strife." What this strife is may be a little problematical, and as the word suggests battle and seems to justify the crude idea of a "sinful" nature to be overcome, we prefer to give it a purely alchemical or Rosicrucian interpretation. The lower must die; the lamb must be slain; we must celebrate our own passover and accomplish our exodus or journey out of a lower into a higher state of conscious life. As we are making the transit we find ourselves in a perplexed, unsettled condition because we are ignorant as yet of the true worth and meaning of the material at our disposal. The most awkward and uncomfortable periods in our career are those which we may well call "moving-times." We sit down in the lowest place at the banquet of life, and then we are called in due season to "come up higher." Though the call is to promotion, we are confronted with doubt and mystery; the untrodden future we shrink from, even though assured that it is an advance upon its past. At such times or in such crises we need the help of those who have taken the step which we are about to take; a good midwife is required to cut the umbilical cord which binds us to the past and set us free to live a freer life than was aforetime possible.

All natural, orderly external processes correspond precisely to some interior state; therefore, the intelligent mental scientist is also a physical scientist, one who can appreciate both sides—the inside and outside—of a complex experience. There can be no legal divorce between the seen and the unseen, for the two are only different sides of the same thing.

All situations can be viewed psychically or inwardly, also physically or outwardly, and it needs to be taught that what is good on the one side is never bad on the other, and vice versa. Negative suggestions are often harmful even when well-intentioned, because they offend and confuse in places where affirmative statements to the same intentional effect would be kindly received and help to unravel a tangled and perplexing skein of trying experiences.

Suggestions to be truly valuable must be, not only affirmative in general, but also in specific character, though even the most general statements on the right side of things are by no means to be despised. Suggestions are of several varieties, among which silent and oral suggestions play an almost equally important part. Sometimes the one and sometimes the other sort will prove the more effective. For instance, should you desire to help a friend at a distance who can not enjoy a personal interview with you, if you can but annihilate the sense of distance in your consciousness you can just as readily communicate with a person, telepathically, a thousand or more miles away, as with one who stands physically at your elbow. If, however, you can not get rid of the feeling of remoteness, you are probably not able to effect the needed thought-transfer. Some persons will receive suggestions from you immediately, even though they are total strangers to you, while others whom you number among your oldest and best friends may prove totally non-receptive.

There are several reasons for this seeming discrepancy, among which the following are frequent. According to the idea of Emerson—as stated in his essay on Circles—and of many other gifted seers, there are persons who belong to us and to whom we belong in a specially close degree or far more intimate manner than that in which we all belong to one another in the Grand Circle of Humanity. As in Ezekiel's vision wheels are found within wheels, so are there families within families and states within states. One brother or sister certainly is nearer to you than another, and that on account of some subtle spiritual relationship, often difficult to define. As these relationships exist and prove themselves far beyond the limit of family connections, it often is discovered that two persons utterly unknown to each other except spiritually will succeed in communicating mentally in the most convincing manner, while the nearest of blood relations will be unable thus mentally to correspond.

Suggestions made to you by any one of these, your spiritual relatives, are apt to be very acceptable, because of the genial accompaniment you distinctly feel, even though you may be unable to define it or explain it. Another (and less remote from the ordinary) explanation of success in one case and not in the other in the suggestive field is that some people are magnetically agreeable to each other; again, in other instances, intellectually companionable in consequence of something distinctive in their personal condition or cast of thought. As we grow in the faculty of discrimination we outgrow all harsh repulsions; we never feel unkindly to people; therefore, in a very true sense we are repelled by none; but, though ill feeling becomes extinct, good feeling becomes more clearly defined, and we learn to find and keep our proper places in society instead of blindly dropping in anywhere, and vainly imagining because we can all do something useful there is no need of symmetry.

Symmetry is that delightful blending, that veritably divine concord of excellencies which robs a noble life of all semblance to monotony and affords perfect scope for the fullest possible expression of every faculty with which we are severally and collectively endowed. So mysterious to many people appears the question of human aura, so mixed up has the subject been with the most fantastic varieties of occultism, that it needs much skill on the part of one who writes for the public at large to deal intelligently with this somewhat obscure mystery. We can not hope in brief space to do more than point toward an explanation of this mysterious reality, but if we approach its consideration entirely free from prejudice or preconception, we shall find much of the mystery quickly vanish as we employ well-known words in which to elucidate this problem. Effluvium, exhalation, and emanation are common words; nimbus and aureola are familiar to all art students and many others. The above five words—all of which are in general use—will suffice to introduce the reader into the very heart of the topic of our respective auras: what these auric emanations are, and how we can and do vary them, sometimes for better, sometimes for worse, often quite unconsciously, but occasionally as a direct act of our volition.

The fragrance of a flower suggests the actual giving forth from a plant which has produced the flower of something inseparable from its peculiar nature; consequently one variety of vegetable can not possibly give forth the aroma peculiar to another. So powerful are the mental or psychic as well as physical effects produced by different varieties of plant life, that the use of herbs has always been extensive among those who have sought by outward means to induce clairvoyance, ecstasy, or some other phase of psychical activity.

The animal possesses a much more powerful aura than any plant, and so strongly do many people feel the influence of animal emanations—and so diversely are different people affected by them—that the presence of a large, powerful animal of any species may be delightfully agreeable to one person and most distressing to some one else within the radius of its exhalations.

When Oriental teachers tell us that the Adepts of the East can with impunity invade the jungle and suffer no harm, even though they make the close acquaintance of lions, tigers, and other ferocious animals, they are not romancing, because if there be just such people living on earth as they call Adepts, these singularly developed men and women can certainly dominate all animal propensities external to themselves, seeing that they have first completely mastered the entire animal kingdom or economy within themselves. It is equally true that such highly developed men and women must be wonderful healers of the sick and reformers of the vicious, because from them must go forth a healing and elevating elixir—the natural and inevitable outcome of their interior condition.

Many of the finest painters have been clairvoyant to such an extent that they have seen the nimbus or glory with which they have encircled the head of a saint and which they have placed around the entire person of one whom they intend should represent a perfected humanity. The most curious mistake made by Angelo in his painting of Moses was the introduction of horns, which are grotesque, upon the forehead of the glorious leader of the host of Israel through the wilderness. This extraordinary and thoroughly inartistic disfigurement of an otherwise noble painting proves how strangely misled must these translators of the Pentateuch have been, from whose mistranslation Angelo drew material for a picture of Moses, who is said to have been in so radiant a condition after receiving the Law on Sinai that the people begged him to veil his countenance when he addressed them, because they could not bear the dazzling light proceeding from it.

This ancient story is one that closely concerns the human aura, which becomes so intensely luminous, owing to states of great interior elevation, that some glimpses are caught of the literal meaning of the account of the transfiguration of Jesus when it is said that on Mount Tabor the whole person of the Master became so illumined that his three nearest disciples, Peter, James and John, fell, with their faces to the earth, unable to endure the brightness of his glorified presence.

The spiritual body, which is the real organic structure to which the physical shape simply corresponds, becomes so luminous when the divine soul fully possesses it that this true form, after which the physique is patterned, so transfigures its inferior facsimile as to render that for the nonce too bright for ordinary vision to endure. These transcendental stories of the great and pure minds which have specially illumined the world by their work and influence are no idle dreams of rhapsodic poets, but actual histories and still more glowing prophecies.

Our aura it is that protects us against the inroads of disease by rendering whoever generates it in abundant measure and of high quality super-susceptible to all forms of germs or bacilli which can find entrance into unprotected bodies, but are effectually excluded from well-defended temples. How easy it is to illustrate the profoundest scientific verities by simple allusions to everyday occurrences on the most external planes of action, if we do but resolutely set to work to trace the obvious correspondence between the seen and unseen or the inner and outer aspects of existence! Negative, unprotected persons who have simply failed to develop any powerful or characteristic auric belt around them, are in a chronic condition resembling that of unscreened windows in summer time, through which all kinds of insects can enter the house.

When you suggest to a housekeeper to employ wire blinds or mosquito netting, you are not telling her that there is something in her dwelling which attracts flies, gnats, or other insects; you merely advise her to put up a barrier over which they can not pass. The above commonplace illustration has proved helpful to hundreds of students who have been all "at sea" and grievously perplexed by trying to find what special sinful or erroneous thoughts they have been encouraging to invite the distressing disorders which afflict them.

Rays of practical comfort and help shine on their darkened pathway immediately you make to them, in all kindness, the helpful and not unpleasant or fault-finding suggestion that, though they may not have been doing any particular things which they ought not to have done, they have been ignorantly omitting to do some simple necessary things which they ought to have done and can begin to do directly.

So much for that branch of the inquiry, from which we now turn to the positive effects of encouraging right or righteous thoughts, all of which have a drawing power peculiarly their own. There are three things we need to remember: First, all thoughts attract their own kind, and in proportion to the intensity of a thought is its attractive force. Second, it is impossible to think of nothing; therefore, it is indispensable to our highest welfare to cultivate that excellent state of mind recommended by the apostle Paul and strongly insisted upon by Gladstone when addressing young men who applied to him for counsel, "Whatsoever things are excellent, think on these things." Third, the unseen universe incloses the visible, for it is a case of the larger including the smaller; consequently we need not concern ourselves about the how, though the why of our attracting certain definite sorts of influence is a matter of paramount importance.

When the three foregoing propositions are mastered to something like an adequate degree, the mystery of "mediumship" and much else that is to-day cloudy will have grown transparent. Always let us suggest the highest to ourselves and others, and the results can not be other than progressively beneficial in every case in which suggestion is employed in any appropriate manner to the case in hand.

VI.

THE ATTRACTIVE POWER OF THOUGHT—HOW WE MAY USE IT MOST EFFECTIVELY—THE INFLUENCE OF THE MIND IN MOULDING THE EVERYDAY CONDITIONS OF LIFE.

There are two texts or mottoes which suggest themselves immediately upon writing the headlines for this meditation. The first of them is the beautiful Biblical words, "As he thinketh in his heart so is he." The other is the fine sentence from Shakespeare, "There's nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so." The Bible words are the plainest, the most readily understood, because they carry us at once into the very heart of the subject, and we all know that by heart is not simply meant one of the most vital organs of the body, but the centre of all our affections, which are the roots whence proceed all expressions in speech and conduct.

What do we mean by mind? In the highest of all senses in which this great word is employed we are led to exclaim: There is but one Mind, the Infinite; but in all lesser and commonly-accepted uses of the term we must agree with the proverbialist who says, "Many men, many minds." In the latter, which is the lower, rather than in the former, which is the transcendent meaning of the word, we will now discuss the operations of mind considered as a magnet possessing power to draw unto itself whatever is in affinity with its condition.

The quotation from Shakespeare, like many another profound statement, is easily liable to misinterpretation; so much so that it would be by no means difficult to fabricate upon its letter, used as a foundation, a system of immoral teaching diametrically opposed to Shakespearian and all other reasonable systems of ethics. It is quite within the province of the unthinking to declare that such a sentence as the one quoted denies that there is any real distinction between vice and virtue; for, according to the theory apparently set forth in the quotation, things or forms of conduct are only good or bad provided we choose so to regard them. Such a doctrine is, of course, pernicious and mischievous in the extreme, and we do not believe that it is seriously entertained, or ever can be honestly held by any sane or sober thinker. A very much higher meaning suggests itself to the student of this seemingly enigmatical passage, "There's nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so," viz., that whatever is good (harmonious) or bad (discordant) in the realm of things is clearly a result of the rightful or wrongful thought of the fashioner or manufacturer of the thing made. We are makers of things, though we are not creators of primal elements. All the elements are good whether we reckon only the four or five acknowledged by the ancients, or the nearly seventy known to the modern chemist. As oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, and nitrogen enter into all living organisms, and we can detect the presence of these four and of some other elements in every living organism—though in differing proportions in differing instances—we take it for granted that the elements themselves are altogether good, and, on the basis of this assumption (if such it be), we proceed to explain logically and rationally the presence of temporary discord or evil during the chaotic stages of a planet's growth while surely wending its way to ultimate cosmic harmony.

When we speak of the contrasting terms, health and sickness, we find them equivalent to order and disorder. Happiness is orderly, while unhappiness is both cause and result of disorder. The relation between causes and their effects necessitates the phenomena of existence as we behold it, and though all causes are primarily mental, or at least pertaining to the unseen side of nature, there is so much of reflection or reflex action (literally, flowing back) in all that we perceive sensuously, that it is next to impossible clearly to determine at all times exactly where original cause melts into effect, and where effect, acting as secondary cause, produces in its turn similar consequences inevitably true to its own nature. Our thinking has no power, it is true, to add to or take from the number or vary the nature of the primal elements, be they few or many; but, though we confront the inflexible, and face the inevitable, directly we come to deal with originals or primates, these are all under our control to manipulate, arrange, combine and classify exactly as we please directly we have grown wise enough to understand and apply the law whereby they will serve us at our pleasure. Let no one fear that the thought of God or divine omnipotence and sovereignty can ever be affected by a rational comprehension and intelligent application of the rules of exact science, no matter whether you call your aspect of science spiritual or physical. Science is only knowledge; knowledge systematized and applied in use is scientific knowledge—a common but somewhat tautological expression.

God reigns in changeless order, in immutable law; and no professed atheist even professes to believe that the order of the universe can ever be made to vary by the decree of man. We are living in curious times. Modern thought is singularly inconsistent, and it can not be otherwise so long as we continue in a period of transition, which is always more or less (in seeming at least) an interregnum. In these remarkable days of ever-multiplying inventions we are learning daily more and more through practical experience of the power of human genius to compel the forces and elements of Nature to obey the human will, and this knowledge is sometimes apt at first to puff us up with foolish self-conceit and cause us to imagine that we can safely indulge in lawlessness, because, forsooth, there is no law outside our own capricious will. The presence of this tendency toward irrational license is to-day's special menace; it is the danger par excellence against which we need to be especially on guard, but so utterly unscientific is this dangerous mental attitude that we need entertain no shade of fear on the score of its eventual triumph; for science counsels obedience to law and submission to order at every turn. The question, however, will not be dismissed. What is law and what is its sanction? If, by law, is meant some king-made or priest-made statute, some petty ecclesiastical or civil mandate originating in tyranny, and therefore essentially hostile to human freedom, we are ready for anarchy; on the other hand, if by the law that we must obey is signified nothing less than the eternal order of the universe revealed in the changeless constitution of nature, wisdom in the persons of all her children counsels us to acquaint ourselves with God and become at peace. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," is an old proverb, the sound of which grates unpleasantly to-day on some "emancipated" ears; and there are those who even dare to pronounce the fear of God the commencement of folly. Such quibblers quibble over a translation rather than over a root idea; their criticism is by no means profound, for when another rendering of the same passage is given, viz.: "Respect for righteousness is the beginning of wisdom," all who wish to be moral among them cease to demur.

Fear is an ugly word in one of the conventional senses in which it is most commonly employed; therefore, we are told by experience as well as by precept that it is tormenting, and perfect love coming in casts it out forever.

Reverence for order is the first great step toward the scientific life; and the truly scientific life melts into the spiritual or regenerate, which is the deeper and higher life, by an easy method of transition.

We study chemistry and acquaint ourselves with chemical formulæ; we address ourselves to electrical studies and experiment with that most volatile and subtle of all ascertained agents in the objective universe, and we grow into a deeply reverent and intelligent appreciation of the sovereignty of order. Divine purpose or method stands plainly revealed to all who are willing to see—disclosed beyond peradventure in the supremacy of a law which all may discover and obey but none can break no matter how hard they try, and which none can resist with impunity.

This fixed order is the stone rejected by foolish builders whose carefully reared structures quickly crumble into dust, but accepted by all wise artificers who plan their edifices in strict accordance with the ascertained law of construction by which the universe is built.

The Law of Attraction is no substitute for the idea of God, but is, when rightly viewed, neither more nor less than an intelligent acknowledgment of the working of immutable sequence. The time has come for a much demanded solution of theologic phrases in scientific terms, and among the most needed interpretations is a reasonable explanation of that nightmare of theology, the dogma of endless punishment as the necessary corollary of equally endless reward. Universalists and other religionists of a liberal school have had much difficulty in popular esteem in their endeavor to explain how happiness can be everlasting and misery less than everlasting when the same Greek adjective, aionion, is applied to both. Of course, you can translate aionion as agelong or long-enduring, instead of eternal or everlasting, without doing violence to etymology, but such a translation only shifts, it does not obviate the difficulty. The scientific solution is thoroughly consistent and in no way destroys the "larger hope" or denies the ultimate salvation of every human being, though it refuses to beg the question at any point or to make eternal issues hang on the translation of an adjective.

Consequence is changeless. In that sentence we have the nexus—the meeting-place between Oriental and Occidental philosophy. The Buddhist doctrine of Karma and the Christian doctrine of forgiveness meet here and find that they are by no means irreconcilable or hard to reconcile. The same cause invariably produces the same effect, says the Buddhist. "If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all iniquity," quotes the Christian. How can both the foregoing statements be true? The law of attraction, when clearly comprehended as to its universal workings, supplies the answer. The relation between cause and effect is irrefragable; there can be no divorce between mental acts and the results thereof. But it does not follow from the foregoing that any one will perpetually persist in error and therefore everlastingly continue to reap its fruitage. Our past is in one sense irrevocable, but in no other sense than that it is of course impossible to bring back past time. To say that we can not undo past work or make reparation for the faults or mistakes of the past is absurdly contrary to all experience; for such a statement would be equivalent to saying that we can not pick out false stitches in our needlework or erase blots in our copy-books. It is well indeed to declare that he who sins must suffer, but the suffering is an effect of the sin beneficently intended to erase the error—not perpetually to punish the one who has done foolishly. When St. George Mivart stirred up a great deal of controversy by teaching the somewhat unusual, though by no means entirely novel, doctrine that souls could be happy in hell, he laid himself open to attack from many quarters, for though the thought of happiness in hell is not so dreadful as the belief in endless misery, it is clearly a misconception which must be swept away by the rising tide of intelligence. The connection between cause and consequence, no matter how dark it may appear, is purely beneficent; and those ill-informed "agnostics," who persist in declaring that there is evil in the very constitution of the universe which can never be eliminated, are simply indorsers of the errors of a mistaken theology unlighted with any rays of hope and comfort (for at least a portion of mankind) that every system of religion (even the darkest) assuredly supplies.

There seems an invincible ignorance in many quarters concerning the nature of being, as distinct from existence; and we verily believe if this one egregious blunder can be removed, daylight will break where now Cimmerian darkness reigns. It seems as though every child might early begin to learn this vital distinction; for it is a distinction we need to make in every cooking-school, as well as in every chemical laboratory, and, indeed, there is no kind of trade to which any boy or girl may be apprenticed where this lesson does not have to be learned very early in the apprentice's career. In medical circles the term disorder applied universally to diseases of all varieties furnishes the key to the entire situation; for what does disorder mean but confusion or derangement, applying as it does not to the intrinsic character of any element, but only to the present inharmonious combination of elements, occasioning distress as an inevitable consequence. So long as we think erroneously or disobediently we are sure to take the consequences of such inharmonious thinking quite regardless of the place where we may be residing. Though it is not necessary to deny locality to spiritual spheres in one sense, it is highly important to press home the thought continually that happiness and unhappiness are never primarily due to locality, though it is not unreasonable to urge that in congenial surroundings with friendly associates we stand a better chance of enjoying life anywhere, than though our environment was not to our taste and the people about us not in sympathy with our aspirations. The demonstrated proofs of telepathy everywhere rapidly accumulating go far to obviate many an old time difficulty by introducing to our notice palpable experiences which distinctly prove that we are capable of communicating very fully with our truly congenial spiritual associates, no matter where we or they may be at the time of communicating. This feeling at a distance, as telepathy means, practically annihilates distances and thus does away with the necessity of resorting to strange and weird theories advanced by some schools of occultists concerning traveling in "astral bodies" and much else that strikes the average hearer as uncanny even though it may not be untrue.

The law of attraction, as it is found operating in the case of demonstrated telepathy and mental healing accomplished through absent treatment as well as in many other ways, clearly proves that it is quite possible to send out one's thought-force and enter into intelligent communion with distant persons and places without taking a literal journey in any sense of the word. People are often prone to attribute psychic phenomena to the functioning of a sixth sense; and though not prepared to deny the existence of such a sense or even of a seventh in addition to it, we think it advisable to make the endeavor to account for phenomena on the basis of more generally comprehended allusions whenever practicable before resorting to remoter bases for explanation.

Unless the five senses are clearly proved incapable of accounting for telepathic and kindred phenomena we need not have recourse in argument to a hypothetical sixth sense. Let us see how far we can illustrate this subject on the basis of the five senses without entrenching upon what is to many people the decidedly uncertain territory of a sixth sense.

Clairvoyance and clairaudience are two French words which by this time have become quite as acceptably English as the vast array of Latin terms which are on all our tongues continually, and which no one refuses to accept as ordinary English words. These two words literally mean clear vision (clairvoyance) and clear hearing (clairaudience). A clear seer or a clear hearer is all, then, that we mean when we use the epithets clairvoyant and clairaudient intelligently. The employment of the detestable word abnormal in connection with enlarged perception in any direction has invested a beautiful and thoroughly rational subject with an air of uncanny mystery highly repulsive to healthy unromantic persons though weirdly fascinating to many of neurotic tendency. The more recent substitution of the adjective supernormal has proved a decided gain, as it does not convey anything unhealthy or undesirable; at the same time it implies an undue restriction of the normal, a word properly signifying healthy. And it is not true, because certain psychic tendencies have manifested themselves in an aberrant manner in connection with catalepsy and other nervous diseases, that the psychic functions are properly other than truly natural—as natural indeed as any of the ordinary physical functions which, though equally wonderful, do not call forth amazement simply because of their universal presence among us.

To be self-centred is to be strong; to scatter one's forces is an infallible sign of weakness. The stronger our sense of sight or hearing becomes, and the more quietly attentive observers and listeners we come to be, the further we can see and the further we can hear. Distance becomes more and more annihilated, till at length we astonish our less enlightened neighbors by describing to them objects and sounds which, with their more limited perceptions, they can know nothing about. But furnish your friends with some mechanical device or scientific appendage as an aid to vision or as a transmitter of sound, and though you have not appealed to any new sense, but confined yourself strictly to dealing with the ordinary senses of sight and hearing, you have proved that even by artificial means the ability to hear and see afar off can be thus artificially developed. Directly we remove the unnatural or supernatural element from the discussion, we perceive how thoroughly rational it is that, as we cultivate the much-to-be desired habit of mental concentration, we shall soon find ourselves in actual everyday possession of abilities which aforetime we looked upon as either nonexistent or else entirely removed from the proper field of normal activity.

Have you ever watched a cat or a dog listening intently or exercising the sense of smell in some high degree? If so you can not fail to have been struck with the perfect attitude of entire concentratedness displayed by the animal in question. Our opinion concerning ancient forms of nature-worship is that the Egyptians and other ancient peoples venerated certain animals, including the dog and the cat, on account of the display of remarkable ability by these animals in directions where they themselves lacked any such measure of unfoldment; and as worship can not exist without concentration of thought or riveting of mental gaze upon a venerated object or idea, there was a very practical side to ancient forms of so-called idolatry, altogether too much overlooked by those zealous missionaries and their followers, who, in their determination to destroy idolatrous abuses, lack intellectual acumen, and fail to peer below the surface of a degraded cult to discover its primal excellencies. To understand a system and acknowledge that there is some good in it does not necessitate "going over" to it and becoming its partisan champion. Quite the reverse must be the outcome of a fearless, impartial examination of the various systems of ancient thought and practice now being opened to our modern vision; we shall see so much of good and so much of error in every restricted system that our examination of systems one by one will land us in a broad field of universal philosophy, where we can appreciate, admire and utilize whatever is really worthy in every system without committing ourselves in any way to the specific advocacy of any contracted cult.

To the average person, even yet, some concrete image seems a necessity. Some picture or statue, or else some book or well selected text or motto, is a great help to those who are traversing any portion of the wide domain covered by the eclectic phrase, Suggestive Therapeutics. Mental Scientists and others are rapidly coming to see that no single method can reasonably be adopted and adhered to in all cases. The human mind is reached through the corporeal senses, and also independently of them, unless they are so far more extensive than we have been led to believe that telepathy, thought transference, mind reading, absent healing, etc., etc., are all to be accounted for on the basis of an appeal to these senses in some superior or interior manner—a conclusion which, if reached at all, can scarcely land us very far away from Swedenborg's doctrine of a spiritual body, to which the physical structure exactly corresponds, part to part and function to function. Swedenborg's career, viewed in the light of the latest psychical revelations, takes on additional interest and removes the view-point to somewhat higher ground than that occupied by Emerson in one portion of his essay on that truly representative man. It can never be forgotten that Swedenborg was one of Europe's greatest scientific men, and that, many years before he claimed any special illumination, he elaborated his famous theory of correspondences which was afterwards used as an exact means for expressing all that he had to teach concerning the spiritual universe.

The clairvoyance of Swedenborg is a matter of indisputable history, and it is a very noteworthy fact that extreme psychical perceptiveness co-existed in his case with unfaltering devotion to the pursuit of the natural sciences and a rigid adhesion to the scientific method of experimental research and precise employment of language in all his writings.

Though the very elaborate and amazingly definite descriptions of the world of spirits, given to the public through the course of the voluminous writings of Scandinavia's greatest sage and seer, may provoke incredulity, or at least excite great questioning on the part of a multitude who can not seem to believe that we can any of us know much of the "vague hereafter," there is so much food for thought in the general plan of the teaching, which bears directly on our immediate topic at this time, that we know not how to enforce our own teaching or suggest our own conclusions—fortified as they are by considerable experience and corroborated by widely extended testimony—better than by taking Swedenborg's philosophy as to its general outline as a basis on which to erect a structure of consecutive and easily assimilated doctrine on the subject of the working of the law of attraction in everyday affairs.

A sudden leap from the universal to the particular is never a reckless jump; it is a warranted philosophical transition, agreeing in all particulars with the discoveries and logical inferences of the most exact sciences. There can be no break in the continuity of logical reasoning; it therefore does not matter whether you are engaged in estimating the colossal or the minute, you are subject to the same order of procedure in all instances. The analytical chemist can so deal with a drop of liquid or a grain of substance as to reach a completely satisfactory conclusion regarding an immense mass of the same liquid or solid which in its entire bulk it would be quite impossible for him to handle; so is it when we come to deal with a moment of time, a point in space, or a separated individual, selected from the enormous mass of human beings which we can not possibly deal with in totality. Whenever we deal with a unit we are dealing with an efficient sample and are getting ready to soar into the as-yet-unknown, after having dealt with the already-known, which was once for us the unknown. There are two varieties of agnosticism and it is necessary to discriminate thoughtfully between them, as the one variety deserves profound respect while the other deserves to be treated with derision. The adjective agnostic is simply ignorant, and agnosticism has been called "the philosophy of ignorance" by some of its supporters; not as a term of reproach, but as a confession of modesty when employed by deep thinkers and earnest students of universal order who feel overwhelmed with the immensity of the seemingly unfathomable universe.

Tennyson at one time broke forth in the plaintive words: "Alas, we know not anything;" a very extreme statement, you may say, and not by any means one that England's gifted laureate adhered to throughout his beautiful "In Memoriam," but nevertheless an expression not to be looked upon as a confession of total ignorance, but as the exasperated cry of a seeking intellect which felt itself baffled at every turn when struggling to pierce the veil which often most effectually conceals the realm of life immortal from the tear-blinded eyes of those who are suffering from a keen sense of utter earthly bereavement. Tennyson, however, says: "We trust that somehow good will be the final goal of all," and then note his synthetic philosophy:

> "That nothing walks with aimless feet,
> That not a worm is cloven in vain,
> Or but subserves another's gain
> When God has made the pile complete."

There is often deep faith in the soul while there is distressing doubt in the intellect, and that soul which only feels knows all the while what the intellect which does not yet know is yearning to know and will surely come to know. We ought to be very respectful to honest doubters, though the preaching of denial as a cult is simply contemptible. No worse rubbish is ever printed than much of the literature of professed agnosticism, because, untrue to its name, it does not admit the plea of invincible ignorance, but boldly asserts that things are "not so" after having started out with the positive declaration that we can not in our present state know whether there is or is not a spiritual universe. The scientific method to which we should all rigidly adhere, even in the consideration of religious problems, is a most hopeful and encouraging method, as it holds out the blissful expectation of constantly increasing knowledge and treats every human experience as worthy of intelligent attention. It is only the experimental method that is either fair or safe, and we undertake to apply it rigorously to the conundrums of theology as well as to the commonplace matters of culinary art. Take, for instance, a single beatitude, precept or commandment of the moral law and watch its operations. Deliberately trace the progress of events along the line of obedience to the higher counsels of perfection and see how the case stands in everyday life, and you will soon have an excellent reason for all the faith there is in you. Have you read Müller's "Life of Trust?" If not, procure a copy and study it.

That singular man, who has for so many years operated orphanages at Bristol, in England, on the principle of trust in a never-failing supply, is not known as the advocate of any special religious or other views which would not receive the sanction of a large percentage of reputed Evangelical Christians, but he everywhere has put doctrine into practice and translated theories into conduct, thereby transforming infidel belief into living, working faith. There is no greater absurdity than that of confounding dry intellectual acceptance of dogma with vital working faith as operative in the success of spiritual machinery set going and kept in constant repair and thorough working order. We have heard people say they believed in prayer, but they rarely, if ever, prayed; and they also believed in the supreme good of honesty, but in their business transactions they misrepresented goods to their customers. Such beliefs are an insult alike to intelligence and to conviction, for they stultify the moral sense at the same time they becloud the intellect. People may well say that trees are rightly judged by the fruit they bear, and in order to assist trees to bear much and good fruit it is necessary that they be well planted, watered, and tended. If we gather the fruits in due season we do not impoverish the trees, but rather encourage them to bear even more abundant crops the following summer; because everything is submissive to the law of use and exists for some distinctive end of service.

Let us encourage the growth of the trees in our mental orchards continually by making the most of what little fruit-bearing disposition they have already shown, never forgetting that it is only by making the most of what is already ours that we are on the road to an increase in our possessions.

Thought is the formative, organizing force, whose magnetic potency is incessantly attracting to a nucleic centre whatever affinitizes with what is already present at that centre. The old saying from the epistle of James, "A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways," applies to a great many people who are not hypocrites. Whenever we are seeking to throw all the light which can possibly be thrown on causes of success or failure, it is highly necessary that we should deal in a calm, philosophical manner with states which often confront us as pertaining to ourselves and others, which, though they are by no means "sinful" in the higher meaning of that expression, are decidedly erroneous in the lower meaning of the term.

To expect disaster is to court it, though it is certainly not to wish for it; so is it a means of attracting vice to think about it and brood over it. Unconsciously and unwittingly, therefore, many of the very people who are seeking to dethrone iniquity are enthroning it, because of their habit of constantly dwelling upon its direful prevalence and supposed increasing vigor.

Gladstone could give no wiser counsel to the young men who applied to him as to a venerated father for counsel, than the superb advice offered 1,800 years ago by Paul the apostle in those memorable words which need to be engraven on every mind and should be emblazoned on the wall of every nursery, school, and hospital: "Whatsoever things are excellent and of good repute, think on these things." People who never apply themselves diligently to the task of testing methods approved by the wisest in all ages may think themselves learned when they are lamentably ignorant; and in the pride of an uncultured intellect they may thoughtlessly declare that they do not believe in the efficacy of measures they have never proved; but the truly truth-seeking are ever inclined to apply themselves earnestly to the work of demonstrating the reality of the stupendous claim made by even the most extravagant of occultists that by constantly meditating on any subject, and confidently expecting a predetermined outcome, we secure the results we desire.

All magicians have attributed their success to conformity with this principle, and as magic ranges all the way from the purest of the whitest to the foulest of the blackest variety, no matter whether the wonder-worker be a reverent worshiper of the Spiritual Deity, who is love and wisdom, or a corrupt Satanist who invokes the shades infernal, he places reliance upon the object of his affection and doubts not the efficacy of his prayers to unite himself with the realm of power.

The scientific aspects of prayer are those which the future will have to deal with rather than the simply religious ones, because while the fervent prayer of the religious devotee is often abundantly answered, it is less than satisfying to be told that Heaven arbitrarily responds to one petition and passes another by unheeded. We must humanize and rationalize our conceptions of divine methods. The Supreme Being acts through undeviating order, and it is therefore according to our word and to our faith that things are unto us.

So say the Evangelists Jesus taught. It seems at first a derogation from the power and dignity of the great healer to attribute the healing of the patients who came to him for succor to their own word and faith, but why should we hesitate to accept the explanation which he is said clearly to have given? Faith is aroused by spiritual appeals; correct words are spoken by patients for themselves as a result of work successfully done by healers on their behalf, but the final act must always be performed by the individual who is to reap the benefit. It is quite rational and highly salutary to think of ourselves as living perpetually in the midst of innumerable spheres or circles of organized intelligences which include the "living" and the "departed" equally. In union there is always strength; in disunion, weakness. To go about in a trembling, halting manner with uncertain mental gait is to reap physically the precarious results of mental unsteadiness, while determinedly to take a mental attitude and hold to it through "thick and thin" is to emphasize the importance of spiritual adhesiveness which weathers storms and comes off victorious in situations where a less resolute position would necessitate disaster. If an animal knows you are in earnest and "mean business," it will obey you, whereas if you are mentally unsteady the animal feels that you are so, and as you lack the power to enforce respect and compel obedience, you find yourself at the mercy of the whims of a capricious quadruped. Circumstances have to be handled as one should handle horses. Do not seek brutally to coerce, but strongly and lovingly to attract. Brute force is not strength, nor does physical might constitute right. There is a higher energy, impalpable and invisible but intensely real, and that it is which renders it within our power to tap the fountains of spiritual supply and compel fate to bend before us. A good rule for daily conduct is: Never allow yourself to get enraged or discouraged when things are not going to your pleasure. Anger and discouragement are alike signs of weakness. They who would conquer must never lose hope or temper. Our environments are adversaries which we must conquer, but which having subdued become our valued allies and effective auxiliaries. To always anticipate the ideal and consciously work toward it, by doing whatever comes our way to be done as a means to the desired end, is to have started right and to be fairly on the way to eventual triumph over present limitations so complete that the very contemplation of such heights seems "too good to be true," to all save the few prophetic souls in any race who are the advance guard of Humanity.

THE DESTRUCTIVE INFLUENCE OF FEAR AND WORRY—THE BODY-BUILDING, SUCCESS-COMPELLING INFLUENCE OF FAITH AND COURAGE.

So much has been spoken and written of late in the interest of that excellent enterprise, the "Don't Worry Movement," originated by Theodore Seward, of New York, with the hearty co-operation of many friends, that the deterrent influence of fear on human welfare has been discussed afresh, and we are glad to say is now being approached in a far more intelligent manner than formerly. There are various senses in which the word fear has been used and may still continue to be used, and it is certainly not against the idea of fear in its highest meaning, which is respect or reverence, that we intend to utter any protest. The common acceptance of the word to-day is not synchronous with its obvious intention in the Book of Proverbs, but it is popularly used precisely as it is employed in the first of the epistles of St. John, in those familiar words, the truth of which we can all indorse, "fear hath torment," and "perfect love casteth out fear." Fear and doubt are inseparable. If we feel that anything is left to blind chance, that chaos rules supreme, or that a malignant fate may be in charge of our destinies, we can not do other than give place to serious misgivings as to the outcome of any undertaking, no matter how laudable the projected enterprise may be. On the other hand, if we accept the consoling optimism suggested in the well-known words attributed to Shakespeare, "There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we will," we have found a basis for a satisfying, restful philosophy, amply sufficient for any emergency which may arise. It is useless to counsel fearlessness without offering some substantial base on which to build courage. Edifices which repose on sand may be ever so fair to look upon, ever so graceful and ingenious in design, but because they lack a solid base they can not endure the tempest. So it is with systems of thought which are often beautiful, but practically baseless fabrications; they rest on no solid perception of essential verity, but are tastefully reared on a summer's day to attract the beauty-loving spectator. Charming but untrustworthy must be every philosophy that bases its optimistic conclusion on an unsubstantial premise.

When Tolstoi wrote that much discussed book of his, "The Kreutzer Sonata," he narrated a good many plain facts and pressed home a good many practical truths, among which was the incontestable declaration that parents who love their children very dearly may find these darling objects of their tenderest affection sources of much more sorrow than joy to them on account of the entirely physical nature of the love they bear them. Apprehension of impending danger is the bitterest drop in the bitter cup which fear mingles when the dreaded intangible something menaces those upon whom our dearest hopes are set; and how can there be materialistic redemption from this fear when we see all around us abundant evidences of the uncertainty of material things? Endeavor to cultivate trust as we may, trust can not successfully repose on an insecure foundation. For this reason, if for no other, the safe counsel of the gospel is everlastingly true, "Set not your affections upon the things of earth." This does not mean that we are to kill out all natural desires and seek to attain a rigidly ascetic mental attitude devoid of all human affection. Quite the reverse is the effect produced in us when we succeed in transferring our love from the perishable to the imperishable side of the object of our affection.

There are two sides to every one of us, and mutual affection can surely exist and be well sustained on the higher, which is the abiding, instead of the lower, which is the evanescent, side. When we love attributes of character rather than exterior personalities, we feel instinctively immortal, for such love proceeds from an immortal centre and is directed to an immortal object. Let no one be carried away with the totally erroneous impression, honestly entertained by some, that if we do not centre our thoughts and affection upon our physical bodies and upon material possessions, we shall have to go weak and poverty-stricken. Experience proves the fallacy of so false a position in the persons of multitudes who resemble the women in the Gospels who had spent all their worldly substance in the vain hope of gaining health and had yet remained feeble, suffering, and constantly growing worse and weaker—in one case for twelve years and in another for thirty-eight years in succession. It has often been noticed that when a person supposed to be dying has made his will and peacefully resigned himself to the change which he and his friends regarded as inevitable, the cessation of fear, worry and anxiety left the body free to get well at the very moment when distress concerning its impending destruction had subsided.

It is not infrequently the case that when a priest has administered the sacrament of extreme unction, which is only given to those who are thought to be very near death, the sufferer recovers through the consoling effect of the sacrament, which is intended to allay fear and produce a state of spiritual tranquillity.

The physical body will get well, in many instances, as of its own accord, if it be only permitted to do so; the vital question as concerns the welfare of the fleshly tabernacle not being what to do to prevent dissolution, but how to stop consuming fear and restless anxiety so as to give whatever we vaguely call Nature an unfettered opportunity to act. Medicaments are unnecessary and often harmful in cases of profound exhaustion; it is not stimulation, but repose, which affords freedom for the healing energy in Nature to operate. For this reason, if for no other, a large number of so-called mental treatments are highly successful, which in one sense of the term are actually no treatments at all, but simply absence of treatment or relief from it. So far as abstinence from worry is concerned that is only the negative side of the great hygienic question with which we are all incessantly confronted. It is a negative good to drop care and let go of anxiety, and when we do so we "give Nature a chance," but there are far higher aspects of sanitary science than these which need most serious attention. Bodies can scarcely be said to build themselves; they are buildings in constant course of erection and alteration, for they are never exactly alike two days or even two hours together. So rapid are the transformations of the human physique that physiologists of renown are now declaring that in three months, or even six weeks, the most radical changes are or can be effected in the system. The old theory that it takes seven years to remodel the entire frame, must, if true at all, refer to the osseous structure, which, of course, includes the hardest and most slowly changing bones. The flesh certainly changes with amazing rapidity, and the vital organs are the quickest of all to respond to mental emotions of every sort.

Fear deteriorates everything; it impoverishes the blood, breaks down tissue, destroys nerve cells, lessens resisting power wherewith the insidious attacks of disease can be repelled, and in every way wrecks the organism.

Fear and worry are diseases and must be treated as such; it is useless harshly to condemn those who suffer from these infirmities, and equally foolish is it supinely to declare that people who have inherited such tendencies are much to be pitied, but they can not be cured.

It is often difficult to rid yourself unaided of any bad habit to which you may have become a slave; there are, therefore, many cases in which the good offices of another are of priceless value, and the entire plan of suggestive treatment is based upon an understanding of the good of reciprocity and an intelligent perception of how to apply in the spirit of true co-operation the wise words of an apostle, "Ye that are strong should bear (remove) the burdens of the weak." It would be absurd to insist that strong people ought to become weak through taking upon themselves the infirmities of their frailer neighbors, but as bear means often to remove or carry away, we can readily see how weaknesses can be removed or borne away through the efficient agency of strength radiated from the stronger to the weaker.

When the public mind is fully delivered from that horrible nightmare—belief in something it is pleased to call malignant hypnotism—the path of the suggestive therapeutist will be much plainer than it yet is, and happily that miserable scarecrow is growing rapidly less formidable.

Creators or engenderers of fear in others can never successfully pose as healers or emancipators of the afflicted, for they are themselves suffering under the very delusion which is tormenting the victims they are seeking to release.

Christian Scientists have often been heard to speak of "malicious mesmerism" and its direful consequences when the cases referred to that awful mystery of imagined evil were simply instances of some petty phase of hysteria which by rational mental treatment could have been very quickly relieved, and with a little sound teaching added to the treatment permanently cured.

Obsession, which is the modern equivalent of the ancient belief of demoniacal possession, is another horrid bugbear which occasions untold misery wherever its power is feared. It would be unduly presumptuous to say that the claim is altogether foundationless, or that the alleged phenomena never appear, but it is the fear of devils which gives power to whatever is diabolical, fully as much as the love of error which is of course the first producing cause of Diablerie.

The 23d Psalm has never been surpassed either for soundness of sentiment or beauty of diction, where it reads: "I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." The composer of that canticle is so deeply imbued with a sense of divine protection that he neither can nor will give way to alarms. Enemies may surround him, but God prepares a table before him in the presence of those enemies, so that though the hostile troops exist he can eat and drink in peace and safety, even though a host of foes are encamped around him, because he is in the blissful realization of the truth that greater is the power on his side than all contrary forces. There is always a balance of power somewhere; one host is always superior to the other, and it is everything to feel, in times of surrounding turbulence, that we are on the powerful and winning side.

The crude attacks on the letter of some gospel sentences, as we find them in King James' translation of the English Bible—mere quibbles and harpings upon an imperfect rendering of an occasional phrase—are entirely repelled by reading the much better and far more correct translation of the disputed passages in the revised version, which instead of leaving the text open to criticism with the words, "take no thought," substitutes with complete fidelity to the original Greek, "Be not anxious" and "take no anxious thought for the morrow." It is certainly true that we can not do our business if we bestow no thought upon it, and it is also true that in many instances we have to think of the morrow in the affairs which occupy us during the present day. But necessary thought and anxious thought are by no means identical; they are as unlike as clean money and filthy lucre; the former thoroughly legitimate, the latter altogether disreputable. The difference between thinking rightly and thinking wrongly, of the same thing, is patent to every reasoner; and as we all have to think of our work in one way or another it is of supreme importance that we form and keep the good habit of thinking rightly thereon.

Even simple utilitarianism should suffice to set us and keep us right in this direction, for we have only to use common sense and be guided by practical outcomes clearly to behold the results of the two kinds of thought now under discussion. Anxious thought is decrepit and debilitates whoever indulges in it; it is moreover a magnet to attract adversity just as surely as bright, generous, hopeful thought attracts prosperity.

It is what you are in yourself a great deal more than what your accomplishments may be that actually determines the measure of success which in the long run you achieve. Our thoughts build our psychic or unseen bodies, and the radiations from these penetrate vastly further than does merely animal magnetism. Human electricity is a phrase which some writers employ to describe this subtle, clearly felt though unseen radiation from the psychic personality. Fear disintegrates, while faith organizes; therefore, in the art of body-building faith and courage are two of the most important and influential agents possible to conceive. Faith compels success because of its intense organizing power, and courage, which is proverbially invincible, is so near of kin to faith that the two can scarcely even in fancy be disunited. We have these two pairs to consider: Fear and worry on the wrong side, to be overcome by faith and courage on the right side. If we have hitherto been subject to the sway of the twin fiends we can only banish them from our lives by invoking and securing the services of the twin angels, which are their direct antagonists. It is useless to say that we can not overcome fear and worry, for though it may be true indeed that we can not if we keep our thoughts fixed on those disastrous and destroying vices, we can assuredly escape from their clutches if we do but persistently concentrate our attention on the opposing virtues.

In this, as in all cases beside, affirmation, not denial, is the keynote to all successful undertakings. Denials or negative statements may have sometimes a secondary value as erasive processes, but there is absolutely no rest or satisfaction secured by seeking to combat errors as such, while nothing can be distinctly more self-evident than that errors are combated successfully and indeed entirely overthrown or finally eliminated by those divinely glorious affirmations which treat of the supremely "excellent things" upon which we need ever to fix our mental gaze. What teaching can be stronger in this connection than "perfect love casteth out fear"? Love comes in and fear goes out. We do not have to think about fear or fight fear! We think of whatever most inspires sublime affection; then as love is born within us fear is eradicated and evicted. It often seems difficult, if not impossible, to love what we feel we do not understand; therefore, when we are directed to love God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength, we may sometimes feel like saying, But who or what is this God I am commanded to love?

If there be a Supreme Being, or Infinite Intelligence, directing and pervading the universe, alike immanent and transcendent, how can we love even though we can not help standing in awe of this almighty power, this infinite living energy? Such questions are not irreverent, and they can not be lightly dismissed. It is all in vain that we are told by theologic masters that God demands our love, and that it is our duty to love our Creator in return for our acceptance of the boon of life. Is life worth the living; is the game worth the candle? are queries which next arise, and the prevalence of suicide in many places, and the superabundance of pessimistic literature now available, suggest a very gloomy answer to these despairing questions.

Marie Corelli has traced the prevalence of suicide in modern France to the spread of recent atheism and the use of absinthe as a beverage, and her points are well taken alike in "Wormwood" and "The Mighty Atom," but the public may be pardoned for inquiring further into what has led to the absinthe and the atheism. The Christian church has had a great opportunity in France for many centuries, and if Christianity in any one of its myriad forms is really capable of regenerating society, why has it failed to do so in the very countries where it has been officially encouraged and liberally supported? Without attempting to explain all the causes which have led to the seeming failure on the part of any Christian hierarchy truly to uplift the world and stamp out pessimism through the introduction of a sunny optimism, we can not honestly shut our eyes to at least two of the many causes which might be faithfully enumerated. These two are: first, the lack of purity or spirituality in the practical life of the church itself (an admitted fact, despite magnificent individual exceptions to this rule); secondly, the overstatement of the harsher aspects of the Christian message and the consequent understatement of the milder, gentler, and in every way more winsome aspects of the Christian creed. When devotion to the Sacred Heart was formally introduced into the Roman Catholic service, no secret was made by theologians of the fact that this devotion was specially intended to emphasize the loving human side of divine nature and draw, with the pleadings of love, hearts which would only be repelled by the forbidding doctrines of retribution, which had long occupied a disproportionate place in the bulk of religious teachings, both Catholic and Protestant.

> "But we make God's love too narrow
> By false limits of our own,
> And we magnify His strictness
> With a zeal He will not own."

And then the glorious outburst of trust in infinite Goodness couched in the heart-satisfying words, "There's a wideness in God's mercy like the wideness of the sea, and the heart of the Eternal is most wonderfully kind," were addressed by a Catholic priest to his own co-religionists, and they also constitute a living, loving, inspiring message from a noble, saintly soul to all humanity. It is such teachings as these that truly uplift and glorify the vocation of the preacher, and on such high spiritual ground room is found for fraternal co-operation among the purest and wisest representatives of every cult beneath the sun.

We must either be ready to present a loving view of Deity to the weary world, or be content to see the masses sink into hopeless apathy or rise in violent revolt against a creed which seems nearly all head and almost no heart. The higher view we take of the Supreme Spirit, the loftier will be our own views of human worth and social relationship.

Nothing can be more pitiful than the barren thought that we are playthings of feelingless force, unless it be the dread of the sempiternal anger of an infuriated infinite potentate, and it is in consequence of the preaching of the "fear that hath torment" that the modern intellectual attitude is so largely atheistic or at least agnostic as it is. It is both interesting and encouraging to peer below the surface of even the most violently iconoclastic of modern utterances, and find at the root of every protest a struggle against the idea of cruelty and injustice enthroned in heaven or incarnate on earth; never is the outcry raised against what appeals to the human heart as either just or loving.

Prof. Park, an eminent teacher in a New England theological seminary, frankly replied to the questions of his class by telling them that salvation depends upon inward holiness, and that no matter what a man could or could not intellectually accept in the line of dogma, if he lived as holily as he could with the light he had, he was on the road to heaven.

We are particularly glad to call attention to such statements when they emanate from the strongholds of historic orthodoxy; because they clearly prove the healthy operations of the true modern Zeitgeist and give promise that the day is fast breaking in which there will no longer be a cloud of hateful fear hanging over the head of humanity and tormenting sensitive natures to become despairingly lawless, or else to sink into such melancholy as results in the death, to all appearance, of every fine and beautiful sentiment which leads to noble outward living.

Fear leads to recklessness and defiance, and it is an acknowledged passport to insanity, which is the ultimate of despair. It is a grave error to surmise that courageous people are reckless; they are, of all others, the most intensely cautious, though they are not careful in any other sense than cautious. Here again we are confronted with the differing uses of the same word producing embarrassed thought until we have swept away the difficulty with the broom of careful discrimination between higher and lower meanings. Carefulness is always eulogized as a virtue, while carelessness is condemned as a vice, and not improperly so if we only take into account the conventional meaning attached to these opposing terms. However, when we come across such sayings in the New Testament as "Be careful for nothing," and "Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you," we instinctively admire the suggestion of freedom from worry and anxiety with which such sentences are replete.

The freedom from toil of the lilies, and the free life of the birds, is a matter of gospel comment, but no sooner have we yielded to the charm of the sentiment "they toil not," and listened with speechless delight to the declaration that even Solomon in all his glory was not so beautifully attired as one of the care-free lilies of the field, than we are confronted with the incontestable fact that flowers and birds are intensely industrious. They do not toil, but they do work; they do not labor, but they are incessantly active. Herein consists the practicality as well as the beauty of the gospel message. We are to work but not worry; we are to be ever industrious, but anxiety regarding the outcome is to be always absent from our thoughts. If we do indeed consider how flowers grow and how birds build their nests and sustain themselves generally, we shall soon grow to understand that the feathered tribes of air, which make the groves bright with their splendid plumage and the fields melodious with their charming song, are like their less highly intelligent friends of the vegetable kingdom — workers but not worriers.

Two things are invariably necessary to successful work, no matter what its line may be: first, the love thereof; second, confidence in the success thereof. Only as we love can we work beautifully, harmonically, courageously. Courage comes with love; it is love alone that makes tasks easy and fingers fly fast.

Drummond's exquisite statement, in his "Ascent of Man," that the story of evolution is a love story on a stupendous scale, has helped many a struggling evolutionist to see how thoroughly possible it is to make an agreement plain between the facts of natural science and the deepest truths of religion. The nineteenth century has scarcely been blessed with a more fervently religious writer than Henry Drummond, but his orthodoxy was of the heart rather than of the head. Right feeling is the root of all righteous speech and conduct. How can we love God if we do not love man, who is in the image of God? It is our view of human nature that really signifies; it is our estimate of human life that really counts. Whatever be true concerning the Ultimate Reality, we are human beings here and now mingling constantly one with another; and all our happiness, as well as all our success, depends upon what our social and industrial relations actually are. How can we feel confidence in others if we have no faith in ourselves; and if we can trust ourselves, why should we doubt our fellows, seeing that we are all essentially alike, however much incidentally we may differ? Love, faith, and courage must ever be a trinity in unity; these three are essentially and eternally one. Primarily Love, Faith, and Courage can be considered distinctively, but not separately. Courage is evidently the child of Faith married to Love. Love, as we all know from every sort of experience, is the root of all things. In love we find the fountainhead of all desire, resolution and determination. Love prompts to every effort of every sort; without its impelling force we should do nothing, for we should have no incentive to action. But love alone is ineffective; it must be united with wisdom, and it is wisdom which nurtures and cradles courage, for wisdom is the animating spirit of faith. Is it not a matter of world-wide experience that fear and ignorance go together in millions of instances? We dread the unknown; we are afraid of darkness. Light dissipates fears, because it reveals and makes manifest; and the manifestation of things as they really are, instead of adding to our terrors, emancipates us therefrom. How much easier it is to be brave in the daytime, when the sun is brightly shining, than through the dark vigils of the night! Knowledge, which is the soul of faith, gives us confidence in the night season.

Things are not worse, but far better than we have supposed. The revelation of the true state of a case will never occasion dismay, but to the quiet, thoughtful mind will always point a way out of difficulty and seeming danger. We are afraid of we know not what. The true healer is one who takes the timid child with him into the very midst of the supposed danger and proves that there is safety there, thus causing injurious as well as needless alarms all to subside.

When we all agree to give up worrying we shall commence a new era in human progress, an age of infinitely superior enlightenment to the present, for all those mysterious psychic powers about which we hear so much to-day are perfectly natural, and only await the moment when they are allowed to assert their vigor and prove themselves our faithful servitors. It is an excellent piece of advice to counsel all nervous, timid, fretful, anxious persons quietly to discuss their fancied dangers and perplexities with some strong, experienced, well-nigh fearless friend, one who is sympathetic and comprehending, but noted for far more than the average degree of courage.

In the practice of Suggestive Therapeutics it is nvariably proved true that the healthful radiaion of force from a courageous person to one not yet so courageous is of inestimable benefit. Courage is contagious, and the same may be said of every conceivable virtue or mental and moral excellence. As the wise builder not only builds himself, but can inspire and teach others to build likewise, so can any one who is himself or herself free from fear and full of courage, prove a powerful incentive to others to reach a like condition.

VIII.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE MIND UPON THE BODY—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH, AND WHAT IT SIGNIFIES—BECOMING ONE'S OWN PHYSICIAN AND THEREBY PHYSICIAN TO OTHERS.

The preceding chapters in this volume have all led up in an unmistakable manner to the idea of man's eventual conquest over all limitations, and, among the most distressful of these, sickness is certainly the most depressing. How often do we hear it said by one who owns broad acres and estimates his fortune at several million dollars or even pounds sterling, "I would give all I possess in exchange for your health." The remark may be addressed to a servant in the employ of this multi-millionaire, or it may be made to some contented workman who in his humble capacity of day laborer earns just sufficient to meet the actual expenses of a very modest existence. The remark is not necessarily a thoughtless or impatient one; it may be the serious, well-digested outcome of deep thought and earnest meditation. Why should it not be? In that marvelous old epic poem, the book of Job, Satan is represented as saying to the Lord: "All that a man hath will he give for his health," for that is the obvious meaning of the word usually translated "life" in the passage referred to. The reasoning of the accuser or accusing angel is that a man may be bereft of all his possessions; houses, lands, cattle may all be destroyed by earthquake, fire or whirlwind, but so long as health remains he has something left to be truly thankful for; but let a loathsome disease affect his body, then, when the calamity is in his own flesh, Satan takes it for granted he will lose all confidence in divine benignity, and, yielding to despair, commit suicide or abandon himself to hopeless blasphemy. Though there is so much sublime optimism in the story of Job that Satan's prediction is not ultimately verified, the author of that rhythmic tragedy has shown us clearly enough how very hard it is to maintain integrity of thought when disease of a torturing nature is devouring the fleshly tabernacle which a wise spirit will never rashly leave.

The question here arises, how far are we led by science and general experience to regard physical suffering as a cause of mental distress, and to what extent are we justified in attributing physical disorders to a mental cause? That Job had not "sinned" is made very plain throughout the story of his life, but are we ever led by the logic of facts to maintain that, because a career may be an honorable one, therefore no mistakes are made during its entire length? Nothing can be harsher or more unkind, and nothing often further from truth, than the condemnatory assumption that all sickness is the result of sin. We know well enough what popular impression the word "sin" makes on the average listener, therefore it is cruel to apply so opprobrious an epithet as "sinner" to one who, though not guiltless of innocent mistakes, is in no sense of the term a wilful transgressor or trespasser. To sin is to act contrary to one's own sense of right, and as we are not called upon to be keepers of our neighbors' consciences, we shall never attempt to sit in judgment on the motives of another life. But though we are not at liberty to condemn, we are free to teach, and though it is as unjust as it is ungracious to give way to censoriousness, it is clearly within the bounds of philanthropy to point out to all a more excellent way than the mistaken path in which many of our well-intentioned neighbors in common with our former selves have long been treading. Nowhere in or out of the Bible do we find a clearer discrimination between sin and weakness than in the account furnished in the gospel of a man born blind, receiving sight. Disciples ask their teacher: Who did sin; this man, or his parents? The Master replies: Neither this man nor his parents. The disciples represent those who, while seeking enlightenment, are nevertheless still committed to certain erroneous theories in which they have been trained, or which they have unthinkingly picked up from their associates and adopted as their own without sober reflection. To the men of old as to the men of to-day, two aspects of life present themselves vividly. One aspect is covered by the Sanskrit word Karma, the other by the English word Heredity. A man may have sinned in a previous life and be now undergoing a punishment therefor—so say those who take the "Karmic" view of a present situation. "The parents have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge," quote the advocates of the prevailing theory of heredity, which is only a modified version of original sin and our participation in Adam's transgression. A higher view of life than that taken by the advocates of either of the two theories just mentioned disposes of original sin altogether, both in one's self and in one's ancestors, and causes us to say, practically: "We are our own Adams; and if we sin, it is after the similitude of Adam's transgression, not in consequence of the fall of a progenitor or the vice of an ancestor." But sin aside, it is easy enough to observe that, situated as we are, in the midst of forces we must learn to govern, and material we must learn to control, we can readily bring temporary distress upon ourselves through simple ignorance, and "blindness from birth" is a figure of speech which exactly describes the actual condition. We are blind, i. e., we do not see before we have reached that point in our evolution of involved capability where we begin to see; then at first we see dimly or imperfectly as through a faulty mirror, till at length we come to behold things in their due relations and proportions and are ready to exclaim: "Whereas I was blind, now I see." Blindness from birth is negative; sight commencing at a period when inner consciousness is awakened is the starting-point of a positive condition.

Now, there are many ailments brought upon us by our weakness and inexperience which are compatible with our blind or non-seeing condition. These ailments are not penalties, but they are necessary experiences connected with our education and are up to a certain point inevitable; just as we can not avoid making unintentional mistakes when we are experimenting with some force or material which will come to obey us eventually, but which at present must appear rebellious or antagonistic because our experience in the art of subduing it has not yet been great enough to give us the victory over it.

Animals seem dowered with instinct while man boastfully arrogates to himself the exercise of reason instead of instinct. This is where we make our fatal mistake; we oppose reason to instinct when, if we were wiser, we should supplement instinct with reason. Animals are rarely sick in their native wilds, but in captivity they are subject to every ailment which afflicts distorted humanity.

Not understanding the true province of human reason, we have turned aside from the path of nature and taught or compelled many of our friends in fur or feathers to do the same, with the result that we have built up an artificial order of existence, diametrically opposed to sanitary law; therefore, though the devotees of what is called the highest culture and civilization loudly proclaim themselves hygienists, nowhere are the rules of hygeia so ridiculously contravened as in the haunts of fashion where culture is supposed to present its fairest efflorescence.

The rule of health is extremely simple, while our usual manner of life is highly complicated and intensely artificial. As the writer of these pages is constantly in receipt of confidential letters from people in all walks of life who would consider it a breach of trust were we to afford the public even the slightest clue to the identity of our correspondents, and, moreover, as these letters are often too valuable to be passed by in silence, we deal with them anonymously as far as possible in our lessons and writings. The following is a sample: "I am a physician. I am and always have been an agnostic. Lately I have become greatly interested in Idealism, Mental Science, Metaphysics, etc. I have read your work on Psychology and also on Concentration. Have read Henry Wood's works, Newcomb's book, 'All's Right with the World,' etc. I like their optimism and recognize their suggestive merit. I would like to believe in the theory of freedom they teach; in mental causation; in immortality, etc. I have been a close student of evolution, but can not explain phenomena by any hypothesis whatever. I can not settle on any belief whatever relative to origin or destiny. I know nothing even of the essence of mind itself—whether secondary to matter or primary; whether it has spontaneity and causal efficacy, or is the outgrowth of material changes so called. If disease is mental and of psychic origin, how does the plant become diseased? I wish to believe along your line. Have always so wished, but seem to be an agnostic from necessity, or what seems so to me. Regard this letter as private, and if you can direct me to anything written by yourself or others that will likely put me in another line of thought, I will truly thank you."

The foregoing epistle is one of many in similar strain; some from physicians, some from lawyers, some from ministers of religion and many from the rank and file of non-professional people, all of whom seem perplexed beyond measure at sight of the mysterious disorder and derangement everywhere prevalent, and seemingly quite unable to formulate any philosophy which satisfies them that there is a solid base for confidence in the optimism of others which they greatly admire but seem powerless to share. The herculean task of convincing these good, honest-hearted people of the truth of a higher system of thought than agnosticism seems quite beyond the power of any simple scribe, and when people ask us to recommend books, though whole libraries stare us in the face replete with the utterances of sages, we always feel some sort of misgiving lest any one of the carefully selected volumes may have been already read by these very people and sorrowfully dismissed as unconvincing.

The truth has to be faced. You can not get the spiritual knowledge of which you are in search out of books, no matter how good and helpful they may be. Do you not already begin to see that testimony is not first-hand evidence, and circumstantial proof is always less than thoroughly convincing? Books and teachers are valuable just to the point where they help you to follow clues and pursue the path of knowledge fearlessly and individually, but no further; therefore, those who are in any measure healed become the guides of others on the road of healing. Plants are diseased when placed in an unnatural environment or attacked by invasive foes which they are powerless to resist. But plant life is so much less conscious and so much more negative to its surroundings than human life should be that the very liability of a vegetable to attacks of disorder should be accepted by us as counsel not to vegetate. There is a vegetal system in man, but it needs to be dominated by the higher human principle, or if danger threatens it, it may easily succumb.

We have never knowingly deviated from the teaching which we have for several years consistently (though we hope progressively) given forth, teaching to the effect that liability to sickness is to be overcome in the process of our development. Looking backward can never take the place of looking forward; it is neither to the animal nor to the vegetable, but to the perfected human being that we must ever direct our eyes if we are to succeed in banishing infirmities which pertain to lower stages of growth, but find no continuing place in man's experience as advance is made toward the goal of ultimate perfection.

It would be a very grave error to suppose that vegetables and animals have attained the heights of exemption from liability to disorder which we are destined to win. Instinct certainly does accomplish for the healthy animal what misunderstood or perverted reason can not accomplish for man, but, though bird and flower are subjects for study, they are by no means perfect models for imitation.

The Christ may say "follow me," but though he says consider, he does not counsel us to follow the lilies of the field or the birds of the air. If the phrase, Science of Health, is other than a misnomer, we must be conscious that the way to reach that ideal condition we call healthy (which is properly the equivalent of holy) is a path which we must find for ourselves and in which we must individually tread.

When we speak in positive terms of the influence of the mind upon the body, we are too apt oftentimes to overlook the actually existing state of affairs all about us and proceed to argue as though only one mind could possibly affect one body, and that the mind of the individual owning the body. Many people through lack of individuality are as surely victimized by the action of adverse thought around them as a dog may be poisoned by partaking of something cunningly or carelessly thrown in his way, of which he partakes ignorantly. We all run chances or risks as long as we are ignorant, and the more dependent and devoted we are to the mental state of those around us the less resisting power or even protective instinct have we to save us from disorder.

Many very curious systems of alleged hygiene thrive on the confidence reposed in them by their advocates, though as systems they have very little to commend them. Such a fact as this ought to make the masses pause and consider how it can be that opposing systems can accomplish equal good, which they certainly do accomplish in many indisputable instances.

"Lourdes," by Emile Zola, is an entertaining book, though it shocks the reverential sentiment in the course of many of its pages. The intensely realistic author of this highly rationalistic tale has paid a tribute to auto-suggestion as a factor in healing, but he has almost coarsely repudiated the action of those subtler spiritual forces in which the truly religious world devoutly believes. The commercial element at Lourdes has made a great impression upon Zola. The religion of the place is not sufficiently or exclusively religious to make a convert of the irreligious Frenchman. French realists in particular require to come in contact with unadulterated, unaffected, undiluted piety before they are impressed with it, and at no public healing shrine do we find the enterprising hotel-keeper or the vender of charms and bogus relics absent. Yet Lourdes has an atmosphere which heals a fair percentage of those who breathe it even on the say-so of those who refuse to submit their judgment to its central proposition—the vision of Bernadette and the patronage of Mary Immaculate. Though we believe more than Zola credits and less than some of the most fervid champions of the shrine are wont to vouch for, we can not doubt that every place on earth which has a large reputation as a seat of the miraculous possesses an atmosphere so impregnated with a certain quality of thought and so alive with a certain type of belief that the air (being literally saturated with an unseen psychical medicament) is efficacious in suggesting to the mind of many a sensitive visitor exactly what is necessary to start that sufferer on the road to health. Everywhere the doctors tell us of nervous cases yielding to mental treatments of even the most fantastic and reasonless varieties; but the staid surgeon and the sober physician whose experience has been great in organic difficulties of long standing and grave import shake their heads and tell you that you must sharply draw the line between nervous or "neurotic" cases which are healed and the pronounced organic troubles which only the surgeon's knife can cure. We certainly do not feel prepared to testify of broken bones healed by thought without surgical assistance, therefore we are not insolent to those who are careful to fix limits to the scope of psychic healing. Indeed we often contend that when the higher thought of life becomes universal, no bones will get broken and no such conditions will exist as now require serious operations to relieve or extirpate. A moderate position is always far stronger than a blindly extreme one, but though a moderate statement is not apt to arouse any great amount of immediate enthusiasm, it appeals radically to thoughtful people and wears well with them, while sensational rhapsodies please the ear and tickle emotion, but are soon forgotten or repudiated when difficulties have to be met and mastered. Disorders of children are a fruitful source of comment, and even of adverse criticism, when mental healing is on the tapis, and why? Simply because nine at least out of every ten persons one meets are sure vainly to imagine that if you say you believe that mind affects body you mean that you indorse sharply and exclusively the unwarrantable dogma that my mind alone affects my body, while your body is alone affected by your thought, and so on universally. When we transfer the thought of how diseases are produced and how they can be cured from the objective or physical to the subjective or psychical plane of action, we are not called upon to do violence to analogy. If you grant that physical distempers are physically carried through the air and reach one person from another wherever susceptibility obtains, you are equally logical if you are considering mental states when you make allowance for psychical contagion where psychical susceptibility exists, and in the case of children and all susceptible persons of both sexes and all ages it exists very largely. The following excerpt from "The Realm," an excellent monthly paper issued in Toronto, Canada (June, 1898), is full of suggestive teachings: "When a hungry man thinks of food, his mouth waters because Nature supplies saliva not only to food but to the very thought of food. Nothing is more curious than this response of the physical system to the operations of the mind. Dr. Matthew Woods, in an admirable pamphlet upon Mimetic Diseases, speaks of the familiar fact that at the close of many discourses delivered from the chair of the Practice of Medicine, the professor is privately consulted by students suffering from all the symptoms described. This imitative peculiarity is not limited to such ailments as disease of the heart, consumption, Basedow's disease, gall stone, cancer of the pancreas, or appendicitis, but some have been known to become hemiplegic—viz., incapable of motion and sensation in the right or left half of the body—during a realistic lecture on cerebral apoplexy. Others have been seized with violent pain in the knee during an elucidation of the symptoms and pathology of Pott's disease, while there are reports of students acquiring all the subjective symptoms of dislocation or fracture, because of the impression made upon their minds by the lecturer while discussing these surgical states.

"Physicians and philosophers perfectly understand the effect of 'expectant attention,' which has been the cause not only of individual diseases but of marvelous epidemics in various parts of the world. Witness the disease of tarantism, so called because of its supposed origin in the bite of the tarantula, a species of spider. Its victims were sometimes subjected to treatment of the most painful sort, but it could be effectually cured by nothing but music. A bishop, who believed the whole thing to be imaginary, allowed himself to be bitten by the tarantula, and presently fell to dancing with all the delirious grotesquerie of the peasant. By-and-by, when people ceased to think much about the tarantula, tarantism ceased, and at the present day Italian peasants may be bitten again and again by the tarantula with no serious effect whatever. In other words, 'expectant attention' being absent, the phenomena, which are no longer expected, do not occur."

Though the foregoing extract covers very wide ground and deals more with ailments of adults than of infants, it shows plainly enough how a receptive mental state causes phenomena to appear for which no adequate physical cause can possibly be assigned. Among the most easily communicable of mental states stands worry or anxiety, which is the prolific parent of innumerable sufferings. Sensitive children are so affected by the nervous, anxious, mental states of those around them that fevers and convulsions frequently issue from no other cause than the intense nervous derangement of parents, nurses, or any person upon whom children are specially dependent or between whom and themselves there exists any strong sympathy. The quarrels (suppressed rather than active) between married people have very much to do with the afflictions of childhood, and a very strong case for psychics rather than for physics can be made out, if we carefully observe the superior healthfulness of the children of the "vulgar," who do not dissemble or cloak their emotions, but blurt out their angry feelings when they have any, and thus get rid of them far sooner than though they nursed them secretly.

We are not admiring or advocating violent outbursts of ungoverned temper by any means, but we do dare to teach, in the name of hygiene, that it is far less poisonous to vent forth ill-will, if one is cursed with unkind feeling toward another, than it is to permit it to prey upon your vitals and eat out the very heart of inward peace and contentment. The truly wise mother is one who makes the only acceptable sacrifice on behalf of her child, and that is the perfect controlling of her own inward emotions.

It is truly said that love gives giant strength and no love can be stronger than a mother's; therefore, let no one make the weak excuse that she can not help feeling bad inwardly, however much she may control her speech and conduct. It is exactly here that refined people do worse than those who make no boast of refinement, and for this cause the peasantry of any nation is apt to enjoy better health than the so-called upper classes. It is useless to talk of mental healing and discuss the mysteries of psychic science unless you are ready to take the great initial step by which alone you can enter the path which leads finally to adepthood, which is nothing other than a state of freedom from the long-time belief that our thoughts are our masters, when by right of reason we are theirs. It is of course needless to add, when discoursing upon the salutary effects of a mother's rightful thought upon her child, that she receives at first hand the inestimable benefits accruing from mental self-mastery which she psychically transmits to her receptive offspring. There are no one-sided blessings; as we bless others we bless ourselves, and every time we pursue a course beneficial to our own interests we are putting ourselves in condition to radiate blessings to all who are in any degree susceptible to our influence.

Self-healing and the work of healing others are not two distinct phases of work so entirely separate that one can be successfully accomplished without the other. So gregarious are our natural instincts and so impossible is it for any of us to get fully rid of social obligations, that though we often talk of treating ourselves and then of treating others as though there were little, if any, connection between the two processes, a little logical reasoning on the matter will suffice to convince even the most sceptical that as we persistently determine to encourage only such thoughts as we feel to be consistent with our own and others' highest welfare, our lives will truly become transfigured, and, as a result, transfiguring in their influence upon all with whom we are psychically en rapport.

It is not wise to dwell actively on bodily conditions and seek to change them in any direct sense by mental action; a far more excellent way is simply to encourage those mental states which we know to be desirable, and quietly permit their influence to extend to the circumference of our existence and thence shed radiant light upon the path of others. When once the habit of thinking only harmonious thoughts has taken deep root within us, we shall find bodily conditions and worldly affairs transformed as if by magic, and all who are in contact with us will share in the benediction. The following lines exactly express the true thought concerning self-healing and helping others to health:

Live true to your noblest ideals!
  You can not make them too high;
The longer the struggle, the harder the fight,
  The grander the by and by.

There's never a high ideal
  But will be the Real some day,
If we follow with patience the Path of Love,
  As the true and only way.

The Perfect Life will come at last
To every human soul;
In living our best we shall find the way
By which we can make life whole.

It's only because we live but a part Of the Life we all can live,
That we have but a part of the wonderful gift
That the Perfect Life will give.

So live to your highest Ideals now,
And ye shall be as leaven,
And make for men God's kingdom here
On earth as it is in Heaven.

IX.

FINDING THE CHRIST WITHIN—THE NEW LIFE—REALIZING THE ATONEMENT.

Though fully aware that the immensity of the title of this chapter is simply overwhelming in its scope and majesty, we will nevertheless address ourselves earnestly and fearlessly in these the closing pages, of a volume intended to be of practical service to inquiring humanity, to the consideration of themes of such transcendent moment and apparent difficulty that their elucidation has been well-nigh the despair of theologians through the course of many centuries. What think ye of Christ? is the ever-recurring question in Christendom; and the replies to this query are so far removed from one another that they range all the way from "Christ is God" to "I do not believe Christ ever existed." In the fourth gospel the Christ is identified with the eternal Logos, the everlasting Word, which is the active creative force in the universe. There is a distinct philosophic connection between this first chapter of John's gospel and the eighth chapter of Proverbs, for while the gospel speaks of the divine masculine principle (love), the author of Proverbs deals with the equally divine feminine (wisdom), which is said to have been with Him in all the work of creation. Love and wisdom together are necessary to creation; the product of their union is the Holy Spirit, or divine breath which sustains and is perpetually recreating all things. Though there is a beginning and also an ending to the career of any world or system of worlds, creation itself is eternal. We must dismiss entirely from our minds the thought of time when we contemplate the self-existent, the underived essence of life which remains unchangeable, though all things change without or external to it. "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and forever," suggests the principle back of the personality. The physical shape of the Man of Galilee changed as do all other physical shapes, but the abiding ego changes not at all forever. In the esoteric meaning of the term, Christ is the immortal principle of humanity, which, like Melchisedec, King of Salem, priest of the MOST HIGH, has neither beginning of days nor end of life; being without father or mother, he has no family tree, therefore to such as he genealogy can have no meaning.

Modern as well as ancient Hermetists are wont to turn attention as fully to the esoteric as materialists are disposed to direct our gaze to the exoteric side of every question; and though there is a common resting-place for occultists and externalists, it is not often that this is clearly displayed in a treatise written either by a professed Hermetist or by one who writes avowedly from the standpoint of literalism.

Some years ago great attention was called to the productions of Dr. Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland, whose collaborated work, "The Perfect Way, or Finding of Christ," is still the accepted Vade mecum of a by no means insignificant company of Theosophists of a distinctive type in London and elsewhere. The chief difference between the teachings of these authors and those of other schools of theosophical thought, is that they approach in language, though not in sentiment, very much nearer the accepted phraseology of the Christian than do the advocates of a more distinctly Asiatic terminology, such as that employed by Annie Besant and others who have spent some time in India and much more time in the study of Hindu or Sanskrit literature. To average Christian ears the terminology of Orientalism, outside of its Christian aspect, is almost unintelligible; therefore, it simplifies matters greatly when addressing a professedly Christian public to use words and phrases culled from the New Testament rather than from the Vedas or Bhagavad Gita or any other unfamiliar, or at least far less familiar, fount of inspiration. The allusions to Christ in the Pauline epistles are, many of them, of such a character that they are positively incomprehensible if applied to a person, while they grow luminous at once when we understand that they apply to a principle. When Paul speaks of Christ being formed within us, and of our being knit together into the mystical body of Christ, if language means anything as there employed, the allusions must be both spiritual and social; but they can not have exclusive reference to one personality, no matter how divine and glorious.

The personal Jesus may be accepted throughout Christendom as the perfect embodiment and the complete epiphany or manifestation of the divine through the human, both as an exemplar of the race and as a source of spiritual blessing to all who are reachable by the magnetic radiations from the glorified person. But it will in no way interfere with that view to indorse the Buddhist's claim and agree to his assertion that India as well as Palestine has witnessed the perfect expression of the divine, through the human, in the life history of a glorified Elder Brother of Humanity. The acceptance of Christ is far more than belief in historic records, the best of which are sometimes dubious. Christ, says Paul, is to be formed within us. What can such a saying mean, if not that the Christ spirit, mind or temper is fully to possess us, and we by virtue of possessing it are to become divinized? The too great pressure often brought to bear upon honest sceptics to accept a personal Christ as Saviour and Lord, coupled with threats of future punishment too dreadful to be imagined in the event of their rejection of this sacred person, has often been responsible for the positively anti-Christian character of so-called free thought, radical and liberal utterances. It was Dr. Pusey as much as anybody or anything that caused Mrs. Besant to drift toward Atheism, while Dean Stanley evoked within her a renewed respect for Christianity, though she could not be brought, even by his graciousness, to re-embrace it. It is no doubt largely a matter of temperament in many cases which decides the acceptance or rejection of the distinctively personal element in the Christian thought, and exactly the same is true when Buddhism or some other system is being examined in place of Christianity. There are some intense natures to whom nothing but a concrete image appears real; unless you concretize, you mystify and bewilder such good people, for they are not able, it seems, to revel in the abstract; they must be reached through the agency of the distinctly personal. Do not let us speak or think slightingly of such, for their wants are great and there must be for them an adapted ministry. The personal thought of Christ reaches and satisfies these and they must be led by it and through it to see beyond it, and when they see more than they at present realize they will know, better than they know now, where to place the personal equation in a synthetic system of philosophy. The indwelling Logos, regarded as the life of humanity, the light enlightening every human being, is a sublime conception; one, moreover, in which all prophets and poets of the highest stamp have revelled with intense delight. When we hear Whittier singing "Long sought without, but found within," we are forcibly reminded of Fenelon and of Mme. Guyon as well as of many other sweet, noble natures whose Christian mysticism was something inexpressibly higher, deeper and purer than the conventional creedism of the average ecclesiastics of their day. Had this higher element prevailed in the Church, in Europe 400 years ago, Savonarola would have been accepted, and Luther would have had no apology for his iconoclasm. The mystic who seeks and finds the Christ within is generally of sweet, simple, meditative nature. To such temperaments the methods of the scholastic theologians are for the most part detestable, because while subtle casuistry delights the intellect it not infrequently offends the heart. The mystic feels, while the casuist argues. One is a poet, the other a lawyer; and though a solicitor or an attorney may be a minstrel, we hardly associate the bard with jurisprudence. There is, of course, nothing incongruous in such a combination, and it would be well for the world if lawyers were seers and poets; but ecclesiastical litigation and sacerdotal wire-pulling are of all legal processes the most odious to the devout soul which takes no interest in defining a dogma, but all interest in inwardly realizing truth. Calvin's condemnation of Servetus simply proved that Calvin, though a fine logician, had utterly neglected the religion of the heart. No passage in the canonical Gospels, can be cited to prove that Jesus taught that salvation consisted in saying, "God the Son," while perdition awaited those who said "the Son of God." However much of abstract truth there may be in a theologic formulary, it has no vitalizing power. Doctrines presented to the intellect, and accepted by it, have no power to reach the heart; therefore, all creeds and dogmas put together are powerless to uplift the human race because love, not belief, is the fulfilling of the law. We do not necessarily love because we believe. "Devils also believe and tremble," is a pat phrase and one that theologians would do well to ponder. Christ in the life is not Jesus in the head, though Jesus in the head does not keep Christ out of the life. There are two of every one of us; we are all conscious of a higher and of a lower self, however ill prepared we may be to define these two selves in any clear and philosophically accurate manner. It is because of these two in every one of us that the opposed theories of creation and evolution provoke so much long-drawn controversy—a contention which can never cease so long as either side lays claim to a monopoly of truth.

Creationists postulate God, while evolutionists postulate Something. Back of protoplasmic cells is spirit. Spiritual plasm is the truly first (proto) and life (Bio) plasm. Back of evolution is that which is involved and that which is made manifest through those slow and orderly processes we call evolutionary.

The researches of Lamarck and then of Darwin and Wallace led to certain definite, formulable conclusions concerning the method of the working of the law of evolution, which ancient seers may not have exactly anticipated, but it is the height of ignorance and folly for nineteenth century students to arrogate to themselves and to their age all the knowledge concerning evolution extant on earth to-day. Involution and evolution are unthinkable apart. It is the spiritual side of the theory of evolution which most strongly appeals to the searcher for inward satisfaction, therefore the revelation of the evolution of Man's spiritual consciousness—which the New Testament conceals beneath the surface of the letter—offers an interpretation of biological phenomena obtainable nowhere else. Paul's doctrine of "first the natural, then the spiritual" in the order of expression, tallies precisely with the words in the third chapter of the fourth Gospel, "Except a man be born again he can not see the kingdom of God." Then, after Nicodemus has heard this declaration, he is told that he must be born of water and of the spirit in logical sequential order, before he can do more than simply behold, even enter into the kingdom of heaven. Jesus addresses this "Master in Israel" with the pertinent question, "Knowest thou not these things?" paying thereby a tribute to the Kabala and other secret or sacred sources of information open to the Chief Rabbis, seventy of whom constituted the Sanhedrin, the highest council in Israel.

The Jewish Kabala is not the only phase of Kabala extant, but it is the most accessible, though it is by no means easy to decipher. The books of greater and lesser Concealed Mystery are full of profound theosophy, which those who speak glibly of "Kabala unveiled" will find very much veiled still after all the attempted unveiling. The legend concerning Kabala is that angels, who form a theosophic school in Paradise, reveal to chosen ones on earth what man unguided by these celestial prompters could never find out for himself. This tradition is susceptible of more than one elucidation, for though angelic ministration may be an important factor in human enlightenment, the angel within us must not be overlooked while we pay exclusive honor to the angel without. Until we reach a plane of development where we are capable of appreciating direct inward guidance we should gratefully acknowledge our profound indebtedness to counselors without; but the experience of the soul ultimately must be like to that of Mme. Guyon, who returned heart-weary from her pilgrimage to many famous shrines where she had been to seek for Christ. Fenelon, who was her adviser, said: "My child, you have been looking for Christ everywhere except in the place where you are sure to find him. Seek no longer without; look within." It is only when we have grown dissatisfied with what is procurable without that we are ready to turn within; therefore it is madness to seek to hurry the process of spiritual growth, which, if not spontaneous, is unreal and artificial. If we are contented with creeds, catechisms, rituals and ordinances, they are the things for us just now; but if these fail to meet our necessities and our deeper needs are sadly unsupplied, if we are growing in wisdom or are even ready to pay heed to wise counselors, we shall shed no tears and experience no regret, but straightway repair to that inward sanctuary of the spirit where the living universal Christ stands ready to supply all needs and give rest to all the weary. Put the matter in any light you please, it is always and only personal experience that satisfies. Hearsay evidence is never finally conclusive. No matter how unimpeachable the witnesses or how strong the testimony, there is no real peace until one can say: "My own eyes have seen the glory of the Lord, and my own ears have heard the joyful tidings of salvation." To preach a so-called gospel and leave personal experience out is to feed the multitude on husks instead of bread.

Watch the eager throngs who congregate to listen to Oriental teachers and the crowds who frequent spiritualistic "test" meetings. What is the cause of this flocking to hear Asiatics and this clamoring for clairvoyance and psychometry? Psychical Research is born out of soul hunger. People are not sure of anything. Immortality is too uncertain. Religious teaching is either too dogmatic or too vague. The sacerdotalists appeal to authority which is not authoritative, while the liberalists calmly and rationalistically drift into agnosticism and those of gloomy disposition into pessimism. If something like phenomenal spiritism could satisfy the human soul there would be no further seeking when once phenomena of a psychic character had been proved genuine; but the human being as we know him is not capable of resting in phenomena, however valuable such may be as introductory steps to inward realization.

In spite of the fantastic side of Yoga practice, there is in it all a thinly veiled yearning after union with the divine. Why all this talk of "tatwas;" why all this struggling to govern breath, and to attain to the practice of magic, unless below it all there is a yearning after the hidden divinity which at length may stand revealed? There are too many really earnest, pure-minded men and women seeking through these avenues to-day for any fair observant critic to dismiss the subject with a sneer; or with an empty toss of the head, exclaim: "Oh, only a sensation; another nine days' wonder." Christian Science, Theosophy, Spiritualism, all appeal to the curiosity-seeking on the one hand, and to the desperately earnest "beggars for light" on the other. When we see only the speckled surface of a movement we are apt to say it is nothing but a mushroom growth and will soon be laid aside to make way for a new sensation; but on its deeper side we see that it does more than appeal to our latter-day Athenians, who are forever seeking to regale themselves with novelties. May it not be that underneath all the glamour and confusion of tongues and presentations of ambiguous wonders there is an actual effort being made by the higher self of the race to incarnate itself more fully, so that life shall be no longer the vain frivolous show, or money-grubbing grind, which far too many people make it? The higher self of the race is the esoteric Christ; the unveiling of this Christ is the race's hope of Glory.

So interwoven are we all, so inseparable are our interests, that, as Pythagoras affirmed, "no soul can be absolutely free as long as one of its companions is in bondage." Paul's epistles are wonderfully full of this sentiment, and nowhere is the idea more completely elucidated than in the twelfth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, where, after enumerating the many members of the one body, he ends with the declaration, "Even so is Christ." Jesus, in Paul's esteem, was a real, living, glorified individual who appeared to him personally, and addressed direct words to him on his memorable journey between Jerusalem and Damascus. Jesus was to Paul the head of the company of members of the mystical body of the esoteric Christ, which, like the literal human organism, he conceived to be composed of parts and organs wherein all members have their distinctive, but equally honorable, functions. No socialists have ever improved on Paul's plan; but unfortunately for much avowed socialism, its leaders have altogether failed to realize the sole spiritual basis for a social state which can abide. It is useless to object to leadership. Leaders there are and leaders there still must be, but hereditary leadership is a corruption. The two chief sacraments of the Christian Church, Baptism and the Holy Supper, were originally socializing institutions, and though they certainly had a spiritual significance entirely beyond their external meaning, their influence for good upon social customs was exceedingly significant. All who were baptized, and all who partook of the consecrated elements at the holy table, were accredited members of the primitive Christian commonwealth, which was regarded by early Christians as the nucleus of a world-wide movement for the spiritual and social regeneration of the race. "Ye are the light of the world" and

"Ye are the salt of the earth" were sentences taken personally by the primitive disciples, who were too ardently enthusiastic in their devotion to the cause for which they were ready to suffer martyrdom to allow any half-hearted allegiance to their Master's counsels.

William Stead has well said that the Coliseum in Rome remains as a tremendous advertisement for early Christianity. Such books as "Quo Vadis?" and "Shall we Follow Him?" and such plays as "The Sign of the Cross," intensely popular of late, show that admiration for the heroic spirit of the early martyrs is by no means dead to-day.

We are all members of a great spiritual community; we all belong to a universal fraternity; therefore, we are in this spiritual-social body as members thereof. That Russian prince who spoke so forcibly on brotherhood at the Congress of Religions held in Chicago during September, 1893, struck the only genuine keynote to the anthem of universal fraternization, when he exclaimed: "This thought of brotherhood is not the apex, it is the base of the social pyramid;" and then, alluding to the invitation to volunteers to become recruits in an army whose avowed object was the forming of a universal brotherhood, he forcibly replied, "I can not enlist in an army into which I was born." This sense of brotherhood is primal, and it is indeed encouraging to note how such men as Rev. John Watson (Ian MacLaren) in his "Life Creed," and other noble thinkers, are insisting upon the absolutely universal scope of divine fatherhood and human brotherhood, as against the pitifully narrow conceptions of those misguided teachers who seek to restrict the advantages of belonging to God's family to those alone who accept their narrow dogmatism and pay respect to their contracted ordinances.

It is a very vital question whether we acknowledge universal or only sectional or partial brotherhood, because upon this issue depends the basis of all our conduct to the great bulk of our fellow-beings. We can not expect people to be better than their ideals, or more loving and generous than their faith permits; therefore, while it may be correct to say, "It does not matter what a man believes, so long as he lives a noble life," it is impossible to believe that what one really believes will exert no influence on life. A clear and unexceptionable statement may be as follows: It does not matter what people believe to any greater extent than belief influences character. To call every virtue "Christian," and then act as though your sense of "Christian" was so universal that it embraces Jews, Buddhists, Brahmins, Parsees, and all the rest, is simply an evidence that "Christian" is a word very dear to you, and so you employ it as the synonym of all that is truly excellent; but if you call every virtue "Christian," and then proceed to ostracize every technically non-Christian person, and act as though you believed him to be the prey of all the "heathen" vices, you are so bound and fettered by an adjective that it would be good for you if there were no such word as Christian in your vocabulary. There is always danger in pressing a seemingly sectarian term too far; because though you may use it broadly, others are sure to interpret it narrowly, and there are so many words which are entirely superdenominational that it is decidedly preferable to select one of those for general usage in place of the hackneyed terms which always engender in some minds the thought of limitation.

When the Oriental Swamis and other visitors from the Far East are announced to lecture somewhere in the United States, or in England, there are sure to be some narrow-minded people who will contemptuously inquire: "What good do you expect to get from those heathens?" The use of the word "heathen," as applied to a faithful Brahmin, Buddhist, Jainist, or Parsee, is fully as objectionable as the use of the word "dog," as applied by a Mohammedan to a Christian, or to any one who does not subscribe to the creed of Islam. People talk of the "unspeakable Turk" as though barbarity in Europe was confined to the Ottoman Empire, when within recent years barbarities and atrocities have been enacted against Jews in several European countries, to say nothing of parts of the African continent, by fanatics who justify their hatred of the Jew because he is not a Christian.

Though we shall never join those ribald iconoclasts, who denounce Christianity in unmeasured terms because of the abuses practiced in its name, we will endeavor to do justice to much of the sentiment which has provoked such violent outbursts of indignation against a time-honored institution. It is not hatred for virtue, but for vice; not opposition to integrity, but to hypocrisy, which has led the atheistic crew to hurl thunderbolts of contumely and derision at all that bears the Christian name. Victor Hugo, in "Les Miserables," has shown us the exceeding piety and sweet charity of a Catholic Bishop who was a true philanthropist of the divinest type; yet Victor Hugo had so far alienated himself from ecclesiasticism in France that his body could not be buried in the Pantheon (then a church) until the building had been formally de-consecrated or secularized. This separation from the church of a large number of the world's greatest geniuses, and most deeply spiritual minds, is weakening the church immensely, but it is only proving that religion and ecclesiasticism do not always go hand in hand. The phrase, "One holy catholic church," is large and ample, but how many people believe in it? You are actually obliged to read a Unitarian hymn book to find a correct definition of the universal church, because the phrase is nowhere else so clearly interpreted.

The following lines, by a well-known composer of many exquisite hymns, express the true sentiment of the New Testament:

> "One holy church of God appears
> Through every age and race;
> Unwasted by the lapse of years,
> Unchanged by changing place.
> Her priests are all God's faithful sons,
> To serve the world raised up;
> The pure in heart, her baptized ones—
> Love, her communion cup."

Here we have the gospel of Jesus supplemented by the testimony of Paul, of John, of James and of other apostles, carried through all centuries and countries, and brought up to the living present in a vital application of truth to the actual demands of to-day. It is utterly impossible for the thinking, growing youth of to-day to take any other view of the church of the living God than that it is the spiritual incorporation of all who are led by the Spirit of Truth entirely regardless of their outer affiliations or lack of any external affiliation at all.

It is quite possible to accept Jesus as the head of the human race, and therefore take a position consistently Christian, and at the same time to accept thankfully all the joyful tidings brought to light by the most recent studies in Comparative Religion. The mystical body of the Christ is made up of all who are one in spirit—one in love. "The Lord knoweth those who are his," whether they know him or not. The world may be divided into regenerated and unregenerated people, even as there are the educated and the uneducated; but for our part we are not ready thus arbitrarily to classify humanity under these two heads. That celebrated Swedenborgian minister of Philadelphia, Rev. Chauncey Giles, whose published sermons are still proving of great help to increasing multitudes, used to say when addressing some one in whom the fruits of the divine Spirit were gradually manifesting, not "my regenerated friend," but "my regenerating friend." There is a very wide difference between the two sayings. If we were fully regenerated we should have already attained to that state of complete holiness which John and Charles Wesley, and some of their descendants, have regarded as possible here on earth, and which, no doubt, is possible, though the very people who conduct Holiness Meetings and preach Holiness most loudly do not show, as a rule, that they are other than in process of sanctification.

Precisely as generation is gradual, so also is regeneration gradual. No matter how perfect may be the germ and how accurately fulfilled may be every stage in the gestative process which must lie between conception and birth, the nine months of gestating life symbolize the progressive action of the Divine Spirit within the human soul. Then after birth twenty years may be passed in infancy, childhood and youth before physical maturity is reached. If the personal recorded life of Jesus be taken as representative, and as pointing the way to perfect spiritual attainment, the doctrine of atonement may be readily understood, and a vast, murky cloud of misconception be removed from a tenet, which, though originally elevating, has become so obscured by the clouds of accumulated error that it resembles to-day a fine old painting by a great master, which has become so blackened with smoke and disfigured with grime that now, as it is beginning to be restored, we are catching glimpses of its original lineaments, which are fair beyond description and which will shortly reappear in sight of all beholders. Let us not number ourselves among those who fear the results of restoration; neither let us turn from the doctrine, and say we reject the atonement because it has been misinterpreted. The ideal life of Jesus differs from that of other great characters in the Bible, and elsewhere, because of its extreme comprehensiveness. Jesus grows naturally, as all children ought to grow, increasing in size and wisdom as he advances in age, then when he is thirty years of age, old enough to commence a public ministry, having conquered temptations in his own practical experience, he leaves the desert or place of seclusion where he has been preparing for his ministry to the masses, and goes everywhere into all walks of life, associating with all sorts of people, leveling all artificial distinctions, working faithfully to democratize society on the basis of man's acceptance of one God as the Father of all, and the necessary corollary, universal sisterhood and brotherhood. Whether the Gospels are historical or not, they represent Jesus as treating women with fully as much respect as he shows to men; not in any spirit of gallantry or chivalry, but addressing them as the intellectual equals of their brothers, thereby discountenancing every one of those ignorant superstitions and forms of slavery against which the best thinkers of to-day are vigorously protesting. Jesus goes everywhere and does everything; his methods of teaching and healing are as diverse as human needs, therefore it is true that so eclectic, so composite is the portrait of the ideal man, that you can, if you will, support any system you prefer most by reference to gospel precedent. But how are you going to support it? is the question. Are you doing violence to the narrative by extracting an isolated incident and building up a system on a text, or are you ready thankfully to allow that there is some good to be done with every method, though no method avails on all occasions? It is pitiable to hear some people who think themselves "advanced" attempt ludicrous, belittling and revolting explanations of some of the most beautiful and suggestive narratives of healing in the entire gospel repository.

Take, for example, the account of Jesus making clay of dust and spittle and anointing therewith the eyes of the man blind from birth. In that history we have a fine suggestion of the atonement. Saliva is a common product of the human body possessed by all and shared by animals as well. Dust is the very substance of the common soil, accessible alike to rich and poor—to high and low. The object lesson is where the healer—who is invariably also a teacher—mingles the two, making them one;

thereby signifying that health and sight are ours only when we have made peace between what our own natures generate and contain, and the great world around us. Then, when the lesson has been learned, a bath must be taken in Siloam's pool, i. e., in that particular place to which you are directed by the power that heals you; then after bathing in Siloam, as Naaman bathed in Jordan, you receive sight, as the Assyrian captain parted with his leprosy.

The two cases resemble each other; they are analogous, but not identical. The young man whom Jesus treated, in the instance just referred to, was the unsophisticated youth who had not yet come into the knowledge of truth, therefore he was not a sinner. Lepers are they who by reason of transgression have corrupted their flesh, and to them the words go forth in thunder, "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come upon you."

Atonement means conciliation and reconciliation. It is the work of the atoner to bring together for the first time those who have not yet met each other; it is his blessed mission also to reconcile those who have become estranged. The atonement is accomplished in two ways, viz.: by moral suasion and by silent spiritual appeal, that is the way of influence; also by mathematical demonstration of truth to human understanding, that is the way of example.

Consider the atonement in the following lights: First, our relation to God; second, our relation to each other; third, the relation of the two selves in every one of us. First as to our relation to Deity. We may have been living without a sense of God and yet in no sense in conscious or wilful opposition to Divine Order. We have been born once, but not twice! We have seen earthly but not heavenly things; we are like Nicodemus, who comes to Jesus by night, seeking and ready to receive that fuller light concerning life, without which we may be nominally, but never really, "Masters in Israel." Then we all know that we often have a sense of alienation from all that is divine; we have groveled in sensuality, or we have sinned grievously against charity. There were times in the past when we felt ourselves near to God and at peace with the MOST HIGH, but now we are estranged from the Eternal Parent and we think God is angry with us. Our errors have caused a smoke or mist to arise murkily from ourselves and blacken the air all about us, and though we can say with Samson: "Total eclipse, no sun, no moon," the sun and moon are just as bright as though we had not blinded ourselves by our transgressions. Here comes in the imperative need for stating the true doctrine of atonement. God never changes; the Infinite is absolutely immutable, but God seems to change whenever we change.

Jesus never told people to do other than put away their own errors, so that, the scales being removed from their eyes, they might see God as a result of their own purity. Did Jesus purify them; did his blood cleanse them? Not by proxy; not as a substitute, and not merely as an example, but in accordance with the changeless law of intercommunication, which makes it possible for one who is lifted up to draw others unto him. Almost at the expense of vulgarizing this intensely sublime subject we feel it necessary to indulge in an almost coarse allusion to personal magnetism so as to make this branch of the subject vivid.

It is now a matter of oft-repeated experiment that one person can so treat another that though the healer takes absolutely nothing of the disease of the patient upon himself he is instrumental in destroying that disorder. It is a hideous thought, and one that is utterly barbaric, that Jesus was contaminated with sin or that he bore disease in his own person. He destroyed sin; error was annihilated through the electric agency of the force emanating from him which extirpated it. Can you not realize how, if your own blindness or deafness is shutting out from you a vision and a song which are perpetual, if some potential healer could dissolve for you the scales over your eyes and the wax in your ears, the landscape and the melody would start into original being for you as an immediate consequence of the successful act of healing? Daylight has come to us, directly we know that changes are wrought in man while God is changeless.

Now, to the second point, viz.: Man's relation to man. The thought of the need of atonement is again twofold, for there are many cases where not only individuals but whole tribes and even nations are practically unknown to each other. The poet struck home very close to truth who wrote the lines:

> "If we knew each other better
> We should love each other more."

The story of Balaam, when read with unprejudiced eyes, is a singularly fine illustration of this verity. Balak wanted to hire Balaam to curse Israel; Balaam, being totally unacquainted with the descendants of Jacob, imagines, no doubt, that they are a very iniquitous people, and feels toward them precisely as some ignorant but well-meaning people feel toward modern Jews, because they have foolishly swallowed the contents of anti-Semitic literary tirades.

Balaam sees the tents of Israel outspread, and proceeds to bless this honorable people whose peaceful agricultural tendencies and devoted home life contrasted very pleasingly with the less civilized conditions which Balaam had seen exhibited elsewhere; and even when Balak finds it impossible to induce Balaam to curse Israel, and he says, "Neither curse them at all nor bless them at all," Balaam answers that he can not refrain from speaking the word which the Lord has put in his mouth.

How frequently it occurs that we believe that we actually abhor people of whom we know absolutely nothing! The relentless fires of reasonless persecution have been many a time kindled in Europe against unoffending Jews, because some malicious tongue started the report, which silly tongues extended, that in Hebrew homes and synagogues the blood of Christian children was mingled with the wine of Passover. No matter how foundationless a tale may be, once let it circulate, and ignorant, credulous people are ready to believe the worst of their innocent neighbors. So long as we remain in ignorance of each other we are sadly apt to condemn each other; therefore, if wars are to be made to cease and the white peace flag is to float over all the nations of the earth, the first step to be taken is to introduce the nations one to the other.

Jesus is neither Greek, Roman, Hebrew, nor aught else that is sectional; he is the "Son of Man"—a title employed in the book of Daniel before we find it in the New Testament. The Son of Man belongs to all races and claims all countries as his own; all flags are his, so wherever he goes he is at home. Birds with private nests and foxes with private holes represent lower states of attainment than the state demanded of those who would take up their cross and follow the ideal Master.

Have you considered well what cosmopolitan means; do you know how great it is to be a cosmopolite—one who though without a special country claims all countries as his own? Though Jesus has no private bed and no private pillow, he can rest in all beds and sleep on all pillows, and woo and win sweet sleep wherever he may be. It is perfectly right that we should acknowledge our special relationships to special places and people, and it may be said of Jesus that he chose twelve companions, and out of the twelve only three were truly intimate with him; and out of the three, only one was a bosom friend.

These closest of all relationships are peculiarly sacred and should never be lightly esteemed, but they must never be permitted to interfere with that perfect good will to all humanity without which the true atonement of man to man can never be consummated. When hostilities have arisen and those who once appeared as friends have drifted wide apart, then the atoning work of the true lover of humanity is to act as peace-restorer and reunite the separated. It is easily conceivable that many diverse temperaments may be attracted to a common focal centre, found only in an individuality so large that it embraces all temperaments and is therefore capable of unifying all. Jesus is comparable to the sun—each of the twelve apostles may occupy one out of the twelve signs of the Zodiac through which the sun is seen to travel as it accomplishes its periodic revolutions.

The solar type of man is synthetic, all-embracing; therefore, to him there are no unsolved mysteries in lesser lives, because his greater life comprehends and incloses all those smaller expressions of life. The conscious integer comprehends all fractional statements, but no fraction is large enough to understand the perfect unit. It takes a singularly rounded nature to understand all the petty existences which are displayed on every side of it, and this large nature knows nothing of such base emotions as scorn, impatience, aversion and contempt, but, like a truly wise savant, who includes all the experiences gained in his own youth and childhood, understands feelingly as well as intellectually the joys and sorrows, doubts and difficulties, ambitions and fears of those who are now undergoing the very experiences which he in his time underwent, and out of which he has come to be the glorious sage he now appears. Our feelings of hostility to our neighbors, whom we do not understand and who may not understand us, are hallmarks of our own weakness, and effectual barriers (so long as we permit them to continue) in the path of our own progression.

No amount of advertised Spiritualism, Theosophy, Christian Science, or anything else is of the slightest practical moral value to man, unless the adherents of these pretentious systems translate theory into practice, and make their ethical assertions the basis of sweeter and more harmonious relationships, man with man, family with family, nation with nation. We must not be too ready, however, to take what looks like a pessimistic view of existing situations, no matter how dark they be.

War is nothing new; it is indeed extremely ancient. Prophets tell us the days will dawn when war will be no more known; but no historian informs us of a past epoch when war did not exist. Feuds between individuals, families, tribes, and nations are vestiges of a departing barbarism; they should not now occasion us dire alarm as though they were awful novelties.

At the same time it is utterly foreign to the spirit of the gospel to fight with carnal weapons under the vaunted banner of the Prince of Peace, who never counseled warfare, though his prophetic vision caused him to say: "It must needs be that offences come, but woe to him by whom they come." Paul seems to have taken a trembling, tentative position on the peace question; though he has placed himself on record as a peace advocate, his words are only partially encouraging, where he says: "If it be possible as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." Such a sentence is a great drop from the beatitude, "Blessed are the peacemakers, they shall be called the children of God." The tremendous strength of this latter, in contrast with the weakness of the former quotation, is graphically displayed in the fact that the beatitude takes it for granted that we can make peace, and unhesitatingly says that all who have come to the knowledge of divine sonship do make peace, and thereby obtain a great blessing; while Paul's words are tremblingly hopeful, but too doubtful to be of any great inspiration to the reader.

Compromises and concessions are useless. The grandeur of the gospel is that it is uncompromising and it makes no concessions. Kindness and strength must be united. No one is really helped by a dubious command; only trumpet-thunders are truly helpful. We can live peaceably with all men; such is the ideal state, and that the prize be yet unwon because the race is yet unrun is no argument against our running the race and gaining the prize. We need great spiritual athletes, and great spiritual athletic exercises, to lift us out of the torpid apathy in which the most of us lie discontented, though assumedly content. It is all in vain that we talk of an atonement with God, when we are not at one with our brethren; hypocrisy and hallucination alone continue to persuade us that we are at peace with heaven while we engage in war on earth. Pitiful indeed are the lame excuses made in religious journals for blasphemous prayers.

We have no right to pray that one army may be victorious and another set of troops defeated, but we have the right to pray earnestly and sincerely from the depths of our souls that we may become so open to divine influx and be so illumined with celestial light that our thoughts, words, and deeds may be directed to the glorious end of increasing the sway of righteousness and enlarging the area of peace, good will, and liberty on earth. May right prevail; may equity triumph; may freedom spread; may purity increase. Such ejaculations as these do not warrant attack on prayer, for when the unbeliever shall ask us how we expect to change the purposes of the Eternal by our petitions, we frankly and uncompromisingly reply, We expect to do nothing of the sort; we are simply praying for more wisdom, that our own actions may accord more perfectly with universal order.

Our third question regarding atonement is how to bring our higher and lower selves into full accord, so that discord may cease in our own members, and we may emerge out of sickness into health, out of confusion into order. Perhaps this third question must in our experience come first, for it is not unreasonable to affirm that until we know ourselves we can not know our neighbors, and until we know our neighbors as well as ourselves we can not find God. The Greeks have counseled us to know ourselves, and the Egyptians have directed us to know ourselves by ourselves. Swedenborg has informed us that there are three loves in every human heart: the love of God, of neighbor and of self, and he added that wherever these loves are rightly subordinated man is an angel; the inversion of their order being the only thing that makes infernal conditions possible. James Martineau has beautifully insisted that if we know God and ourselves we must go into the silence and strip off all the outer barks of the tree of our existence, and find ourselves children of God at the very root and centre of our consciousness. Mabel Collins has told all aspirants for interior enlightenment that they must kill out all sense of separateness from others, overcome personal ambition with spiritual aspiration and cease that restless hunger for personal growth which eats like a canker at the vitals of reposeless natures, and hinders effectually the growth it is blindly expected to assist. The poet who sings "Love thyself last" has given us a deep word of wisdom, for one individual can not be of as much value as the whole human family. Yet as the individual is included in the race, the individual deserves to be loved and honored as a member of the great lovable worthy family which includes that particular unit and without whom the whole would be incomplete.

The search for the "Holy Grail," as recounted by Tennyson, is really the search for that divine essence which makes us all one. We can not be happy or harmonious so long as we are at war within, and if we would attain to the true end of our existence we must learn so to subordinate the lower personality to the higher ego that instead of mortification or repression we shall have attained unto transfiguration and transmutation.

Lower appetites are transmutable. No natural affection is sinful; but when there are higher uses to which lower energies can be put, is it not the path of wisdom to dedicate the lesser to the service of the greater, instead of leaving the nobler aspirations of our natures unsatisfied while we sacrifice perpetually to the lower side of our existence? Occasional fasting may be beneficial; occasional withdrawal from the business and social realms may be extremely helpful; but the life of a cloister for a permanency is not to be desired, unless in the still retreat, sequestered from the outer world, we realize how to employ psychic agencies for the betterment of the world's conditions more perfectly than when we are ourselves in the midst of the hurly-burly.

The Christ life is all-embracing; it includes the normal life of all sorts and conditions of people. The needs of all varieties of temperaments, and the requirements of all vocations, are met out of the exceeding copiousness of its inexhaustible richness and variety. It therefore but remains to say that there are doubtless those to whom the sequestration of an occult or mystic fraternity would be most helpful, and such a calm asylum would afford opportunity to those who are adapted to its quietness to fulfil spiritually the highest missions of philanthropy.

Martha is too much in evidence everywhere; Mary's better part is chosen by too few. The intense interest now being taken in all "psychical" studies and pursuits will, we trust, soon lead to a palpable change in the present-day habit of so far overdoing external work as to make housekeeping a toil and hospitality intolerably irksome.

So very much thought and attention bestowed upon externals saps vitality, dissipates energy, robs the vital organs of their necessary food, and results in every variety of brain, nerve and stomach difficulty, and if not stopped shortly must eventuate in some form of insanity.

The very evils over which the pessimists are perpetually sighing, and which they never tire of recounting and exaggerating, are due in the first instance to nothing other than this intense materiality which is quite as conspicuous in churches as elsewhere. The happy, wholesome life is the life that lives so far above externals that it can use and enjoy all, and at the same time be so richly dowered with interior resourcefulness that the absence of external conveniences, even, will cause no pain. Grumbling never remedies or improves anything. Supply and demand will always co-exist; consequently, the only sure road to improvement in any outward direction is to develop and encourage such inward feelings as must in the very course of necessity bring forth spontaneously the exact correspondences in the outer world we most intensely long to see displayed.

The true spiritual healer, or any one who is determined to make a grand success of practicing any branch of Suggestive Therapeutics, will soon learn by experience to prove that all attacks or onslaughts upon the lower self of a patient or pupil are finally worse than useless, because they arouse antagonism in the lower province instead of exciting to action in the higher realm. The "middle wall of partition" must be broken down and the two must become one. If we realize our own potential greatness, we shall not do right just so long as we are under the psychologic influence of another, and soon backslide into the error, out of which we were seemingly but not really pulled. So-called hypnotic treatment, when adequate and beneficial, is very much higher than what is generally understood by hypnotism; but as that word is of dubious significance, it is not desirable to use it. Moral and mental treatment by means of suggestion is a phrase easy to comprehend, and it sets the average man or woman to thinking. Suggestion to be effective requires not only some one to make a suggestion, but some one to receive and welcome the suggestion made.

Let any impartial student read the Bible narratives of healing and then address himself to doing prophetic or apostolic work to-day, and he will soon find that the same law which governed mental action in bygone ages is operating with equal force to-day.

The orthodox Christian says, You must accept Christ, or Christ can not save you. The atonement therefore is not made for us until we make it ourselves. And now, finally, what does the word atonement mean? Its final syllable, ment, is clearly from the Latin mens, mentis, mind. Swedenborg, in his "Rational Psychology," very clearly differentiates mens from spirit, and it would be well if all writers to-day would be so explicit as to avoid the use of meaningless or else confounding synonyms. It is the intellect that needs to be brought into oneness with the spirit, and unless this is accomplished there is no healing or outwrought salvation. The best criminologists and penologists to-day are seeking so to treat crime as a disease that criminals may be healed instead of executed, and society thereby become improved as well as effectually protected from marauders. Jesus said in the first of the seven recorded sayings from the cross, "They know not what they do;" he prayed for the conversion and enlightenment of Judas, Caiaphas, and all the rest, and expressed himself in terms of perfect good nature to those who had relentlessly afflicted him. Such is the model for our imitation; we must condemn none, but work to raise all. No harsh thought must ever be tolerated if we are to be successful healers. That is a high standard, but low standards make sublime achievements impossible. Do not think you are wrong in pointing out errors or telling people privately of their faults if you do it lovingly, but even this loving rebuke will prove futile unless you point out a more excellent way. If you are in any sense a portion of to-day's Israel; if you consciously belong to any of the twelve widely scattered tribes who are to be ingathered prior to the ultimate harvesting of the multitude innumerable (Rev. VII.); if you in any sense feel that you are here and now members of the true universal church of the first-born, whose names are clearly written in heaven, then remember you are called upon to be cities set on hills, lights to the world, and salt of the earth. In a special manner those who have found their own souls are commissioned to go forth and proclaim the glad tidings to those who have not yet found their souls. The soul is the same in every one of us, but we have not all, as yet, found this higher self which teaches us the divine lesson of universal brotherhood and sisterhood.

Never permit a false or misleading phrase to bolster up a fallacy, and never allow a personal antipathy to becloud judgment or prevent you from seeing the highest aspect of a neighbor.

There will never be one fold and one shepherd, but there will be one flock and one shepherd when all the folds are emptied out and the sheep, no longer marked, labeled or circumscribed, graze together in one broad pastureland owned by no man, for it is God's acre.

We have no right to ask others to join in our Shibboleth, to repeat our prayers, to partake of our ordinances. Every one must be fully persuaded in his own mind as to what helps him to cultivate the noblest graces and approach the most nearly the ideal life.

But there can always be a common meeting-ground, and that place is the temple of philanthropy. It is our identification of ourselves with all humankind, our felt oneness of aim as well as nature, which accomplishes atonement. Then being one on earth, free from every hostile thought, we shall look inward, as well as upward, to heaven, and jubilantly exclaim, God is one; God is Love! Goodness is supreme in the Universe!
